

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA AT LOS ANGELES

EX LIBRIS

OR, THE History of France.

A FAM'D

IN Twelve Parts.

Written originally by the Author of and

Translated by _____ Gent.

Printed for _____ and _____ at the George near S. Dunstan's Church, and at the Har- row at Chancery Lane end in Fleet-street, and the New Exchange. 1677.

AMBOS FILIOS DO MINHO
CEL. BONA SOLITA

Ed 10/1/2/4

* Pu
1303
3 E
V

TO THE Dutchess

OF ALBEMARLE.

MADAM,

I were a presumption to approach so Illustrious a Person, did not your Grace's Goodness give access to your Greatness; and since I have made the French Pharamond an English Guest, he could be nowhere more nobly Entertain'd, or more Princely Lodg'd, than under your Grace's Roof: and when he enters there, he comes as Æneas did into Carthage, only with this difference. That Trojan Worthy beheld the fair Dido's Palace adorn'd with his own Labours. Here he saw a Grecian, there a Trojan Army; here Shining Navies, and there Glittering Fields; on this side a Besieged, on that a Burning City; and on the Painted Roof a Scene of Deities deciding the Fate of Troy; here he saw Warring Hero's, and there Contending Gods. But Pharamond, when he approaches here, instead of meeting his own Adventures, his Great Enemies, and his greater Conquests, is Treated by your Grace with a more Glorious Story: Here he views a Bleeding Nation, and the intestine wounds of a long Civil War, and there he sees the Loyal and Valiant Newcastle plung'd in the Torrent, and stemming an impetuous Tide to save a Sinking Kingdom, and in opposition to this active Hero, the Lantscape above presents him a Threatening Providence, like the Angel with the Flaming Sword before the Gate of Paradise. And in pursuance of this Prophetick Vision he beholds a Martyr'd Monarch, a Ruin'd State, and an Enslav'd Country in a dismal Piece, Shaded and Darken'd with all the Horrors of Treason and Vengeance. However no sooner are his eyes diverted from this Tragick Object, but straight the next Prospect surprises him with a more Beautiful Scene. He admires the dazzling Lustre of a Northern Star, by whose sudden, and no less miraculous Influence, appears the Resurrection of Loyalty, Peace and Liberty, the Transports of a Deliver'd Nation, and the Restoration of an Exiled King.

R. Brown 2-1-44 - English

Whilest the astonish'd Pharamond surveys this wondrous Chronicle of your Sacred Original, and as Sacred Alliance, and considers what perfections your Grace must derive from such infinite Virtues, he humbly throws himself at your Grace's Feet, and offers his Trophies to wait on your Triumphant Chariot: But when he presents his adored Rosamond to your Grace's Protection, he would fain flatter himself by resembling his Heroine to the Dutches of Albemarle; did he not know your Perfections to be above a Character, as your Example is above Imitation; since such Divine Qualities as your Grace's, cannot proceed from a less Fountain, or a greater then your own. The universal Adoration whereof, is that which gives me the presumption to stile my self

Madam,

Your Grace's most Humble,

most Obedient and most

Devoted Servant

J. Phillips.

PHARAMOND.

The first Part.

BOOK I.

That magnificent Empire, which for many Ages had been Mistress of the World, and which in the Reign of the great Theodosius did seem to be Reestablished in its Ancient Dignity, under the Government of his Children, began to suffer those Revolutions which all Tyrannical Sovereignties are subject to: for several of those Nations under its command, impatient of a Yoke, which had for so many years been imposed upon them, after they had for a long time bewailed themselves, and with continual sighs waited for their Liberty, so dear to all men, in the End gathered together all their Forces, and throughout most Parts of Europe covered the ground with Armed Souldiers. France, Spain, Italy and Germany, were the Stages, whereon the Interest of Nations were by the blood-thirsty Sword daily decided: but to the recovery of Liberty, other Provinces joyned their Powers; and 'twas only for Liberty, that a world of Souldiers of different Provinces and different Nations made the Banks of the River Rhine sound with Ecchos of their Martial Alarums, by Encamping in that great Plain, which it enriches with its clear and beautiful streams, from within the view of the proud Agrippina that famous City, to which the people (to blot out from amongst them all memories of the Roman greatness) had left no other name than that of Collen; even to the Banks of the River. All the Plain was to be seen covered with Men, Horses, Tents, Chariots, warlike Engins, which might render formidable the most Puissant Army; so that it seem'd to be that fatal Place where within few days the quarrel of several great Princes was to be determined at the price of one hundred thousand lives.

'Twas from one of these Camps that the Amorous Marcomire and the Valiant Genebaud sallied at the Head of one hundred Horse, to take knowledge of several Posts and Passes within the Plain: they took their way along the River, with design to visit before their return, those Parts which were most free. Mounted they were both on two beautiful Horses of the best Jennet-Race; and with so great a grace did their glorious Arms become them, and they their Arms, that it was impossible to be deceived in a true judgment of their incomparable Valour: Two Esquires bore behind them their Lances and Shields, known by the Ancient Device of their Illustrious Families. The fair Marcomire, whose mind was enflamed with an amorous passion, carried in his Eyes and in his Visage symptoms of his desires; but the Prince Genebaud, whose spirit was free and naturally jovial, endeavoured to entertain him with something of his pleasant humour, to divert those thoughts which perplexed his mind, and by degrees seemed to overwhelm him with a profound sadness.

No great distance were these two Princes from the Camp, for they might yet easily discover their Tents, when the Knights who attended them, gave them notice of five or six men on horseback, who at first marched along the River directly towards them; but upon discovery of them, had after a small stand quitted their course, and to avoid them were fallen off to the right hand: whereupon the two Princes thought it not convenient to let them pass without knowledge of them, both considering the Country they were in, the present occasions which could brook no neglect, and that the behaviour of those Cavaliers might very well render them suspected, and make them be adjudged rather enemies than of their party: They therefore commanded Gillon with a dozen or fifteen Knights with all speed to cut off their way, and in their names to stop them, if they would not make themselves known.

Gillon rides swiftly after them, and the two Princes followed in the same Road at a more gentle pace. These unknown persons might easily have avoided being overtaken by him, if they had been of the humour to believe that inequality of number could have permitted them in honour to flee from their pursuers; but they kept on their ordinary pace; and when he approached them, entertained him in such an undaunted manner, that they gave him the means more easily to observe them, and that not without some astonishment. They were two Knights attended by four Esquires, who carried their Lances and their Shields. Their Masters had before the approach of Gillon lifted up the Visers of their Helmets, which they scorned to pull down again, they gave him the liberty to behold their Visages, and to remark things in them, which though different in themselves, yet of force made him entertain some respect for them. One of the two seemed to be of the age of thirty years, the other not less than twenty five: the Countenance of the most aged seemed full of complacency, but such a complacency as was accompanied with a noble Air and Heroick Majesty. In the Face of the younger might be descried something much above all that was common; there appeared a kind of fierceness in his eyes, and in all his Actions somewhat of pride and haughtiness. The Arms of the elder were all plain, and wholly black; nor were those of the younger of any other colour, but enriched with so many pretious Stones, that from their Value the Dignity of the person that wore them might easily be judged.

Gillon having for some time with wonder regarded these two unknown persons, at length very roughly accosts them; and confident his power was above theirs by reason of the numbers that accompanied him, very imperiously commands them either to tell their names, and the design that had led them so near the Camp, or to march with him and give an account to that Prince who had given him order to detain them. The two Knights hearing this Summons of Gillon with disdain, look'd for some time upon one another, as if they would consult what answer to return; but the youngest (who was without doubt the most proud and most impatient) first broke silence. I know not (said he to his Friend) what is your intention; but I have been so little accustomed to obey, and have so little inclination to it, that I had rather hazard my Passage with my Sword in hand, than submit my self to those orders I have no reason to take notice of. I approve your intention: (answered his Friend) And though there may appear rashness in our design, my life is so little dear to me, that I will never counsel you to any Cowardize to preserve it.

In speaking these Words, they saw that Gillon and his men had drawn their Swords; whereupon they immediately did the like, and without taking their Lances from their Esquires, flew with such fury among their Enemies, that they soon made them believe that their inequality of number would hardly assure them of Victory. Their two first blows sent two men to the Earth, the one dead, the other rendred utterly incapable of farther damaging them; and with such fierceness did they handle the rest, that repentance quickly began to be the sequel of their rash enterprize: nevertheless Gillon being a valiant Combatant, animated his Companions both by his Voice and Example; but approaching somewhat too near him, who had his Armour wholly black, he received so weighty a blow upon his Crest, that it made him fall upon his Horse neck, quite dazled and astonished.

This Combat was not made so far distant from Marcomire and his Troop, but that they might plainly and distinctly discern all that passed; so that turning himself to the Prince Genebaud, Cousin (said he) you see that our men have found a resistance; and though we believed them the more strong in number, yet seem they now to have need of our assistance. At these words, without expecting an answer from Genebaud, accompanied by him, and followed by all the Troop, he put spurs to his horse, and galloped towards the place where this unequal Combat was maintained. In few minutes they arrived there, where the two Princes, though they were esteemed amongst the most Valiant, stood astonished to see that the Resistance which their men had found, proceeded only from two men, and two men who had not only defended themselves, but so valiantly maintained a Combat amongst such unequal numbers, that the one half remained dead or wounded under the power of their swords, and the rest despaired of Victory. The Prince Marcomire casting his eyes upon Gillon, who lay astonished upon his Saddle-bow, was (because of the esteem he had of his Valour) surprized with a Check, which had moved him to a present revenge, had not a sense of Honour, and considerations of the Disgrace would accrue by a Victory gained upon so great advantages, restrained him: he therefore not only hindered those that followed him to run to the revenge of their Companions, but by all the authority he had over them, commanded those who were already engaged in the Combat to retire; in which being obeyed, he with Genebaud advanced towards the two Strangers, who seeing them approach with their Vipers up, likewise pulled up theirs, either to receive them in the same manner as they perceived them to come in, or perhaps to refresh themselves, and breath more freely, after the great pains they had taken in to unequal a fight.

The two Princes Marcomire and Genebaud had conceived a great esteem for these two valiant Persons; but their anger for Gillon's misfortunes and the rest of his Companions, appeared in their eyes: which the impatient Marcomire could not dissemble. I know not (saies he, approaching them) what reason you can have to kill, or to think you may kill unpunished before our eyes these Persons which belong to us, and which had no order to offend you. The two Strangers stood for some time astonish'd at the Noble presence of the two Princes, and particularly at the Beauty of Marcomire, which was scarce to be parallel'd in the World; till one of them breaking silence, There is sufficient Reason (said he) that we should do our best against your men since you sent them to detain us: But (added his Companion, less patient than he) there is less reason that you should send to slay men, who neither owe you any thing, nor acknowledge your authority, or possibly any other in the World. If you knew (replied Marcomire, angered at this proud Answer) the Orders of War, you would not seem so much to wonder, since 'tis in a place where two Hostile Armies are incamped, and where every person may justly be suspected, that we have used this strictness. You are yet too young (replied the Eldest of the two Strangers, with a fierce countenance) to teach us the Rules of War, who perhaps have taught them to persons that understand them better than your selves. If it be so (said the youngest Prince, moved with this Answer) I shall account my self happy to satisfy so great a Captain for the injury he hath received from a young man, and shall much satisfy my self to make use of my sword against so great a Master. At these words, turning towards those of his Troop, he commanded them to retire towards the Camp, not being willing that their presence should cause any suspicion in the Strangers: and seeing that they shewed some unwillingness to leave him, he commanded them with so much authority, that they durst no longer resist his will; and carrying Gillon along with them they departed from the two Princes, though with a seeming discontent.

They only kept with them four Esquires, seeing that their Enemies had an equal number; and receiving from them their Lances and Shields, they might perceive their Enemies do the like: and at the same time these four Valiant Persons turned their Horses to take their Career in a Place where the Beauty and Evenness of the Plain gave them an intire liberty.

Marcomire being particularly incensed against him who bore the black Arms without any embellishment, for those words which had passed between them, address'd himself to him, and the Valiant Genebaud run against his Companion. They parted both the one and the other with the best grace in the World; and having pass'd with an admirable swiftness the space between them, they encountred with so much fury, that it could not be compared to any thing but Thunder, or something more terrible: Their Lances, though they were of the strongest, broke into a thousand pieces against their Shields: but with a success a little different, Marcomire and his Enemy received equally the two puissant strokes, without being moved from their Saddles; but their Horses were astonish'd in such sort by the terrible shock, that their croupers touched the ground; nor were they able to recover, but with a great deal of pain, and assisted by the skilful strength and Agility of their Masters. The Course of Genebaud and the Stranger, whom he undertook, was finish'd in another manner; the Horse of the Stranger being more feeble than that of Genebaud, or wearied by his long Voyage, was not able to sustain the stroke given by the young Prince, without falling quite along upon the ground: but Genebaud was so terribly shaken with the Strangers Lance, that having staggered a little while, he was forced with his Enemy to measure his length upon the Earth: they got up both the one and the other with an equal anger, (but the Stranger being naturally proud, had this consolation, that his mischance happened not through his, but his Horses default) and covering themselves with their Shields, they charged one another with an equal courage, and began a Combat on foot, worthy each others Valour. The Prowess of the other Stranger and Marcomire deserved a more gallant Testimony than the number of the present Spectators could afford: they were not contented with their swords in their hands; which they laid on with such fury, as demonstrated them to be Persons courageous in the Highest Degree: Marcomire being enraged, and his Enemy having little respect of his Life, they exchanged two such blows, as puissance and strength could possibly enable men to give: If they understood the Art to cover themselves with their Shields, they understood no less to strike; and maugre the goodness of their Arms, their swords forced the blood to gush out both from the one and the other; their Horses which might compare with the best in the World, served their Masters with a nimbleness unexpressible; only Marcomire's was stronger than his Enemy's, which made him hope he would the longer and better hold out. Genebaud and the other Stranger covering themselves with their Shields, maintained a most gallant Combat on foot, both violently labouring for the Victory; but the strength of Genebaud seemed to be somewhat inferior to that of his Enemy, so that an easy judgment might have been given to which side the Victory would incline, had the fight continued overlong.

However, the Combat seemed yet doubtful between these four Valiant Personages: and the Squires not daring to help their Masters, though they earnestly desired it, stood by, and beheld this furious fight with an infinite trouble and disquiet of mind. At length some of them casting their eyes towards the Camp, from whence Marcomire and Genebaud first came, they might espy a great number of Cavalry, which posted toward them: The nearer this object approached, they the more fully discerned it, the day being clear; and the Sun darting his Rays upon the well-Polished Armour of this gallant Troop, cast a splendour sufficient to dazzle mens eyes; yet not so great, but that they might easily discern their approach, and the two Strangers observe that the whole Troop was composed of a number of Persons of high and magnificent appearance.

But though the whole Body was great and stately, there Marched one in the Head of it who seemed to draw, or rather command all their Observances. His stature, which by a great deal exceeded that of common men, made him seem goodly, seated even beyond admiration within his Saddle, wherein he sat with so much freedom that it gave him the greatest grace in the World: His Cuirass, which seemed to be of burnished Gold, was enriched with many little Figures, which by the mixture of Gold with Enamel, represented the Story of his famous Progenitors: his thin plated Armour (unfit for War) of the same matter and workmanship, falling from his shoulders covered him to the knee, only held by two buckles of Lions enriched all over with Stones of an unimaginable value; over which he was enrobed with a Garment of Tissue, Silk and Pearls, the diversity of colours, and the Artifice of whose workmanship paralleld that of his Arms: his Leg from the Calf to the Foot was covered with an Embroidery which was stained with a Buckle of Gold, and Enamel like to that on his shoulder, and charged with Plates of Gold and Enamel, which fastned it to his Leg, at certain distances, over a Tissue like to that of his Helmet: his fair and rich Sword did hang by a Chain of Gold, which by two Buckles made like the other, came down from before and behind his Cuirass; it seemed that an Esquire carried after him his Helmet which he made use of in fight: his Head being at present covered with nothing but a small Morion, after the Greek fashion, not useful for War, yet shining like his Cuirass with Gold, Enamel and pretious Stones; he carried for his Device on the fore-part of it, a Lion fighting against an Eagle, and the hinder part was covered with various Plumes of different colours, all agreeing with those of his Arms and his loose Robe. By reason of this small Cap on his Head, his Visage seemed wholly uncovered, and in that as well as in all his Person, he seemed to be the man in whom Nature had employed all her skill to form an excellency of Body to accompany a greatness of Mind; all his Features were made of a just proportion, and his Eyes, though sparkling like two Stars, and glistering with a Martial brightness, yet discovered in them something so pleasing, that from thence 'twas easie to judge the natural complacency of his Soul. The Deportment of his Person was attended with the same sweetness, yet mixed with somewhat that was to be discerned so great, so elevated, and so worthy a Royal Character, that it was impossible for any that saw him, to defend themselves from a Charm, which would force them love him; or from a respect which would make them regard him as the only Personage fit to command other men. His Hair, the nearest to black, courted his shoulders in delicate curls with an infinite Grace, and fell down to such a length, that it seemed extraordinary to those who had only been acquainted with the Romans, and had not known the Habits of other Nations.

This Noble Personage of so accomplished a form, was mounted upon a Horse, whose whiteness might outvie the purest Snow upon the frozen Alps, of a height so advantageous, and so proudly prancing, that in his bounding he seemed to express the pride he had to carry so great a Master; all his Harness fairly and richly Embroyder'd, accompanied the Beauty of his Riders Array, his Bit and his Stirrups being of the same workmanship with his Cuirass. Several Esquires carried after their Master a Helmet purposely fitted for the War, together with his Lance and his Shield, (equally rich with the rest of his Armour) on which was emblazoned three Diadems Or, in a Field Gules. He was accompanied with a great many others of particular remark, if his presence had not eclipsed their glory, and drawn all eyes to wonder at him.

No sooner was he arrived at the place where the furious Combat was deciding, but after having beheld them a small moment of time, putting spurs to his Horse, he rode between Marcomire and the Stranger against whom he fought, whilst some other of his Troops by his order did the same between Genebaud and his Enemy. Wherefore valiant men (said he) will you thus destroy your selves without being Enemies? Are your lives then of so little importance, that you sacrifice them to a light formality? Is it for Empire? Is it for Liberty? Or is it for a Mistress that you contend? In speaking these words, he threw himself between them; and Marcomire no sooner saw him appear, but he retired a good distance: his Enemy likewise did the like, as well moved by his Example, as by the consideration he had of a Personage of so magnificent a presence. And because his Face was uncovered, he took the advantage, being chafed in the fight, to lift up his Viser to refresh himself; and breath with more liberty. There was somewhat more trouble on the other side: for though Genebaud did retire at the sight of those Persons, which went towards him, yet his Enemy being naturally proud, and believing that he owed no obedience to those who would hinder him from executing his Resolutions, would not be intricated to quit the Combat, had not Genebaud, who was in truth too weak for him, yielded him the Honour.

Being parted, the Stranger spied his Horse in the hands of one of his Esquires, and mounting upon him, approached his Companion, Genebaud likewise doing the like; when the whole Company throng'd about them, and made a circle consisting of many Great and Illustrious Personages.

The Stranger who had fought with Marcomire, for some time beheld with Admiration the Person of him who had parted them, as if he had been considering with himself, that though he had passed his life among the principal Persons, and in the chiefest Courts of the World; yet he never saw any that might equalize him in all points. In the mean time, the Person whom he admired had fixed his eyes upon him, with a great astonishment at his Noble Carriage, and that of his Companion; (who fierce as he was, yet could not hinder himself from being beheld with some surprize) and approaching them with a Grace which was wholly particular to himself: As I must needs judge by a Multitude of Evidences (said he) that you are no common Persons, I cannot but think my self obliged to make an excuse for the displeasure you have received in a place where I pretend to some Power and Command; and tell you, that those who have practised the ordinary Formalities of War with you would not have committed that fault, had they known you better: but they have sufficiently suffered for the proof they have made of your Valour; Yet is not your quarrel so considerable, as to nourish an Enmity between us and you, or to hinder you from receiving from us all that service, and all that assistance, which Strangers like your selves can hope or expect from Persons who understand how to respect Virtue.

The two Strangers, who were surpris'd with his generosity, had not been behind him in civility; but whilst the fierceness of the youngest began to abate by his Noble procedure, and the other naturally full of wisdom and sweetness did prepare to return him Answer suitable to his Generosity, his Visage, which was marked by all the Company, was known by Antenor and Dagobert, two of the most considerable of the Troop; and no sooner were they satisfied in their opinion who he was, but running passionately towards him; O Sir (said they, bowing themselves to him with an action full of respect) our General and our great Captain, have the Gods again permitted us to see you? These words were listned to, by the whole Company, with an infinite admiration, till Antenor turning himself towards that Noble Personage who commanded this Gallant Troop; Sir, (said he) pardon our unhappy fury, and please to understand, that it is not without reason that you have had a respect for this Illustrious Stranger, since in his Person you behold that of the Great Constance, that destroyer of Tyrants, and valiant upholder of the Roman Empire. Antenor had scarce spoke these words, but some discontent seemed to appear in his Face, which testified to him who spake them, that he was displeas'd within himself, that he had discovered himself.

That Generous Person had listned to his words with some surprize, which had obliged him to some moments of silence, but he soon broke it with a Deportment truly Noble.

Be not you troubled, Antenor (said he) that you have made us know the Great Constance, but believe that all our differences with the Romans, shall not hinder us from giving that respect to the virtue of so great a Person, which all the World owe him, or which he might hope from his most faithful Friends. And at these words approaching nearer to Constance, with an Action full of Civility and Gallantry: Great Sir, (said he) do not at all regard those as Enemies of your Nation, who cannot be so of Virtue; and though we have fought against the Romans in defence of our Liberty, yet do not believe that you shall find among them more respect and more service than you shall among Persons who have for a long time been honourers of your far-famed Glories.

If the Romans (replied Constance) are so unfortunate, as to have many Enemies like you, I shall fear their Empire will be much endangered; but when I should be less obliged to that Noble Entertainment you give me, I see in you things so great, and so little common, that no Interest of Nations whatsoever can be capable to render me your Enemy: but if you can pardon the curiosity of a Person, who in the estate he at present is, hath no reason to demand, please you to let me know to whom I am obliged, for so noble and generous proceeding. My name is Pharamond (answered the Prince) and I am——

'Tis enough (said Constance, interrupting him) by the name of Pharamond, you tell me all things, yet possibly nothing more than I knew before: for to be what you appear to our eyes, 'tis necessary that you must be Pharamond, whose renown the World publishes amongst its greatest wonders. That Renown (Pharamond modestly replied) has been too partially favourable in the Recital of our Actions; but I shall be sufficiently obliged to it, if it has given me any place in your esteem, and that I can hope that you and your Companion will not refuse to take here some few days of Repose, and suffer those wounds to be dressed, which by the blood upon your Armour I guess you to have received. It will be very hard (replied the Illustrious Roman, with a sigh from the bottom of his heart) to find repose for a man so wholly miserable, and whom Fortune prosecutes with all her cruelty; to whom the hurts of the Body are little considerable, whilst his Mind bleeds with a more incurable and mortal Wound: yet I would willingly accept your offer, both because I would not give you occasion to believe I refused it out of the Interest of our Nations, and likewise to testify the value I have for a Prince, whose great actions have created within me an esteem of him, and whose Person and generous carriage makes me desire his friendship; if in this deplorable estate of my life, I could covet any thing but death alone. Death (replied the Prince) without doubt, is not at all dreadful to him who has braved it upon so many occasions: but a life so Illustrious, and so important as yours, makes the whole World concern'd in its conservation, and will find defenders amongst the greatest enemies of the Empire.

To these words Pharamond added many more, the most obliging in the World, with a grace which was natural to him; and longer had he continued professing that civility he thought owing to the Great Constance, if he had not believed that he ought to pay some part to his Companion; judging by several Evidences, as well as by the respect that Constance bore him, that he was of an Illustrious Parentage. He address'd himself therefore to him, with a charming sweetness; and after having made an excuse, that the unexpected knowledge of Constance had made him stay so long from him. He made the same offers to him, that he had done to his Companion; intreating him with all imaginable courtelie, to give him the means by some few days of stay, to make satisfaction for the Injury he had received.

The whole Person of Pharamond was of so excellent a composition, and his Words and his Actions had something in them so Great and so Noble, that it was very difficult to deny him reverence. And though the Stranger was naturally of that proud nature, that made him look upon all men as his inferiours, yet could he not refuse to give to this Famous Prince of the Frankes all that civility his great reputation or presence could require from him; beholding him with a Carriage that plainly shew'd that his Natural Inclination was compelled to yield to the merit of Pharamond. I demand not (said he) any satisfaction for an Adventure, in which I believe I have satisfied my self; yet nothing should hinder me from agreeing to the civility and merit of so Noble a Prince, the same that you have obtained from Constance, if I had the same occasion, and the same Liberty that he hath; but I am neither wounded, nor can I yield to some occasions, which for several weighty reasons do for some days call me hence. Will you then (said Constance, interrupting him) part so soon from me, without having acquitted the promise you made me? I shall see you again within few days (replied the Stranger) in the mean time I leave you Mitrane, (shewing him one of his Esquires) who can, as well as my self, satisfy your desires and my word: yet I hope to return before you are cured of your wounds. I am very sorry (said the Famous King of the Frankes)

Frankes) that we cannot stay you here, with your Illustrious Companion: however, seeing you are to pass through a Country, where the bruit of War causes nothing but confusion and disorder, if you will any way command my service in your occasions, you shall dispose of all things, and have power to order whatever shall be necessary, for the security of your Voyage. I am out of countenance for the Obligations which you lay upon me (replied the Stranger) and shall ere long return back to give you thanks, and to find Constance, whom I would never leave wounded as he is, but in your hands.

At these words he embraced Constance, and took leave of Pharamond, who forced him to accept of a hundred Horse, which conveyed him till they thought him past all danger of both Armies. All the Company seemed somewhat displeas'd at the Carriage of the Stranger: but Pharamond, whose spirit had been accustom'd to overcome with sweetness the fiercest Minds, seem'd no way discontented; for besides that he judg'd, by the respect Constance bore him, that he was of an Extract equal to the Greatest, he did perceive marks of Grandeur in all his Person; which made him give him that respect, fit for a Person of the highest Dignity.

In the mean time, the Generous Constance and the Valiant Marcomire, having changed all their Enmity into a high Esteem of each other, embraced one another with all the Tokens, not only of a true Reconciliation, but inseparable Friendship. The young Prince, notwithstanding his great Eminency, both by reason of his Birth, and the glory of his Actions, out of respect to the high Renown of the Illustrious Constance, endeavour'd to excuse all that had pass'd, in terms full of civility and submission. And the famous Roman, knowing him for the Brother of the great Pharamond, and a Prince whose merit he had often heard published, returned Answers to his civil Expressions, with a gallantry becoming his virtuous Mind; telling him, that among great and noble souls, couragious Acts leave less place for resentment than esteem. I am then pardonable (returned the young Prince) that have adventured to fight with so great a Master, and have by doing it acquired so much glory, that I must again ask your pardon, if I cannot repent me of it. You may (replied Constance) teach the whole World, that which you practise with so admirable a Valour; and you have, without doubt, acquired sufficient glory in the Combat, by destroying me of that, which in so many years of War, and several happy Actions, Fortune hath been pleas'd to throw upon me.

Marcomire answer'd with a Blush, to this modest discourse of Constance, and withal presented to him Geneband, who for his Noble Mind, and for the proof of his Valour upon this occasion, he received with infinite marks of Esteem. After him, the most considerable Persons of the gallant Troop came to salute him; and Pharamond presented to his knowledge the young Prince Sunnon, his Brother, the Renowned Priam, Antenor, Pharabert, Dagobert and Nicanor, all Illustrious Princes of his Blood-Royal: The Sage Berber, and the Valiant Rithimer, chief of the Gauls, who fought for his Interest; Heribert chief of Islanders of Gallia Belgica; Sigeric, Prince of the Celtiberians; Cledosile, Prince of the Bruderes; Theodomir Prince of the Angrivariens; with many other chief of other Nations of Franconia, and with them the famous Charamont, Richer, Diocles, Merovee, Basogaste, Salagaste, Gastalde, Harold, Adelard, with many other Illustrious Personages, whose Reputations were sufficiently known, in the shares they had in the famous Victories of their King and Sovereign.

This Noble Company arriv'd at the Camp, and pass'd by a number of Tents (which form'd as it were a new City, on the Banks of the River) to the Princes Quarter; which was a Castle elevated upon a Mount, which seem'd to command all the Plain, conveniently situated, both for the view of distant places, and to prevent disorders in the Army: and the Lodgings within, were all most beautiful and commodious. After Pharamond had conducted Constance into his Apartment, he saw him disarm'd, in his presence; and though Constance would scarcely permit it, would see him likewise laid in his Bed, and attended the dressing of a wound which he had on his right shoulder; which was not of so great importance, that any danger could be imagin'd from it: yet was it not so little, as not to oblige him to some days repose. Constance suffer'd, and with infinite resentment acknowledg'd the noble entertainment that Pharamond gave him; but it might easily be judg'd by his Action, that it was for the desire, to please a Prince who deserv'dly merited this Complacency, rather than out of any love to his own life. Marcomire and Geneband, who were likewise wounded, were gone to have their wounds dress'd, though they were but very slight; and all the other Princes and Chieftains of the Army, were retir'd to leave Constance to that repose, which was adjudg'd necessary for him: Pharamond only kept him company at Dinner, which he caus'd to be serv'd on his Bed; and after having desired him, that according to the counsel of his Physicians, he would betake himself to some few hours repose, he retired to his Apartment, to put off his Arms, and provide for those Affairs which the charge of an Army and the troubles of the War had incumbered him withal.

that

That grief, which for so many days had overswayed his spirit, and forcibly driven all quiet from his mind, now again possessed him, though he was constrained in such Rancounters as this of Constance, to resist his passion, and adjourn his sorrow to his solitudes. By Fortune the Windows of his Chamber being open, by which he discovered Colien, and the great Channel of the River, and with a beautiful Prospect might behold about two hundred furlongs of the Plain; he cast his eyes, as he often used to do, towards the Coast of Segre, and there beheld on the side of the River, the smoke and fire of his Enemies Camp, and looked upon their Tents, which the distance permitted him not to mark without confusion. This sight drew many sighs from his Breast, and rendered him altogether different from what he had but even now appeared to Constance: yet it was not the power of his Enemies, had they been far more formidable, could have raised this commotion in his spirit; his courage was too great, and his mind too warlike, to be daunted by any dangers, since he had a hundred and a hundred times braved the greatest danger that Death it self could threaten. But he was assailed by a passion, against which all his force and courage was not available; and at the head of this World of Enemies, which he disdain'd, he was compelled to yield to an Enemy that had vanquished him, and maugre all his power, had given him a mortal wound within his bosom, which made him die every hour of his life. It was towards the quarter of this implacable Enemy that he for a long time held his eyes fixed, without stirring from the Window on which he leaned; and having found out that which he sought after amongst the rest of the Tents that environ'd it.

Ab! (said he, with a gesture deserving compassion) see, there sojourns that cruel one; yonder is the place where no pity can find an entrance: yonder is the place from whence bloody orders are given, and bloody commands are issued forth against my unfortunate life; whilst my afflicted heart religiously adores those fair lips, from whence they are pronounced. He made a stop for some time, at these first words; and soon after shutting the Window, and walking up and down the Chamber: But wherefore (added he) thou deplorable Lover, thou despairing Lover; wherefore dost thou defend with so much travel, and with so much blood, a life which thou neither canst nor dost love? Since 'tis detested by thy pitiless Rosamond, why dost thou for its preservation, guard thy self with so many thousands of men as now environ thee, and for it sacrificest so many other lives, without doubt much less unfortunate than thine? Oh Pharamond! desolate Pharamond, cease longer to oppose thy self to the vote of Heaven, and to the pleasure of thy Princess; since it is her pleasure that thou shouldst die, die at least to satisfy her will; and in that action thou shalt be more fortunate than in all the rest of thy life: die to redeem thy self from so many ills, as thy unhappy life must needs throw upon thee: Die to deliver so many Friends, that have interrested themselves in thy quarrel; and to give thy desolate Country, the best part of the Earth, that eternal obstacle of Peace and Repose; which they have so long thirsted after: That promise with which the Gods flattered thy ambition, before a stronger passion was made Mistress of thy mind, may as well be accomplished in the person of Marcomire, as in thine; he equalizes thee in Courage and Valour, hath the same right with thee to the Conquest of the Gauls, and under his Conduci, as well as thine, may these People pass the Rhine, and place upon their heads the Crown of that lofty Monarchy, which so many years since the Heavens promised to our Posterity. It seem'd that the spirit of Pharamond found some repose in this proposal; but not long after, he disavow'd it. I could well consent (said he) to the glory of Marcomire, and could consent more willingly to the Death of Pharamond; but I cannot consent to the felicity of my Rivals: and since only by my death, they can possess themselves of Rosamond, I will dispute it with them even to the last drop of my blood; though she be void of compassion, and though she ardently desires my Ruine, yet she desires it should come by some other hand than my own: and since she her self must be the price of my Conquest or fall, I will never abandon that noble price to my cruel Enemies, nor yield my heart to the Swords of Gondioch, Ardaric, Godegefile, or Balamir, thereby to give them the possession of Rosamond. It will do better (added he with a new fury, and with a voice denoting some cholera) to throw these evils upon the heads of our Enemies; which they threaten upon ours: I wear a Sword by my side, which some of them shall feel; and they already understand, more than one of them have by its fury been forced to kiss the Earth.

In the midst of these thoughts full of irresolution and confusion, he discovered entering into his Chamber, the young Prince Sumnon, the valiant Ibere, Antenor, Charamont, Kithiner, and many others; either Princes or Chieftains of the Army. He endeavour'd to compose his Countenance at their arrival, and to banish from himself all thoughts of that sadness, fadness, in which he knew they would interest themselves; but he could not so hide his grief, but there appeared sufficient to afflict them at the sight of it: which made Charamont, addressing himself to him, with a liberty which long custom and his great services had acquired: And why, Great Prince, (said he) will you abandon your self to sadness? And will you alone be the only Person that shall weaken your courage? Ah Charamont! (replied the King) I am in a condition, that my courage is not less favourable to me than it is cruel; and I should have been much less unhappy, if I had long since delivered my self over to despair; for in the end (continued he, walking among his Illustrious Friends) What life is that I have of late years led amongst you? And what reasons have you to stop that fatal end, which a legitimate grief hath a hundred times prompted me to accomplish? It is true (replied Charamont) that this sorrowful life, which you lead, is but the contriver of that death, which you have so long desired; but 'tis not of such a life as this that we desire the continuation, but much rather the change; which if you would do by a force worthy the Grandeur of your soul, and that of your Actions—

'Tis enough, dear Friend, (said the King, interrupting him) render not more than what you have already said unprofitable, for I know that neither my Inclinations nor Destiny it self can alter me.

At these words changing the Discourse, he turned himself to Antenor and Rithimer, and demanded of them the Effect of certain Orders he had given them, for the Army: and after they had satisfied him with an account thereof he commanded his Brother Sunnon to send several Troops divers ways towards the Coast of Segre, to observe the countenance of the Enemies, and secure the Camp from surprizes; and having likewise given other Commissions to Nicanor and Diocles, for the lodging of several Troops, and for certain Convoys of Victuals, he sent to enquire after the health of Constance; when at the same time, one of his Equires came to tell him, that he was sent to demand the same of him, so soon as he awaked from a peaceable repose, which he had taken ever since Pharamond's departure from his Chamber. And having told the King that he might without inconvenience visit him, he without farther delay went to his Apartment, with design to enter with Constance into a more particular converse than he had hitherto done.

These two great Personages, as well from the effects of their Renown, as for what they discerned in each other, in that little time they had been together, had conceived a marvellous esteem one of another: and that esteem was accompanied with an affection, to which their souls had without any repugnance guided them. After the first words of civility, Pharamond sitting very near the Bed of Constance, espied in his countenance, all the signs of a cruel grief; and remembering at the same time, some words he had heard him let fall of the little love he had for his life, he began to judge him an Honourable Companion in his misfortunes: Constance likewise discerned the same in the countenance of Pharamond, though he more endeavoured to dissemble his grief, especially before a man to whom he resolved to give the greatest Honours possible.

They were neither of them wholly ignorant of each others Fortune; as having understood that which Fame had confusedly blown abroad, through all corners of the Earth; but the particulars were wholly unknown to them, both by reason of the little means they had to learn them, and the little interest they had before now one with the other. They look'd upon one another with the same thoughts concerning this subject, till Pharamond with a demeanour full of charming sweetness, thus first brook silence.

My Lord (said he) I should esteem my self thrice happy for the honour we have to enjoy you, you, whom the whole World speaks of with veneration, if I did not attribute this Remembrance to something displeasing to you: For besides those too apparent marks of sadness upon your countenance, and some Discourses which we have heard from your own mouth, the state and the equipage in which we have encountered you, was so little conformable to the fortune of the great Constance, who was wont not to be seen, but in the Head of Puissant Armies, or in the chief place of the most Illustrious Courts of the Universe, that we must needs judge Fortune hath in some strange manner abused you, or that some weighty reasons have constrained you to pass thus alone through Provinces, where though your name be not unknown, yet your Person is. True it is, I am not wholly ignorant of your misfortunes, and have often heard speak of the interest you had in the Sack of Rome, and those other mischiefs which the Empire hath of late years groan'd under: But in the end I have always believ'd that the Illustrious Constance, famous for so many great Victories, Conqueror of the Alani, Gepides and Vandals in Spain; of Constantine, Jovinian and Attalus among the Gauls, and the only man, in whose hand the very destiny of the Western Empire seems at this day reposed: should be made partaker of those evils, and be forced to struggle with those misfortunes which would overwhelm other men, though they cannot work the same effect upon the great Constance.

The famous Roman sigh'd at this discourse of Pharamond; and beholding him with a deportment wholly passionate, Mighty Prince (said he) I should not at all think what you have said strange, did it proceed from a man, who like you had not made proof of good and bad Fortune, or less strange from one who had not understood, that it is not the Nobility of our Extraction, that can preserve us happy among men, nor the glory of our great Actions, that can establish our felicity; but that we have certain passions, which swayed by good or ill success, do most of all contribute to the happiness or unhappiness of our life. I understand by a confused report, like to that which may be come to you of my miseries and adventures, that you your self have not been exempt; and I believe that your great Victories against the Romans, against the Sueves, and against the Cimbrians, though they have blazon'd forth your glory, and made your name be known throughout the World, have not established you a true repose, nor render'd your life happy, though they may have made it glorious.

As the Mischiefs of my life are without Example (replied Prince Pharamond) and that I am unfortunate a degree beyond misfortune, wholly prodigious and unheard of; so I protest I have never by my own miseries given judgment of other mens: yet I doubt not but yours are great and extraordinary, since they could produce so great an effect, as I have spi'd in you, on a mind so well resolv'd. They are such (answered the afflicted Constance) that I can neither hope for remedy nor consolation; and if I had not some force of courage, by which it is permitted me to flatter my self after all the proofs I have made, I had without doubt long since fallen under those evils, which it is impossible for humane strength to bear. I dare assure you (replied the Prince of the Franks) that mine are of that Nature, as not only to cause pity, but to astonish all such as can but be sensible of them. The interest I have in yours, makes me desire to know them particularly, except you have some reason to keep them concealed: and if you have any desire to hear the Story of my sad Adventures, I shall when you please make the recital: I shall not desire it from your own mouth (replied Constance) not doubting, but your modesty will make you pass over those great Actions, which I would have related in all their beauty; but if you have any one near you that is well instructed in the course of your Fortunes. I shall be oblig'd, if you will please to give him commission: And in requital, I shall recount you all my life, even to the least circumstances; or if you will treat me as I treat you; not for the same reason, but to avoid that grief with which the relation of several passages must necessarily afflict me; Valerius (continued he, shewing him one of his Esquires) can give you the same satisfaction with my self, since hitherto he hath not been ignorant so much as of my thoughts. I am content with what you please (replied the Prince) and since you have commissioned Valerius to do me this pleasing office, to morrow Cleomer, to whom all the secrets of my heart are common as to my self, shall come at what hour you please, to render you an account of the chief particulars of my life.

Constance consented to the proposition of Pharamond, and soon after Supper was brought in, during the repast Pharamond spi'd among the Squires of Constance, him whom his Companion had left behind him; and having for a time beheld him as a man worthy some respect: Shall I not be too curious, said he, if I demand of you the name of that valiant man, which we found with you? Nor shall you need to pardon the curiosity of my opinion, if I tell you I conceived him by several Marks, to be a Personage of extraordinary merit, and most illustrious Extraction. Constance at this discourse cast his eyes upon Mirrane; and not observing any thing in his countenance, which might hinder him the liberty of performing the desire of the Prince, My Companion (said he) having not at all enjoynd me not to disclose his name, and I believing that he hath no intent to hide it from you; I shall make little difficulty to tell it you, and withal that you are not at all deceived in the judgment you have made, both of the merit of the Person, and his high Rank in the World: his valour, of which you have seen some Evidences, is accompanied (by so much as I can judge in the small time of our converse) with all those qualities which can make a person truly great: and for his Birth, it is such, that there is scarce a Person in the World of equal dignity with him, since this is Varanes only Son, and sole Heir of Isdigerdes King of Persia and Parthia, who alone for his greatness counterbalances the power of our Emperours. How! (said Pharamond) is he Son of the great King Isdigerdes, whom the Emperour Arcadius dying, did declare Tutor to the young Emperour Theodosius his Son; and who in the Education of that Prince, acquitted himself with the fidelity he owed to the Memory of the Father? 'Tis of him (replied Constance) that the Prince Varanes is Son and sole Heir, and after his death, will possess that magnificent Monarchy, which was taken by the Parthians from the Persians, after the death of Alexander; but after some few Ages regained by the Persians, and is now in its greatest splendor. I am very sorry (added Pharamond) that I have not rendered that respect that I ought to the dignity of so great a Prince; but if he repasses here, as he hath made you hope, I shall ask pardon for that fault, and endeavour to repair it if possible. Mitrane, who was a Person of Quality among the Persians, made bold to speak in his Masters behalf, Sir, (said he to the King of the Franks) I assure my self that the Prince Varanes is very well satisfied with the Entertainment you gave him, and that he will without doubt soon be here to testify the esteem that he hath conceived for so great a Prince.
that

After other some discourse passed, Pharamond gave the good night to Constance: but in going forth of the Chamber, he led Valerius along with him; not being willing to suffer any longer delay, and being accustomed of a long time to spare but few hours of the Night for sleep. Valerius was a Person of a noble and virtuous mind; and Pharamond had but very few Minutes entertained him, yet he judged him sufficiently able to perform his Master's commission, or any other business of importance: but he first acquainted Pharamond, that the Discourse could not but be very long, and therefore unfit for that season; However he intreated him that he would that night begin the Story of his Master's Life, and continue it the day following. Valerius disposed himself to obey; and Pharamond having forced him to sit down, not consenting that he should speak so long standing, composed himself likewise to give a peaceable attention: and soon after he began, in these words.

The History of Constance.

BY obliging my self (most Noble Prince) according to the command of my Master, to tell you the Story of his Life; I am engaged likewise to relate the History of a great part of the world, and particularly all those things which have passed within the Western Empire. The Adventures of Constance being so weaved with all the generous and important events which have happened, and his particular interests so mingled with those of the Empire, that it is difficult to separate the discourse of them; at least if I will give your Majesty an entire Knowledge, and such as you desire of my Master.

Flavius Constance, Father of him whom I have the honour to serve, was in Illyria, where his Father had a command as a banished Governour of that Province by the Emperours, Enemies to their great House: For most certain it is, that they were not only Romans, but that they were of the same Family, and the same Name with the great Emperour Constantine, and many other Emperours of their Blood, who bore the Name of Flavians, as hath been continually observed, both by those of the name of Constantine, Constantius or Constance, and likewise by those in Illyria.

'Twas the splendour of this Illustrious Family, that made the Emperour Jovian, fearful of their greatness, command them thither from Rome: and by fortune they to whom the Command was given, being men of peaceable and quiet minds, established themselves in that Province and Government, without parting thence, till such time that Constance Father of my Master, had permission from the great Emperour Theodosius to come to Rome, and there inhabit with his Family, if not with all the glory befitting one of that House from whence so many great Emperours were descended, yet at least in an estate not to envy the noblest Romans.

The great Theodosius, of illustrious and glorious memory, a Prince comparable in all things to the mightiest Cæsars, seeing himself so firmly seated in his Empire, both by his great Actions, and by the love of his People, did not at all fear the return and glory of that Family, which in truth, and to all mens judgments, could not at all disturb that happy Government which he had strengthened with such infinite goodness; he therefore himself would that Constance should be honoured with the Consular Dignity.

My Master was born during his Father's Consulship, near the time of the Birth of Honorius the youngest Son of Theodosius, and he that at this day governs the Empire of the West. Arcadius was born ten years before: and the Princess Placidia their Sister, the Fame of whose Beauty and Virtue hath filled all Europe, was born six years after Honorius. The young Constance in his youthful years began to make known his Noble inclinations, and to give to his Parents those hopes which made them flatter themselves with his future greatness. One day playing in a Garden with other Children of his Age, and in the presence of his Father, an Eagle flying from above, let fall a Lawrel folded into the form of a Crown, upon the Head of this young Noble, hovering for some time over him, as if sent on purpose to Crown him, His Father, though little inclined to superstitious prejudices, to which the Romans were ever much addicted, yet could not but entertain this happy accident with an infinite joy, and a belief that though it did not predict to his Son the supreme Dignity, yet at least it promised much Glory and many Triumphs. And to second the fair hopes which he had of his Son's greatness, he caused him to be educated with all requisite diligence, and endeavoured to form his Body and Mind to those Exercises which befit his high Birth and Quality, that so he might leave nothing neglected which might perfect so Noble a Nature, and make the young Constance both for Endowments of Body and Mind, the most accomplish'd Person of the Empire.

He was not above nine years old, when the Emperour commanded that he should be brought up with the young Prince Honorius, together with divers others of his Age, Children of the most Illustrious Families of Rome; amongst whom Euchere the Son of Stilicon seem'd the chief, by reason of the great Authority of his Father. The most remote corners of the World are scarce ignorant of the Name and Puissance of Stilicon, as well for his Actions, which truly have given him some recommendation of Justice amongst men, as for that prodigious greatness to which Fortune had mounted him, he being look'd upon, to the very last day of his life, not only as the Parent and Father-in-law of the Emperour, but as absolute Master of the Empire of the West, in which it might truly be said, he ruled not as Favourite, but as real Emperour, and sole and supreme Commander. Though he was a Vandal by Nation, yet he was signally gallant in all great occasions, which made him renown'd as well for his Valour in Arms, as for his capacity to manage the most difficult Affairs of State: for Theodosius had often employ'd him, and finding him capable of the greatest things, had rais'd him from degree to degree, to the highest Dignities; and to oblige him to his Service, and that of his House, disdain'd not to make him espouse the Princess Serene his Brother's Daughter, and to give him the chief place in his Bosom, and in the management of his Affairs. It is true, that the Fortune of Ruffinus was not much inferiour to his, but Ruffinus was not adorned with all those Noble Qualities which graced the Person of Stilicon, though he was not much inferiour to him in address and policy. I make this particular mention of these two Persons, and more particularly of Stilicon, because the whole Command of the Empire lay in their hands.

My young Master had but few Months accompanied the Prince Honorius, but that the Empire, and the whole World, underwent the greatest loss they could possibly suffer, by the death of the great Theodosius. This Prince, the Delight and Glory of the World, that might justly vaunt to have sat on the Imperial Throne of the Cæsar's, with as much Honour and Renown as any of his Predecessors; who in Valour, Goodness, Justice, Piety, and all other excellent Virtues equaliz'd, if not exceeded all his Famous Ancestors, by his Death gave a new Face to the whole World, as you may easily judge by those strange Revolutions which have since happened, which were not so much as feared or thought of during his glorious Reign; before his death, he parted the Empire to his two Sons, dividing it into the Eastern and Western Empires: and because Arcadius was twenty years old, and Honorius but ten, he appointed the prudence of Stilicon as a stay to his young years, and to him he committed the Tutelage of his Son, and the Government of the Western Empire; and to Arcadius he gave Ruffinus, with the same power over him that Stilicon had over Honorius, though Ruffinus could not so easily abuse his power by reason of the riper age of Arcadius, who was already man, and capable to govern all things himself, if he had not been, as well as his Brother, of too mild a nature, and easie to be sway'd by a Favourite. Arcadius settled his Court at Constantinople, the chief City of his Empire, and Honorius with the Princess Placidia his Sister stay'd at Rome under the Conduct of Stilicon, who had in his hands yet Sovereign Authority, which he for the first few years us'd in such sort, that all things succeeded prosperously under his prudent Government, so that he acquired reputation among men, and made the whole World approve of the choice which the great Theodosius had made of him to supply the want of years in Honorius: but when he began to perceive that years brought not any vigour to this young Prince, but that his sweet spirit, naturally meek and fearful, was as submissive and complacent at thirteen years of age as it had been at ten, his intentions changed by the facility he found to bring all his projects to effect, and seeing himself confirm'd in a Power which he once believed would not be of long durance, he did not only endeavour to establish himself in it, and maintain this Authority during his life, but likewise began to conceive other thoughts, which afterwards came to be known to the whole World.

To further his Designs, the soft and gentle temper of the Emperour was a sufficient spur: he propos'd a Marriage between him and one of his Daughters, in which he found no more difficulty, than if the thought it self had come from the very Bosom of Honorius; and the power which he had over him in this business was such, that though the eldest of the two Daughters died whilst he was contriving the Match, yet he perswaded him without difficulty to wed the younger named Termantia, whose Espousals he few days after celebrated with infinite magnificence. Thus this bold Favourite seeing himself Father-in-Law to the Emperour, and thinking himself advanced by his Alliance some degrees above what he was before, began to imagine nothing would be difficult for him to effect: he thereupon projected the Marriage of his Son Euchere to the young Princess Placidia. 'Tis true, that the Princess being not yet arrived at an Age fit to marry, made him defer his design, and attend the event some few years longer; yet in the mean time he commanded his Son to wait on her, and to endeavour to gain her heart by his love, and by his services,
the

He needed not use many Arguments to incline the spirit of Euchere: for the Princess was so rarely compleat both for body and mind, that it was not only ealie for him to perswade himself to love her, but impossible for any that approach'd her to forbear adoring her: And certainly, Sir, I may speak it with truth, the Heavens did never form any thing more accomplish'd than the Princess Placidia; the most famous Both of this and past Ages, though they might compare with her, yet could hardly equalize her, for hers was a Beauty accompanied with so royal and resplendent a Majesty, that she forced at one time both wonder and veneration: her Air was the best in the World, her Eyes and Hair were black, and all the Features of her Face were formed with a regular proportion: my Master would without doubt extend her praise much beyond what I am able, were he to recite it; but yet he would tell you that the beauties of her soul were not at all inferiour to those of her body; that she had a lively, yet a wise and judicious disposition, a generous goodness, a courage which she hath sufficiently approved in all the assaults of Fortune, a patience invincible in the most fierce and cruel Adversities; so that it hath been often said at Rome, That the great Theodosius had left somewhat to his two Sons of his goodness and piety, but that only the fair Placidia was the Inheritrix of all his great Virtues. All these wonders which time hath since clearly made known, did begin to appear even in her tender years; and though she was not above twelve years old when the Son of Stilicon did entertain those ambitious thoughts to have the glory to serve her, yet there were then observ'd in her things so extraordinary, as made her the Subject of adoration among the chiefest Romans.

In the mean time the young Constance was advanc'd near the Emperour, and grew to that Lustre, that before he was sixteen years of Age, he was looked upon as a Person from whom the noblest and greatest things might be expected: his Countenance (in which his miseries have since caused no small change) was as beautiful as any could be, that had more in it of Martial than effeminate; his Air was noble and free, and the whole composure of his Person formed of an entirely perfect: but this Body in which Nature had so curiously shewed her utmost Art, was rendred more accomplish'd by a perfection in all those Exercises, which were becoming his Quality; for there was none in Rome who for excellency in Horsemanship, or Agility in managing his Arms was equal to him: his Mind which Heaven had adorned with all that was Noble and Heroick, was yet more refin'd and polish'd by his Studies, the precepts of his Father, and diligence of his Tutors; so that he already seem'd adorn'd with all that Virtue contains of great and glorious. In all his Actions there appeared evidences of perfect goodness, an uncorruptible equity, and a greatness of courage which nothing could exceed; he was an Enemy to all Tyranny and Oppression, pitiful to those in misery, and impatient of all unjust Authority: His spirit was most compos'd of fire, which made him naturally ambitious of great things. In short, he was so entirely accomplish'd, that it had been hard to wish him that Noble Quality, of which he was not already possessed.

These Endowments rendred him highly esteemed both by the Emperour, and all the chief Personages of Rome; nor were those of his Age envious of his great Excellencies; and Stilicon himself was highly favourable in his judgment of him; nor could he refrain to say one day before the Emperour, That if Fortune were not averse to him, he would in time not be inferiour either to the great Theodosius or the great Constantine. On that day on which the Marriage was solemnized between the Emperour and the Daughter of Stilicon, he made particular demonstration of his activity, and admirable courage; and having in the Horse and Chariot-Races overcome all those that ran against him, and at the fights on Horse-back both with his Lance and Sword, born to the ground whoever durst encounter him, drawing to his infinite praise all the peoples Acclamations, and receiving the rewards due to the Conquerour from the young Empress, and the fair Princess Placidia whilst the Emperour who did truly love him, shewed infinite signs of satisfaction: And Stilicon himself, though he rather wished that the same Fortune had attended his Son, could not deny him the praise he so justly merited; but that which more sensibly touched him, was the particular mark of esteem which he received from the Princess Placidia, who presented him with a Sword enrich'd with precious Stones of unexpressible price, the Reward of his Combats on Horse-back.

Constance (said she) I present you this Sword with a great deal of joy, perswading my self it cannot be given to a Person who will use it more worthily, either for his own Glory, or the benefit of the Empire.

Constance upon his knees received this fair Present accompanied with such obliging Words; and then humbling himself more than before to the Princess; Madam, (said he, killing the skirt of her Robe) I receive as a Gift from Heaven this glorious Present of our great Princess; and in receiving this Sword from so fair a hand, I engage to carry it by my side to the last hour of my life, and to employ it in your service to the last drop of my blood. Placidia returned no other Answer to these Words, but with a Nod of her Head, and a charming Look, but the people testified by the clapping of their hands, their approbation of the Honour which he received.

Oh Sir! this Action of Placidia's gave a cruel beginning to those miseries which have still persecuted the unfortunate Constance, and which he hath suffered ever since, and suffers more cruelly at present: I attribute to this day, the beginning of all my Master's miseries: For this was the day, wherein he abandoned himself to a passion, which hath been the cause of all the evils of his life: not that he had lived till now without admiring the divine Beauties of Placidia; 'twas impossible that he should guard himself from not being touch'd, and from sometimes being sensible of a passion for her, which approach'd very near to love, and which had often made him sigh, and many times banish'd from him his rest; but the little cause he saw to conceive any hope, made him oppose all his reason to the growth of that passion, which he was resolv'd to expel from his heart; or to speak more truly, the Princess till then was not arriv'd to an Age, wherein Beauty hath its greatest force and lustre; and being but an Infant, though an admirable Infant, she was not in an estate for Love to shew his most violent power; but after that the Princess was past twelve years of Age, she appeared so excellent to the eyes of my Master; the sweetness of her Words, of her Carriage, of all her Actions, brook such an impression on his heart, being of a disposition so ready to receive that impression, that he soon felt himself truly inflam'd with an amorous passion.

He looked upon the change of his condition with astonishment, nor could he tell how he ought to receive it, or what judgment to give of it. Oh God! (said he) is it possible, that I who was free this Morning, should in so few minutes become a slave? But is it possible (added he presently) that I have lived hitherto, without being enslav'd to the beautiful Placidia? Yet why should I love? (retorted he to himself) Why should I abandon my self to a passion, in which I can conceive no hope? But though I should defend my self against it, (added he soon after) I should in vain defend my self from that love, which ought to be the whole glory of my life: nor would I live, but for the hopes I have fortunately to love Placidia. Oh Constance! (said he again, sighing) consider seriously with thy self, and oppose thy self, if possible, to the ruine of thy repose, and of that fortune, which thou canst not hope for, but by thy sword: The Sister of Honorius is destin'd to the greatest Monarch of the World, and not to the most miserable remnant of the Governours of Illyria; neither Honorius, nor Stilicon Commander of all things, will suffer that thou shalt so much as think such a thought: Placidia her self, who hath so favourably honoured thee this fatal day, will look upon thee as an Enemy, when thy presumption shall once be understood by her: yet for all this (continued he, after these reflections) I must love Placidia, and must love her to death; If my Fortune be bad, yet my blood is sufficiently Noble to serve her without offence, and I may perhaps by the assistance of my Valour, raise my self among men to no despicable height; or at worst, when I shall love without hope, my love will be the more Noble, more worthy of her; and if she cause me to die by loving her, I can no ways hope a more glorious Destiny. 'Twas at this resolution that he stopt; yet both that day, and all the other dayes of his life, he would continually dispute against his passion; but neither time nor the accidents of his life, could ever banish it from his spirit; it increas'd day by day: and as I was privy to all his secrets, and one whom he favour'd with a more particular confidence, and who alone have never forsaken him in all his Voyages and Adventures, so I was the first and only person, to whom he discover'd his passion, so long as it could be kept secret, and was not made publick, as it afterwards came to be, to the whole Empire: Though I had conceiv'd of him marvellous hopes, and always look'd upon him like something above Excellent, yet being now but about the same age with him, my reflections were but weak, nor did I much dispute against his passion, which I knew the least approbation of mine would confirm. In

In the mean time, he began to suffer extremely, and his pain was so much the more, by reason he durst communicate his sighs to none but me; and that he saw every day Placidia, without daring to discover to her the least passion of his soul, his mouth was altogether mute, nor durst his eyes permit themselves the license of those looks, which might give the least cognizance or suspicion of his presumptuous thoughts? yet was he not wanting to render her with a ready obeyfance all those petty services which oftentimes do manifest an affection better than words, and which might yet always be perform'd without the least suspicion of any interest. And he had yet more happiness that Placidia (to whom he was considerable both by reason of his merit, his birth, and education near the Emperour) receiv'd them more favourably from him than any other, and did every day shew him some mark of a particular esteem.

But not long after his discontent was most sensibly augmented, though moderated in the end with some consolation. It was by reason of the report that was spread throughout the whole world, that Stilicon well knowing the power which he had in the Empire, and over the too mild spirit of the Emperour, pretended to marry his Son with Placidia, as he had already marry'd his Daughter to Honorius; and that himself was witness of the ambitious Euchere's attending the Princess with a greater diligence than formerly, and giving as it were publick marks of his love, and of the design he had to espouse her. When the first knowledge of this was dispers'd among the Romans, many of them murmur'd, but none wonder'd, because they all knew Stilicon's power to be so great as to effect things more difficult.

Constance was extremely enrag'd many days, nor could longer endure himself to sigh without complaining or daring to open his mouth, whilst a Rival much inferiour to him in merit and descent, though Fortune had advanc'd him to a degree above him, should openly dare to court the fair Placidia. But after having some days pass'd over this resentment, he found in it somewhat of satisfaction for himself, believing that if Placidia could degrade her self to suffer the love of Euchere, he might with less presumption give her cognizance of his passion, knowing that the great courage wherewith this Princess was endow'd, would not make her at all enter into considerations (fit for lower minds) of the favour and fortune of Stilicon, or that she would prefer Euchere, because he was happy and powerful by means of his Fathers Authority, to a man who was to be prefer'd before him, both for his Illustrious Birth and Resplendent Virtue: However, he could not endure that Euchere should daily make testimony of his love to the Princess, and that for the respect that all the world had for Stilicon, none should dare but to leave the place free when he approach'd. As for my Master, he would never submit to that complacency, which both his Father, and many other personages instructed him to make use of; but on the contrary, he was more diligent about the Princess, and had often the satisfaction to mark in her visage, that she was not at all angry or displeas'd that he interrupted the discourse and converse of his Rival.

In the end Euchere complain'd to my Master; and having given a large testimony of his confidence, by a long Harangue of the love he bore Placidia, and praying him to serve him in it; Constance received his discourse with a great deal of resentment. In another occasion, said he, I shall willingly render you what ever service you can desire of me, but in this I can neither serve you, nor counsel you to raise your thoughts to a Princess who will never debase hers to you. The Emperour her Brother (replied Euchere) has not the same prejudice against our Family and Alliance, since he hath not disdain'd to espouse my Sister. Your Sister (replied Constance) could not make the Emperour lose either his degree or honour; but it is not the same with Placidia, who by the espousing you must lose hers: and if by the honour I have had to wait upon her, I can judge of the courage of this Princess, I cannot believe that she will ever dispose her self to make you happy. These brushes of my Masters, did much discourage Euchere, who parted coldly from him, and after that day us'd not that familiarity with him which they had contracted in their being brought up together with the Emperour.

In the mean time my Master, young as he was, observed with a great deal of grief, both the unjust authority of Stilicon, and the weakness of Honorius his spirit: In effect, never had Fortune rais'd a Favourite to so high a degree, nor was there ever man who us'd his power with more Grandeur: All the Dignities of the Empire; All the charges of the War; All the Governments of the Provinces, and all places of trust were distributed among his creatures, and by his choice, without so much as once demanding the consent of the Emperour. All the Revenues pass'd through his hands, with which he enrich'd both himself and his Family. He receiv'd all Ambassadors, all dispatches of Princes, whether whether Tributaries or Allies, or dependents of the Empire; and manag'd all affairs of State, without communicating scarce any thing to Honorius. And as he knew the humour of this Prince inclinable to repose, and innocent pleasures, so he endeavour'd to satisfy and busy his inclinations, and cherish in him a softness which might deprive him of the cognizance of affairs, and preserve his Sovereign Authority with more facility: All the true hearted Nobility among the Romans, and those who either by their services or birth might aspire to charges or Dignities which they saw bestowed every day upon Stilicon's Favourites, bewail'd his greatness, but yet durst not so much as murmur, knowing well that either the prison or banishment would be the least punishment inflicted upon those whom he did but suspect, and whom he thought might but in the least obscure his greatness.

Constance more courageous than others, and who by reason of his being brought up with Honorius, and the degree he held by his Birth and Merit, had a free access to him, did often lament to him, and represent the unhappy condition of his estate, and the low esteem which he would expose himself to among other Monarchs of the world, if he did not suppress the great and odious authority of his Favourite, and did not render himself the real Master of the Empire. The Emperour, who truly esteem'd the merit and person of Constance, receiv'd this discourse with good approbation; and out of respect to his fidelity, never disclos'd a tittle of it to Stilicon, from whom he might justly fear all things, if such discourse should come to his knowledge: but however, it had no effect, nor caus'd any change in the spirit of Honorius; and my Master looking upon the poor spirit of the Prince with pity, left his resolution, and resolv'd no more to lose his labour in speaking to him.

However, I must needs avow that Stilicon was indeed a great man, and that in acting his particular affairs, he neglected not those of the State, so long as his intentions were honest: he was of a lively and active spirit, capable of great things, naturally eloquent, and for seats of war there were few Captains of our age more valiant, nor more experienc'd than he, so that my Master could not refrain an esteem for him for many things, and a respect for many great actions which he had perform'd both under Theodosius, and in the beginning of the Reign of Honorius. Ruffinus, to whom Theodosius had given a like Authority in the East with the Emperour Arcadius, had not so well us'd it: for after he had sacrific'd all things to his Avarice and Cruelty, and with an unexpressible infidelity armed strangers against his Prince; he had in the end receiv'd a deserv'd death, together with the unfaithful Eutropia, by the Valour and courage of Gaynus, a stout and great Captain, who was employ'd in the service of Arcadius.

In the mean time the young Constance languish'd and dy'd for Placidia; and his sufferings were so much the greater, that he durst not give her any knowledge of them: It is true, that he us'd to approach her with more confidence than formerly, through the courage which the concurrence of Euchere's passion had inspir'd him with: and so exasperated he was to see his presumptuous Rival give publick testimonies of his love, that he could no longer contain from discovering the impatience with which he suffer'd his boldness; and being one day in her Chamber, seeing her approach towards her Looking-glass, and that all the company stood discoursing on the other side of the Room, he followed her towards the Glass, and standing behind her, with amazement beheld those divine beauties which it represented to him: he had stood some minutes in this posture, whilst the Princess put in order some locks of her hair, till at length with a sigh he broke out so loud, that she might easily hear him, yet not those persons who were on the other side of the Chamber. O Gods (said he) and can you suffer so horrible an injustice? Placidia turning her self towards him at these words, and looking fix'dly upon him: And of what injustice (said she with a charming gesture) do you complain? I complain (answered he) and let the whole world witness my complaint, that so much beauty as I now behold, which merits the adoration of the whole world, should be destin'd to the son of Stilicon. The Princess at this saying of my Masters, fixing her eye more stedfastly upon him than before; after some few minutes of silence, I esteem you (said she) so much the more, that you dare speak so confidently on this occasion; nor will I make it any point of difficulty to tell you, that the son of Stilicon shall never be possessor of Placidia. Constance was ravish'd with joy at these words, as much for the assurance the Princess gave him, as for the confidence she express'd. to have of him; and being unwilling to lose the advantage to express himself farther, I have always had (said he) great hopes of the courage of our Princess, but I know not how she can defend her self against the will of Honorius, which will never contradict that of Stilicon. I shall well defend my self (replied the Princess, with a resolution befitting her) and with that confidence fidence which I have testified to you, I will tell you that the weakness of Honorius shall never enslave the Daughter of Theodosius, and that I will suffer all things rather than be the Spouse of Euchere. It is not just (replied the amorous Constance) that you should suffer for others crimes: but without exposing you to suffer, I have a shorter way to hinder Stilicon's Son from espousing you. And what means have you (replied the Princess) more ready and more assured than that of my will? I will (answered Constance) shew him the way of this sword, which I received from you, and which I carry at my side only to employ in your service. Placidia at these words looking with a kind of pleasing wonder upon my Master: Why Constance (said she) do you offer your self freely to destroy the Son of Stilicon, without considering that it is the greatest and most dangerous enterprize, that the most hardy and most potent Person in the World can ever attempt? I dare expose my self (returned my Master with a sigh) to far greater dangers for your sake and service; and I dare engage my self that Euchere shall never be your Spouse, except you desire it. Placidia having for some time looked on him without speaking; I swear (said she, with a most obliging demeanour) that I am extremely indebted to your kindness, and so much the more, in regard there is none among all the Romans, hath had the courage to offer me what you have done: but I desire not at all the death of Euchere, though both his behaviour and person are troublesome to me; and less that you should expose your self to a danger, unto which there is scarce that power in the World but must yield. Constance was about to return her an Answer, but the company approaching the place where they were, hindred him: yet he had the satisfaction to read in the Princess eyes, that she had a large acknowledgment for the testimony of his good will.

After that day the Princess, which with all his other good qualities particularly admired the greatness of that Courage, and the resolution of that Spirit, which did not at all acknowledge the fortune of so potent a Favourite, testified a greater confidence in him, than she had done heretofore; and every day discover'd to him the thoughts she had of the weakness of Honorius, concerning which she spoke with much more prudence and knowledge, than could be expected from a person of a far greater age: but these testimonies of her goodness and esteem, though they did much encourage Constance, yet did they not give him an entire satisfaction, or yield him any comfort in his passion; when he consider'd that the favours he receiv'd from Placidia were addressed to Constance, but not at all to the lover of the Princess, whose passion she was ignorant of: and that when she had the knowledge of it, he had reason to fear that she would receive it with the same resentment, that she did that of Euchere: oftentimes tempted by favourable occasions, or encourag'd by the favour of Placidia, he had his mouth almost open to discover his passion; and as many times withheld by a fear that he should not prevail, he suppress'd his boldness, and persever'd in his silence.

'Twas not that, considering his Birth, he did not find himself of a blood sufficiently illustrious, to pretend to all things; especially in an Age, wherein he had seen so many Examples: But because he saw that his Birth was not advantag'd by a proportionate Fortune; he judg'd that he ought to repair that fault by those Actions which might give him Renown among men, and a lawful ambition to aspire to such heights. In these thoughts he stop'd, and resolv'd to banish his passion for the Princess, till by his Actions he had acquir'd a name worthy the greatness of his Ancestors, and a glory that might excuse his ambition. He therefore dreamt of nothing else, but to go and seek reputation and dignity by his Arms; and seeing himself at an age fit to go to the War, he sigh'd after some occasion to depart from Rome, to signalize himself in the Armies.

His impatience soon found means to satisfy himself, in the time when Europe found it self over-run with the incursions of the Barbarians: For the Goths, a cruel and terrible Nation, which a long time before in the Reign of Theodosius, under Atbanatic and Fridigerne had parted from Scythia, and the Borders of the Baltique Sea, but had by the valour and prudence of that great Emperour been forced to retire to their Native Country, returned again to invade the Empire, with a powerful deluge of war, under the command of their Kings Alaric and Kadagaise. These people were divided into two different Nations; and those Goths which came from the most Eastern parts (as your Majesty without doubt knows) were called the Ostrogoths; and those who came from the more Western parts, were called the Visigoths. Alaric commanded those last, and Kadagaise had the leading of the Ostrogoths, and the Herules Nations under his own command. Many persons have believ'd that they were call'd by the perfidiousness of Ruffinus, who sought either to render himself more considerable by the trouble of the Empire, or find the means to exalt himself by its disturbances, and by the assistance of the Barbarians.

However it was, the Goths finding Ruffinus dead, and the Oriental Empire defended by many valiant Captains; they passed from thence into the Occidental; but not finding sufficient Victuals, by reason of the infinite numbers of their men, they separated themselves; and Alaric with his Visigoths marched into Pannonia, Illyria and Dalmatia; and Radagaise towards Italy, with an Army of two hundred thousand men: and report was spread abroad among those who searched not into the truth, that they were four hundred thousand. Alaric and Radagaise were two men of much different tempers: Alaric was a valiant Captain, and of noble thoughts, considering the Nation from whence he was extracted; being truly possessed of virtue; but Radagaise was a Prince altogether barbarous, a man naturally composed of cruelty, and whose whole virtue and excellence consisted only in shedding humane blood: 'twas reported, that he had made a vow to sacrifice all the Romans to those gods which he ador'd: and truly he testifi'd by his actions, that he had such intentions; for in all the places where he march'd, he pardon'd neither Sex nor Age, but destroy'd all he came near, either with Fire or Sword, without being touch'd with any sense of Humanity.

The News of those destructions which he began to work in Italy, were incontinently brought to Rome; and the report thereof strook terror and amazement into the whole City. I believe that those that have accused Stilicon to be of counsel with Ruffinus, when he call'd them into Italy, were scarce well inform'd of the truth; nay more, he could not justly be accused to have acted in this business, otherwise than as a great Captain, and one who truly intended the good of the Empire; for no sooner was the news arriv'd of the Goths entrance into Greece, but he had gather'd together all the Forces of the Empire: and at that time that Radagaise entred into Italy, he found himself in a condition to oppose him with an Army, though not so potent in men as his, yet composed of more valiant Commanders, and Souldiers better disciplin'd: and having thus in Person balanc'd all things, and order'd the Affairs at Rome in the best manner he could, he dispos'd himself to the conduct of this War, which the Emperour, wholly inclined to peace, willingly gave him the charge of.

Constance rejoiced in this publick Desolation, out of the hopes he had in short time to signalize himself; and though he were young, and had not as yet either commanded or obeyed, out of consideration had to his Noble Extract, the good opinion that all men had of him, and the recommendation of the Emperour, who much affected him; Stilicon gave him the command of a thousand Horse: with this command, which he receiv'd with an unparallel'd joy, he believed that there was nothing above what his courage might effect. And his Father who had great hopes of him, and lov'd him dearly, spar'd nothing which might be necessary to set him forth in a most magnificent equipage.

His absence from Placidia, would much more sensibly have afflicted him, had not the desire to render himself worthy of her, & the love of glory which Managre his love to Placidia, possessed a great part of his soul, infinitely comforted him, and represented unto him, that whatever of gallant he should do in that War, would more advance his Fortunes towards Placidia, than whatever he could do or suffer for her in Rome; It was likewise some consolation to him, that Euchere made the same Voyage, & that his Father would make him serve his Apprenticeship in War under him, & to that end gave him a command in the Army equal to that of Constance. He therefore prepared himself to depart with all these satisfactions, to counterbalance the sorrows he found in being banished from the sight of the Princess; which notwithstanding was such, that he could not in taking leave of his Friends hinder it from appearing in his eyes; though he constrain'd himself as much as he could to dissemble it: and that day on which he parted from Rome with Stilicon, and the greatest part of the Court of Honorius, coming to take leave of her, he appear'd so sad, that she could not refrain from testifying she took notice of it: and after some other words, I know, (said she) how glad soever you be of these occasions of War which you have so often desir'd, yet you cannot leave us without some signs of grief and discontent. Constance was a little surprized at these words; and endeavouring to feign a cheerfulness in his Visage, How desirous soever I am (said he) of the glory, and service of the Emperour, yet the honour to wait in the presence of our Illustrious Princess, is so great a good, that it is difficult to lose it without some regret: and I intreat you, Madam, to permit me to be more particularly touch'd than others. As there are few, (replied the Princess) whom I esteem as I do you, so I would have you be one of those that feel the most regret to leave us: but I hope (added she with a sigh) you will soon cheer up again.

Constance gave no other answer to these words but a sigh, accompanied with a behaviour might have given great suspicion to the Princess, had she observed it: but soon after endeavouring to vanquish his sadness, and appear with a more debonaire countenance, Madam (said he) you may remember if you please, that I receiv'd this Sword which I carry by my side, from your heavenly hands, and 'tis the first Sword that I shall draw against the Enemies mies of the Empire; and therefore as I have a particular Obligation not to act any thing but what shall be worthy the glory I have receiv'd; so I hope you will always have a particular interest in all those actions which I shall perform for the service of my Country. With all my heart I consent to it, (repl'd the Princess,) and that so much the rather, because I am perswaded you will never do any thing that will give me cause to repent.

After these expressions which he receiv'd with a becoming submission, he took leave of her, having perform'd the like duty to the Emperour and Empress, who both gave him great marks of their affection: he mounted on Horse-back, and departed from Rome to go to joyn with the Army, which was already march'd, according to the Orders of Stilicon. 'Twas thought fit first to supply the greatest necessity, and therefore judg'd convenient to march first against Radagaise, who with Fire and Sword laid desolate the Frontiers of Italy; and afterwards, if Fortune were favourable to them, to march against Alaric into Pannonia. To this purpose we march'd towards Etruria, into which the Barbarians were ready to enter, advancing by great Journeys, to hinder the deplorable Progress which they made in that Province. The fear had been so great on all sides of Italy, that the unhappy Inhabitants had quitted their Habitations, and fled in great Troops towards Rome, not having the courage to defend their Country against a World of terrible Enemies, choosing rather to seek for safety in their flight, than by staying to be expos'd to the fury of those merciless men, who sacrificed them to Fire and to Sword, with an unparallel'd cruelty. Stilicon made stop of a great number of those whom he found capable to bear Arms, which being suppli'd within the Towns he pass'd through, greatly encreas'd his Army.

This War, Mighty Prince, being begun, was ended in the name, and under the Leading of Stilicon, and not of my Matter, though he had the command I inform'd you of; and since I doubt not but you have already had cognizance of the whole management of it, I shall abridge my Story, and only tell you, that no sooner were we entred into Etruria, but we had advice that Radagaise having had notice of our March, and thinking to devour us with the multitudes of his Combatants, withdrew his men from pillaging, and other disorders which he had given them leave to act for a while, and was rallying them together with a resolution to give us battle: This News affrighted not Stilicon at all, who desired nothing more than to combat those Enemies whom he despis'd, though they seem'd terrible to all Europe. Yet for that he doubted lest his men should be discourag'd at their Multitudes, and that in a Plain where both Armies might have space to fight with all liberty, the weakest might have the greatest disadvantage, he endeavour'd therefore to render himself Master of all those places where he might lodge advantageously; and in the mean time he sent forth divers Parties of two or three thousand Horse or more, as opportunity serv'd, (before Radagaise had ralli'd his whole Army) to charge them either in straits of Mountains, passages of Rivers, or other advantageous places, which were better known to him and his, than to the Barbarians; and in the Skirmishes, the Victory always fell on our side.

These petty Successes were of no small importance: for by means of them, Radagaise before he could come to a Battel, lost a considerable part of his Army: 'Twas upon these occasions that my Matter began to make known his Prudence and Valour: and one day Stilicon having given him one thousand Horse more, to those thousand he before commanded, that he might do somewhat worthy his great Courage, he charged eight or ten thousand Goths which were to pass over the River Arnon, at a strait which he had the keeping of, and so well took his advantages to hinder their passage, joyning an infinite Prudence to his admirable Valour, that more than five thousand of his Enemies remained dead upon the place, or were drowned in the River; and the rest were totally routed on the other side, and remained expos'd to the mercy of those people whom their cruelty had driven into the Woods and Mountains: few dayes after, with a like number of men, he assaulted one of the strongest Quarters of Radagaise his Camp, set on fire their Tents and Baggage, and left four or five thousand men dead upon the place; in many other places he had the like success, and in little time rendred his name famous among our Troops, and terrible amongst the Enemies: And as his Virtue made him be beloved of the whole World, so the whole World joyc'd at these his happy beginnings, which were seconded with such fair success, that in three or four Moneths time, which (by reason of the good conduct of Stilicon) preceded the Battel, he became victorious in ten or twelve important Skirmishes, where he alwayes commanded in Person: Infomuch that Stilicon, who naturally lov'd valiant men, and who knew well what service he might expect in this Expedition from so considerable a Person as Constance, looked no longer upon him as a young man of twenty years of age, but instead of the Command he had given him of a thousand Horse, and some other employments which he had added to it, according as he had signaliz'd himself, he rais'd him to more high Dignities in the Army; and on the day of the Battel, gave to him, and his Son Euchere, the Command of all the Cavalry. Euchere was indeed a valiant Personage, and had acquir'd reputation in this his first Entrance into the School of War, but yet not so much as to deserve to be rais'd to this Dignity, if the Quality of the Son of Stilicon had not been more considerable than his Services.

In the end, Stilicon having wear'd and weakn'd the Army of Radagaise as he desir'd, and perceiving his men enflam'd and encourag'd with their good success, and the Enemy fearful and out of heart by reason of their Losses and Defeats, prepar'd with all diligence to give them Battel, marching as it were to a certain Victory. 'Twas near the Banks of the River Arnon, that the Captains of one and the other Party Embattel'd their Troops: nor was Stilicon wanting to seize upon all those Posts that might be advantagious to him, nor to order and dispose his Troops in the best manner that became a great and experienc'd General. Euchere commanded the Cavalry on the right wing, and my Master that on the left, which was opposite to the right wing of Radagaise his Army, in which he fought in Person with the most valiant of his men.

Your Majesty hath without doubt long since heard of the success of this bloody day, which was so memorable, and so important, that the whole World cannot be ignorant of it. The Victory remained for some time doubtful, occasion'd rather by the number than Valour of our Enemies; and for some hours it thus hung in an even balance: but in the end the Barbarians yielded to the Prowess of ours; for no sooner did the first begin to express a fear, but it became so general, that they scarce made any more resistance, giving opportunity to the incens'd Romans, and to those whom their inhumanity had forc'd into our Troops, to revenge themselves of their cruelty. I shall enlarge my self no longer on the particulars of the Battel, but so far as concerns my Master in this memorable Victory.

I must then tell you, that with the left Wing of the Roman Cavalry, which he commanded, he not only broke the right Wing of Radagaise, in which he himself fought, but overturning all before him, and covering the Earth with blood and death, he in Person pressed towards Radagaise with so much vigour, that a powerful succour could hardly deliver him from his fury; and in the end obtain'd an entire Victory on that side; and so entire, that he had scarce an Enemy left to dispute it: but seeing that on this victorious side he had nothing more to do, and beholding from a little Hill, that the right Wing had not fought with the same success, he flew thither with his conquering Troops, where he found that the Victory was not only doubtful, but did incline to the Goths; and that if he had not arrived in time, that part of our Army had been in great danger to have been defeated: he receiv'd likewise news at the same time, that Euchere with a small number of his Friends was environ'd with a great Troop of the Goths, and was fighting with little hopes of safety; I know not whether in the first thoughts which his love and jealousy inspir'd him with, he did not conceive some motion of joy that the life of his Rival was in danger, and that he was sorry that Fortune pressed him at such a time to his succour; but certain I am, that such thoughts balanc'd not his resolutions: for turning himself to me, who always was as near his Person as I could possibly, Let us go Valerius, (said he very softly, that he might not be understood by others) Let us go, said he, and save the life of our Rival, and make the interest of our Love yield to that of our Duty. In effect, after having encourag'd his men with a few words, he flew to the place where the Barbarians were most thick, and overthrowing all that stood before him, forc'd his passage, and struck so much fear into his Enemies, that they did not only leave Euchere free, but like their Companions they lost their courage, and by their flight endeavour'd to avoid his fury. The cruelty which they had used in all places where they came, was the occasion that my Master was forc'd by his utmost endeavours to stop the fury of the Conquerours where ever he came; but Stilicon had resolv'd their utter extirpation; and it was by his Orders, or by the fury of the Souldiers, that more than a hundred thousand Goths, or Herules, remained that day dead in the Field. The number of those that sav'd themselves was about fifty thousand, the Night having favour'd their Retreat; but they retir'd without any Equipage, and in the most miserable manner in the World, into the Fesulan Mountains, where the straits were advantagious to them, and where they could very hardly be forc'd.

But Stilicon, who had resolv'd to destroy them, and who wisely judg'd that if Alaric should come to their assistance, it would not only be difficult for him to conquer them, but he should be scarce able to defend himself against so great a Power, march'd with his whole Army after them; and understanding that they were retired into the Fesulan Mountains, tains, and that it was impossible for him to force them, he caus'd a party of his Troops to gain the very tops of the Mountains, and with the rest to stopp'd all passages, that there was no way left, but either they must perish with hunger, or by endeavouring to open a passage with their swords, come to another Battel. The success was entirely agreeable with his design: the Barbarians liv'd many days on the tops of the Mountains in all imaginable misery, and in the end knowing that they must either dye, or by some other ways save themselves, necessity inspir'd them with valour, and Radagaise believ'd that he could the better save himself by force, in regard he perceiv'd that to stop his passage, Stilicon had divided his Army into several parts. In which he did not wholly deceive himself; for most true it was, that those which were placed on the tops of the Mountains could not give any assistance to the other, but the quarters of those which were lodg'd in the vallies were dispos'd in such sort, that they could in very small time re-unite and joyn their Forces.

But Radagaise believing that with the Forces that follow'd him, he could force his way through those he found at that strait where he intended to pass, before the quarters could joyn, quitted the Mountains at break of day, and appearing at the head of his Army, with a horrible noise of all sorts of instruments of War, he charg'd the first Court of Guard with so much fury, that some thousands of our men lost their lives before that their Companions could be in a state to succour them; but these having sustain'd the first brush, gave time to all the rest to come to their assistance: and now when Radagaise hoped for victory: he might behold our fresh Troops come upon him from all sides. My Master with his wonted diligence, and according to his command, was in the head of the Cavalry, gallantly arm'd and mounted upon an excellent Jennet: Radagaise, as I believe, took him for Stilicon, and having resolv'd not to out-live this day, if it should as the former prove unfortunate, taking a Lance from one of his men, and covering himself with his shield, he ran against my Master with a great cry. Constance scorn'd to refuse this encounter which Fortune seem'd to have rais'd for his greater glory, but putting spurs to his Horse at the same time that he saw him do the like, and that he perceiv'd by his cry he gave him a defiance; and leaving those of his Troops a great distance behind him, he met the King of the Goths in the midst of his carriere. Their Rencounter was equally impetuous, but unequal in the success: My Master had a slight wound in the shoulder, and was terribly shaken by the strong Lance of Radagaise; but so well directed was his blow, that the point of his Lance passing into his Enemies Viscer, tumbled him headlong, depriv'd of life, over the crouper of his Horse. Constance knew not yet over whom he was Conquerour, but soon after he heard a cry among the Barbarians, that their King was dead; and Stilicon arriving at the same time, and finding the Goths scar'd and discourag'd for the death of their King, he assaulted them with so much vigour, that they were not able to make any farther resistance: the greatest part of them were slain upon the place, and the rest which fled back to the Mountains, either perish'd with hunger, or were destroy'd of the people of the Countrey, who to revenge the Cruelties they had exercis'd upon them, scarce left one alive.

Such was the end of this War, famous through the world, and in which I may truly say my Master had a glorious share, as well for the death of Radagaise, to which his good fortune I believe reserv'd him, as for saving the life of Stilicon's Son; the many and advantageous skirmishes he made before the first Battel, with several other valiant and renowned actions during the time of the War, which were all so truly Noble, that the whole world admir'd them; and some did publickly aver, That the first atchievements of a man of twenty years of age, might already compare with the greatest actions of the most famous Captains: Stilicon himself paying to his virtue that which he could not refuse, and that which particularly he ought for the safety of his Son, after having rendred my Master all those honours possibly he could, publickly declar'd that he was the Conqueror of Radagaise and his Army, and treating him in all things with extraordinary kindness; writ to the Emperour the truth of all his great actions, not forgetting any thing that might make for his advantage.

We understood afterward that Honorius did not alone testify his joy for the death and defeat of Radagaise, which was of so great importance to him; but that with it he was sensible, and tenderly sensible of the particular glory of my Master, in which all Rome concern'd it self, by singing publick Eulogies of his praise; but that which was more than all these most acceptable to Constance was, that Placidia, his ador'd Placidia, had a share in this general joy, and testified all contentment possible for the advantages of a person whom she so particularly esteem'd. Though as I have said before, he was treated by her with all imaginable imaginable marks of freedom and confidence, yet never having had permission, durst not presume to write to her, believing that he ought to keep that respectful distance with the Daughter and Sister of his Emperour. But he writ to several other Roman Dames, who every day accompani'd her, and with whom he had diligently sought a friendship, and without any great trouble obtain'd it. Virginia, a Lady of a Noble house, and who was dearly belov'd of the Princess, was the person with whom he had contracted a more particular freedom: he had writ to her often, and had as often receiv'd Letters from her; but at the return of the dispatch which Stilicon had sent to Honorius, she sent him one, of which I have not yet forgot the words, which were these, or the like.

Virginia to Constance.

When you shall hear from me with what joy and amazement the Romans have receiv'd the news of the glorious commencement of your Arms, how they talk of the death of Radagaife, of the safety of Euchere, of what your valour contributed to the gaining of two famous Battels, and of a hundred other great Actions, with those Praises, those Honours, they would scarce have given to Theodosius or the chief of the Cæsars; that the Emperour hath testified a most particular joy, and that the whole people of Rome are charm'd with your fair achievements, you will only be sensible of the rewards justly due to your virtue, and find nothing above what you might lawfully hope: But when you shall understand that Placidia hath taken as great a part, as those who are most concern'd, and that she hath commanded me to assure you of it, in the most obliging manner in the world; I believe that you will not be so insensible, as not to place this advantage above all those which you draw from your glorious actions. For my part, I believe the approbation of this Princess ought to be dearer to you than that of the whole Empire, and I am perswaded it will be so, if you be in the Camp what you are among us, That same Constance in whom valour is yet advanc'd by an addition of all other Virtues.

Though my Master had a great confidence in Virginia, yet he had never discovered to her the love he bore Placidia: for his discretion instructed him to believe, that it was a secret, which he ought to keep from the whole world: but as this fair Lady had observ'd something in his Countenance and in his Actions, which denoted a passion; so 'tis probable he had sometimes but weakly defended himself from the truth of her suspicions. But however it was, at the reading of her Letter he was transported with an extraordinary joy; and seeing that a person who was dear to Placidia, and who had suspicion of his love to Placidia; and who might have testified somewhat of his passion to that Princess, did assure him and write to him such obliging things by her order; his flattering thoughts made him believe, that his passion was neither unknown, nor disagreeable to that great Princess; and in these thoughts, he suffered himself to be transported with motions of joy, equal to the Grandeur of his love: but after short considerations, he moderated these by the contrary appearances; and with reason judging that these marks of Placidia's favour proceeded not at all from any cognizance she had of his love, he suppress'd his most forward extasies, yet did not so absolutely expel them, as not to rest satisfied with his fortune.

As I was the only person that had knowledge of his thoughts of this nature; so with me alone he consulted about all affairs that concern'd his love: and at this time I was witness of all those judgments, which this rencounter made him make of his condition; some few days after sending one of his confidants to Rome, under the pretext of visiting his Father and Friends, amongst other Letters which he committed to his charge, he writ to Virginia, these words or the like.

Constance to Virginia.

To have had the happiness at my first taking Arms, to have merited the respect of the Emperour, and esteem of the Romans, is an effect of my Fortune greater than I could hope for; and to have a place in the thoughts of the Amiable Virginia, is an advantage no less dear to me; but to have the least room in those of that incomparable Princess, is a real benefit as much above all expression, as it is above all my merit or my hope. If I could ever doubt of your sincerity, I could do it in this particular: but as I know you to be truth it self, I will suffer my self to be flatter'd with the honour honour which you pronounce me, and charge you to make acknowledgement, as you are charged with the good action: supply my weakness, lovely Virginia, by testifying to our Princess, that she hath reason to interest her self for a man who hath devoted himself to her service, by receiving from her hand the sword which I have the honour to carry: Protest, if you please, for me, that I will render my self worthy of her esteem, if she will permit my actions to have that glorious Aim. I will say no more: for I fear lest in speaking to you, I should speak to the Princess, and I doubt if something too bold should slip from my pen, you would hardly have the indulgence to hide it from her.

In the mean time, having finished the War against Radagaise, and the Winter now approaching we had some hopes to return to Rome; but Stilicon, whether it was to blot out all belief of that report which had been spread abroad in most parts of the Empire, that he was of the counsel with Ruffinus, in calling the Barbarians into the lands of the Empire; or that he judg'd it necessary not to retire so long as Alaric was in Ilyria, despising the rigors of the Winter, led his victorious Army towards that Province, with resolution never to return to Rome, till he had either defeated or driven away his enemies.

It is true, that in this War he march'd with more wariness than to the first, knowing well that he had to deal with another kind of Captain, and other sort of Soldiers, than Radagaise and his Troops: For Alaric was a valiant and great Commander, and had besides with him many Princes of great valour: He likewise led the same Soldiers, which for five and twenty years had fought under the pay of Theodosius and his Children; nor had they then chang'd Party, had not their agreements been broken by Stilicon himself.

There were two Royal Families among the Goths; the Amals and the Balthes: The Amals commanded over the Ostrogoths; and the Balthes, from whom Alaric was descended, the Visigoths. This Prince well known and experienc'd in War, had well disciplin'd his Troops, and order'd his Army to the best advantages of fighting: He brought them under good constitutions, and affecting a kind of Justice in his design, had publish'd that he had not invaded the Empire, if the Sons of Theodosius would have observ'd that agreement, which he had made with their Father, but permitted him to enjoy that Land among the Gauls, which he had assign'd him. That they understood themselves that this was true, and alledg'd that Stilicon had broke these conditions, and hindred the performance of the Articles, to beget a War in the Empire, judging that he could much better maintain his authority in time of War than in peace.

However it was, Stilicon march'd towards them, without delay: and Alaric, who no less desir'd battel, march'd likewise towards us; so that we joyn'd near the Frontiers of Ilyria. It will be unnecessary to relate the whole course of this War, which was of a longer continuance than that of Radagaise; I will only tell you that the two Chieftains being experienc'd Generals, did both seek their best advantage, nor would either unadvisedly come to battel, or neglect any thing, which might add any assurance to their hopes of Victory: for which reasons, they for a good space of time led their Armies up and down, oftentimes removing their Camps, and always making use of that wary foresight, which became two such skilful Leaders.

After they had a long time observ'd each others motion, they began to enterprize something; so that many skirmishes happen'd, but with different success: yet I can aver with truth, that all those parties, over which my Master commanded, did continually gain an entire Victory: and in this War he did so augment the glory, which he had purchas'd in the former, against Radagaise, that both in the one and other party there was nothing talk'd of but the valour of the young Constance. In fine, after many disputes, they came to a Battle, which was fought near the Vale of Epidaurus, with infinite cruelty and effusion of humane blood: my Master had command of all the Cavalry, though the leading of the left Wing was given to Enchere, and that of the right to Mesuesel, who a little before with favourable success had put an end to the War in Africa, against his Brother Gillon. The right Wing of Alaric's Army was commanded by his Brother Austalphe, a Prince of great valour: The left by Singeric his Nephew; and the Cavalry by the young Wallia, a Prince of the Blood, and not only the most valiant among the Goths, but a man, in whom the valour which he was possess'd of in the supremest degree, was accompany'd with all other most excellent virtues.

This Prince's command being equal to that of my Master's, made them mutually try their force, before their Troops charged; and having broken their Lances the one against the other, with the best grace in the world, they set their hands to their Swords, and began a Combat worthy the view of both Armies; but they were parted by their Troops, and the two valiant Warriors constrain'd to carry the effects of their courage to the exercise of their charges. The two Armies fought even till Night, whilst Victory neither declar'd it self for one side nor the other; the loss was near equal, and in the whole amount'd to between twenty and thirty thousand men. The next Morning they kept within their Posts, and made a Truce for certain days to burn the dead, and give them the Rites of Burial. 'Twas in this day, that my Master and the valiant Prince Wallia, besides the proof they had made of each others Valour in the Battel, being both equally amorous of that reputation which had extended it self through the World both of the one and the others virtue, desired to see each other, and mutually admir'd themselves, finding all things agreeable to what Fame had reported of them; so that they not only truly conceiv'd a reciprocal esteem of each other, but protest'd a real friendship, so far as the interest of their Country, or their own Honour would permit.
and

This interview facilitated divers others, and in the end, they came to Propositions for a further Truce: Stilicon found himself in an estate not able to drive Alaric out of the Lands of the Empire: and Alaric being weakned, with the loss of a great number of his men, and being in a Country where all were Enemies to him, found himself not so strong as to be able to stay, should the Emperour with all his Forces endeavour to drive him out: There were many Consultations had before they came to an absolute Accommodation. In the end, after many difficulties, the two Generals had an interview, and agreed upon a Truce to last for four years: That Alaric should depart out of the Lands of the Empire, and not return during the term of four years, in which time Stilicon promised to mediate with the Emperour, and to oblige him to perform the conditions which Theodosius had formerly granted to the Goths: and because Alaric had taken several Places, though of small importance, he consented to restore them, having a sum of money paid in part of his damages sustain'd in the War; protesting in the end, that if when the four years were expir'd, the Emperour did not deliver up those Lands which had been assign'd amongst the Gauls to his Predecessors by the Emperour Theodosius, he would return into Italy with such a Power, that it should be difficult for all the Forces of the Empire to drive him out. A Truce being thus concluded on, and Alaric being departed out of the Empire without committing any Act of Hostility: Stilicon return'd with his Army towards Rome, where we arriv'd two years after our departure thence.

Your Majesty may easily judge the excess of my Master's Joy, seeing himself now upon the point again to enjoy the presence of Placidia, after so long an absence, and to see her in such an estate as might make him hope she would have some consideration for him, since he had by his Renowned Deeds so gloriously perform'd the promises which he had made her, and answer'd the hopes she had conceiv'd of him. During the whole Voyage, he made me sensible of his contentment, both by his countenance and by his words; all those expressions with which an impatient Love could make eloquent a passionate Lover, never came near what I heard him say on this occasion. In sum, we arriv'd at the great City, all the People in a manner coming out to meet us; for the Emperour had commanded a reception for Stilicon, worthy the Fame which he had achiev'd in this Voyage, and the considerations he had for him.

He was pleas'd himself to view the Honours of this Triumph: but Stilicon, who knew himself expos'd to envy by reason of his great Authority, and which he would employ to establish his Grandeur, refus'd this Honour with an apparent Modesty. However the Emperour himself, either to honour his Father-in-law, or to have the pleasure to behold his Arrival, came to meet him to the very Gates of the City, in a most magnificent Chariot, open on all sides; having near him the Empress Termantia his Wife, and Daughter of Stilicon, and for more Ornament the incomparable Placidia, whose Beauty was so much augmented in these two years, that I who beheld her with no other interest than that of my Master, was astonish'd: and truly she appeared to me with so Majestick a Lustre, that I believ'd nothing in the World could equalize her.

For Constance, he was struck in such a manner, that he had no eyes for any other Object, and wholly abandon'd himself to an entire view of what he so religiously ador'd. He march'd on the left hand of Stilicon, cover'd with most magnificent Armour, and mount'd upon one of the fairest Horses in the World, which he govern'd with a surpassing grace: The People and all the Court, who had before heard the fame of his great Actions, seeing him so nobly beautiful, fix'd their eyes upon him as the only Object worthy regard: Nor were the eyes of Placidia less fix'd upon him, because she now with joy beheld him, what she had desired him to be: Stilicon with the rest that were about him, of whom my Master was the nearest, alighted from their Horses, when they drew nigh the Chariot of the

Emperour,

Emperour, to do him becoming reverence; who having affectionately embrac'd Stilicon, receiv'd the rest with a pleasing sweetness only natural to himself; but to my Master he gave particular Careffes, and in a few words exalted to the Skies the fame of his first Achievements.

After the Emperour, they saluted the Empress and the Princess Placidia: but here it was that Constance seem'd wholly struck dumb with amazement. He kiss'd the Verge of her Robe, without speaking one word; which might be attributed to his great respect, as well as to any other cause: But the Princess, whose mind was not burthen'd with a passion like his, having her spirit more free, receiv'd him with the most obliging expressions in the World, remembering the Emperour of the judgment which she always had of him, and of what she had foretold, that day when she gave him the Sword as a Reward for his Combats at the Marriage of the Emprcs.

Though it seem'd that love did wholly possess the Soul of my Master, yet the Sentiments of Nature did likewise find their place, which he shew'd by rendring in this occasion to the affection of a loving Father, all that a virtuous Son and naturally excellent could pay to respect or paternal love; and the old Constance was so much satisfied with all the Actions and the whole Person of his Son, that he could hardly contain that joy he resent'd.

The same Night My Master went to see the Princess, and received greater Careffes in her Chamber, than he had done in her Chariot; she particularized to him all that she had heard of his great Actions, and declared to him the interest she had taken, and was oblig'd to take in them: but there was so many present, and particularly Euchere, who departed last, that my Master could never have one word of private discourse with her, though he judg'd well by the eyes of the Princess, that she much desir'd it; which made him resolve to pass into another Chamber, to entertain himself with Virginia; and the Princess seeing him upon departure, came to him, and told him in his ear, You know well the thanks I have to return you for having so well preserv'd Euchere for me. I was bound to do it at that time (answered my Master) and moreover, you told me that you did not at all desire his death. Placidia return'd to her place without returning farther answer, and my Master pass'd into another Chamber with Virginia, who had a great desire to entertain him.

This virtuous Lady gave him all the Testimonies of an entire friendship, that he could desire, and receiv'd from him the like assurances; and at length they began to talk of those Letters, which had been sent between the one and the other, during the War, as that which they both desir'd to discourse of. Virginia press'd Constance in such manner, and did so well expound the terms of his Letters, that in the end she forc'd him to confess the love which he bore to Placidia: she brought him the more willingly to make this confession, because besides the confidence he had in her discretion and friendship, he found in her no inclinations to condemn his passion. In effect, Virginia did not at all blame him, but told him that these thoughts were worthy of his great courage, and that if there were any man worthy of Placidia (as she believ'd the Emperour, according to the Example of his Ancestors, would prefer a Noble Roman before a King of the Barbarians) there could be none so deserving of her as Constance: But when he pray'd her to tell him with sincerity, if she believ'd that the Princess had perceiv'd his love, or that she had given her any notice out of the suspicions she had from his Letters; I know better how to manage the interests of my Friends (answered she) and I never believ'd I could do it without putting your repose into great hazard; not that the Princess hath not a far greater esteem for you than for any man in the World, or that she doth not accompany this esteem with an affection that makes her desire your advantages as if you were her Brother; but because I know that though her spirit be highly sweet and pleasant, yet she is so great an enemy to all amorous attempts, that I have always seen her condemn with so much severity those persons that suffer them, that I never durst disclose to her any thing of your passion, had I believ'd that you would have approv'd my doing it; and if it must be that she must know it, as a thing that cannot be avoided, I am not a little troubled, how to adventure on so great a difficulty. Constance was somewhat perplex'd at these words of Virginia's, though he was before, himself, sensible of the most part of what she had told him; but he lost not his courage and resolution to serve Placidia even to death.

In this time, the Court was extremely sorrowful, and in a great perplexity, for the News that arriv'd of the death of the Emperour Arcadius: he di'd in the City of Constantinople, aged only thirty two years; and left for his Successor the young Theodosius, his Son; the rest of his Family being compos'd of the Princesses Flavilla, Marina, and the Renounced Fulcheria: But because Theodosius was only ten or eleven years old, the Emperour his Father had at his death desired the great Isdigerdes King of the Persians, whose friendship he had prov'd to be sincere and loyal during his life, to be his Tutor, and protect his tender youth, against those enemies which his greatness might stir up. The King of the Persians, who is the Father of the same Prince Varranes whom you saw to day, accepted the tuition of the young Theodosius, and acquitted himself with an unexpressible fidelity: And because the greatness of his Dignity, and of his Empire, would not permit him in person to pass out of his own Dominions to Constantinople, he sent a Governour to the young Prince named Antiochus, a man adorn'd with all great virtues, who with a marvellous diligence hath not only educated the young Prince in all the exercises of virtue, but govern'd his Empire with infinite prudence, and defended it not only from Foreign invasions, but Intestine broils.

But to this general sorrow of the Court of Rome, Constance was constrain'd to add a particular one, for about that time his Father also departed this life, leaving him so sensible of his death, that for a long time he was not in a condition to receive any consolation; he lost his Mother in his youngest years, and owing to his Father only all the diligence of a noble and excellent Education, he could not lose him without feeling those due resentments, which a grief of that cruel nature can infuse into the mind: He was visited by the Emperour, and all his Court; and the Princess Placidia, whose Sex hindered her from rendering him that civility, sent several times to him, and assured him of the share she had in his grief; and indeed it was from Placidia that he receiv'd his only consolation, while love alone strove to be the Mistress of his Soul, by banishing all other passions: In the end it wrought its effect, and having in a small time overcome his grief, return'd Constance into his former estate, and rendred him capable of that conversation and society which his sorrows had depriv'd him of: But though love had so powerful a force over his grief, yet his grief had not the same power over his love, which never a whit abated nor diminish'd the violence of its fury; yet he serv'd himself often with that pretence before Placidia, to cover the true cause of that change which his sufferings had caus'd in his humour, and in his Countenance; and the Princess often attributed it to that passion though it proceeded from one far more violent and imperious.

In effect, the Amorous Constance consum'd and dy'd, without daring to complain; nor was he constrain'd only to restrain his words, but knowing the lively and piercing spirit of the Princess, to rule his actions in such sort, that when she should examine them with the greatest rigour, they might be attributed only to respect, though it was a particular respect, and which, though extraordinary, might well be defended. This restraint tormented him cruelly, and forc'd him many times into a melancholy, which nothing could divert; yet of all the Divertisements that were in Rome he had still the better part, nor was there scarce any thing of importance done without him. The Emperour had caus'd to be restor'd unto him all the goods of his Ancestors; and to the Government of Illyria which his Father had possessed, he added that of Dalmatia, which was a great Revenue: and he finding himself in an estate to defray a Princely expence, did it with so much of Magnificence, Grandeur, and true Liberality, that there was nothing else talkt of at Rome; nor was there ever person that us'd the blessings of Fortune so splendidly and so generously as he did: His noble and wise management of things gave him still more and more an esteem in Placidia's breast, but still she was ignorant that he dy'd for her, and with all the greatness of his courage he had not so much boldness as to discover that burning secret.

In the mean time, Euchere continu'd his pursuits with a great deal of diligence, but with little fruit; and instead of making progress upon the spirit of Placidia, Time and his services seem'd rather to banish him thence: not that Euchere was a man wholly despicable; he was sufficiently couragious, and bore something of a noble mind; but there seem'd to be a kind of drowlinefs upon his spirit, and some parts of his person were not altogether so amiable. But he was the Son of a Favourite who abus'd his Fortune, and usurp'd an unjust Authority over the Imperial Family; and this was enough to make Placidia hate him. Stilicon judging that this Princess would approve of his Sons suit sooner, if the Emperour express'd his willingness to it, than by his own motion, spoke to Honorius, and press'd him by all the reputation he had with him, to serve him with all the power he had with Placidia, and to finish the honour of his house with that remaining Alliance, since he had so happily begun it. Honorius who with age had acquir'd more constancy and resolution than formerly, or who perhaps now began to repent of the Command he had given Stilicon over his very inclinations, at first would not himself at all speak to the Princess concerning her marriage with Euchere, having observ'd several times times that the proposal was displeasing to her; but in the end, Stilicon having unfortunately urg'd him, he spoke to her, and in such manner, as made her know he desir'd it; yet the Princess who very well knew her Brother, and very well consider'd that he was not a person of a humour to do her violence, answer'd him with a futable courage; and having represented unto him that Stilicon desir'd not these Alliances in his house, but only to raise him to a power sufficient to usurp the Empire, as without doubt he had an intention; she protested in sum, that if he would leave her to her liberty, which she hop'd his goodness would perswade him to do, she would never give an example of such baseness to the Princesses of the blood, by yielding that the Daughter of the great Theodosius, should become the Daughter-in-Law of Stilicon.

This answer, instead of provoking the spirit of the Emperour, which naturally was all compos'd of sweetness, tortifi'd him in the design which he had already begun, to abridge in some part the Authority which he had permitted Stilicon to grasp both over the Empire, and his own person. And when he return'd him the Answer, and likewise to the Empress his Daughter (who as much as lay in her endeavour'd to advance the interest of her Brother) having testified to them the repugnancy Placidia had to such a Marriage, he added that he would not at all hinder Euchere from endeavouring to gain the heart of the Princess by his love and services, but that no consideration should induce him to offer violence to his Sister. Stilicon and his Son were much discourag'd by this Answer, but not at all desisted their intentions, hoping that either time, or the power of Stilicon, would change the spirit either of the Sister or the Brother.

In the mean time, the passionate Constance remain'd a disconsolate lover, without daring to speak; so much did the respect and knowledge of the averfeness of Placidia cowardize him in this occasion; and I believe, out of meer respect, he for many years had never open'd his mouth, though he had judg'd the hazard greater than he could have undergone. Amongst the persons with whom he held the chief converse, Virginia had the first degree; and as she had the cognizance of all that pass'd within his heart, so he preferr'd her company before that of any other persons, and visited her constantly every day, except he saw her with the Princess; the rather, because his spirit being wholly compos'd of love, he could unwillingly entertain any other discourse but of Placidia and his passion. At those hours when he could not (detain'd by affairs of State) wait upon Virginia, he us'd to write to her certain short Letters, in which he still made mention of the Princess, and the great love he bare her. Placidia us'd often to visit Virginia; and one day being gone to her house, to see her, 'twas told the Princess that she was gone abroad; but the servants of the house understanding the respect due to the Princess, intreated her to enter into the Chamber of Virginia whilst they went to search her. Placidia stay'd for some time in the Chamber, with those Ladies that attended her; but by chance seeing the door of the Closet open, she alone went in; and seating her self in a Chair by the Table, she happen'd to spy there certain papers, and amongst the rest cast her eyes upon a little Note which Virginia had that day receiv'd from my Master, and which she had by mistake left there, for she us'd always to lock them up carefully. The Princesses great love and assurance of the affection of Virginia, made her believe that she would not be at all troubled, if she should view any Letters writ to her; therefore taking up the Note, she presently knew it to be the writing of Constance, which she had often seen (though he had never taken the liberty to write to her) and of whom she had often demanded Verses, and several other pastimes of his ingenuity. The respect she had for him, and the knowledge she had of the acuteness of his writing, made her more willing to read the Note, in which she found these words, or somewhat to this purpose.

Constance to Virginia.

SHall I suffer all my life without speaking? and shall I not at length give a period to that silence which has been my prejudice already for so many years? Nothing is more Sacred, nothing more Religious, and nothing more Dutiful than my Love, yet notwithstanding I am constrained to expel it from me as a crime; however I will not complain of my destiny; 'tis the most glorious and fairest of the world; though I must needs say it hath something in it of cruelty, if whilst I dye for the fair Placidia, it is not permitted me to let her know I dye for her.

The Princess concluded the reading of this Letter with no small astonishment, accompanied with divers different thoughts which it will be difficult to imagine, or represent: for though she knew her self Sister of both the Oriental and Occidental Emperours, and was sensible there was none whose birth could equalize her, yet she had so great an esteem for the virtue, and especially for the extract of my Master, that she could not entertain a despising thought of him; and besides, as she look'd upon him as a personage already raised to the height of glory, and adorn'd with admirable qualities, so she remembered that he was descended of a house that had bred many great Potentates to the Empire, and had once rul'd in the same height and degree as those of her Family. For which reasons she could not consider his love as an affront, or conceive any violent resentment against him; but when she suffer'd her self to be led away by the natural repugnancy which she had all her life against love, and that inward detestation which she bore unto it, she was in such sort incens'd against Constance, that she thought she could never pardon him. Soon after she made reflection of all those marks of friendship she had shew'd him; and finding he accus'd her of cruelty, she grew angry, and blushing either through shame or vexation, or both, He hath (said she, throwing the Note upon the Table) ingrately abus'd the effects of my goodness; and it is my goodness only which hath given him courage to offend me; but I shall know how henceforward to deny my self that innocent manner of living; and living henceforth with more reserve, I shall keep men perhaps within those bounds of respect which they owe to my degree and person.

She was in this parley with her self when Virginia, who came with all diligence to wait on her, entred into the Closet. She accosted the Princess according to her accustom'd manner, and expected from her those caresses which she ordinarily made her: but on the contrary she wondred much to find her so cold and serious, and markt signs of discontent and anger as well in her eyes, as overspread through all her countenance. Having beheld her in this condition for sometime with infinite trouble and grief, she was about to open her mouth to demand the cause; but when casting her eyes upon the Table, she saw the short Note from Constance lying open, she now no longer doubted of the truth; and suffering her self to be transported by her first thoughts, Poor Constance (said she) I did well foresee thy misfortune, but I never believ'd it should happen to thee by my fault! She stopp'd at these words, holding her eyes fixed to the ground, with a countenance which sufficiently denoted her disquiet; when the Princess, who was risen from her chair, and had walked three or four turns in the Closet, beholding her with all that regret which her natural sweetness, and the love she bore her would permit; And well, Virginia (said she) do you then keep intelligence with those persons that offend me? And who are those that offend you? answered Virginia: In truth, Madam, if you are offended by Constance, I know not by whom you are honour'd, nor by whom in the world you can be served. In sum, replied the Princess, you know my humour, and since you had the knowledge of his folly, you should either have cured it, or else have prevented its coming to mine. If it is come to yours, replied Virginia, you see by what accident it is arrived, and it is by some fatality that I forgot this Note, contrary to my ordinary custom to lock them up carefully: he himself can inform you, that it is by my counsel that Constance hath suffered a long time without speaking, though in truth this counsel was not at all necessary for a man, who would rather endure death, than run the least danger of displeasing you; but to endeavour to cure his passion had been the greatest vanity I could attempt; and if you will permit me, Madam, I dare avow that I never essay'd it, and that besides the inclination I naturally had to approve it, I have believed that if any man might aspire to you, that presumption was pardonable in none but Constance, who in all things is to be prefer'd before any Barbarian King.

Placidia would have been troubled at these words, if her moderation, and the friendship she had for Virginia, could have permitted her; however she would have testified that they were not acceptable, and was perhaps opening her mouth for that design, when Constance himself entred into the Closet, the door being open; by the commandment of Placidia he used this freedom with her when she was to be visited, and he believed he might take the same liberty with Virginia; Placidia had not disapproved it at any other time, but for the present she could not dissemble the displeasure which the sight of him caus'd, in a moment wherein of force she must either break into an anger with him, or cruelly restrain her self from doing it. Constance incontinently knew both by her Countenance, and Virginia's, that something had happen'd, which displeas'd the Princess; but he believ'd not himself at all to be the cause of the displeasure she testified, but judging rather to avoid the pursuit of Fuchere, and the Authority of Stilicom, he concern'd himself was accustomed, but thereby so much the more he still perceiv'd greater marks in the eyes of Placidia than he ever yet beheld. This deeply touch'd h proaching to her with a behaviour full of all respect, Madam, said he, Please to pardon me if I cannot see you afflicted without demanding if it be possible that I could be so happy to find some occasion to serve you in the cause of your grief.

Placidia, who in any other rencounter would have answered him the most obligingly in the world, would not yet abandon her self to the violence of her first thoughts, which perhaps might be too passionate, nor dissemble the resentment she had against him; but without returning an answer, continu'd still walking without speaking a word, and made him judge by a glance full of anger, that he himself might be the cause of that change of her humour. That thought made him remain astonish'd, and like one half dead, leaning against the Tapistry of the Closet, and looking sometimes on the Princess, and sometimes upon Virginia, to see what he might farther learn. As he had nothing upon his conscience which might make him fear, but his love of Placidia; and that he had often feared that which had this day fell out by an accident he had not foreseen, he remained not long time before he imagined the truth, by chance casting his eyes upon the Table to which he was very nigh; and seeing his Letter open, which at first sight he knew, he ceas'd to question the true cause of Placidia's anger. The knowledge whereof made him much more confus'd than before, he remaining in the posture of a person convinc'd of some great crime; and had Placidia minded his behaviour, she had certainly found somewhat therein to appease her, and touch her with a compassion; but she walked without regarding him, while her resentment and natural goodnels and moderation, fiercely combated in her breast how to govern her self; for besides the opposition she naturally had to violence, she knew well that it must be with a great deal of pain and difficulty that she could be offended against a person whom she had always particularly and tenderly esteem'd.

Constance remained a great while without daring to speak, but in the end not being able to master his grief, nor presuming yet to address his words to the incens'd Princess: Oh Virginia! (cried he) ought you to have expos'd me as you have done, to the anger of the Princess, and to such an anger as your self well foresaw? Chance only (answered Virginia) hath expos'd you, and not my will; nor are you more surpris'd than I was, at this unhappy effect of my bad memory. After these words, they all kept some time of silence, till in the end Constance calling to his assistance all his courage, advanc'd some paces towards the Princess, who had taken a seat; and bending one knee before her, Madam (said he) If I have been so unhappy, as to displease you, I would willingly dye to expiate my fault; and death will without doubt be more agreeable to me, than a life odious to you. I desire not your death, (replied the Princess, without turning her head towards him) but should be much afflicted at it; but if you can pass the rest of your life without seeing me, you will much oblige me. I shall pass it so without doubt (replied Constance) if you ordain it so by the power you have over me: for nothing can be so cruel, nor so dismal as to hinder my obedience to you.

Constance spake these words with so sad an aspect, and with a voice which express'd something so passionate, that the Princess mov'd at it, turned her head towards him with a behaviour more charming, than she seem'd before incens'd. I shall never desire any thing cruel for you, said she, but I could not have wish'd that you had not lost the respect you owe me, and that you had not ungratefully abus'd those innocent marks I gave you of my esteem for you. If I have either abus'd them, replied Constance, *or been wanting in the respect I owe you, I am worthy of all your anger; nor do I demand any pardon for a fault which can never merit it; but if my fault consists either in what I have felt, or what I have testifi'd, I dare to say, if you will permit it, that I believe my self innocent; and that having never had any thoughts for you, which your self would condemn if they were well known to you; yet I have still conceal'd them as if they had been criminal: All my past actions sufficiently justify this truth; and this very Letter which causes my disgrace, and which cannot be suspected by you, since apparently it ought not to have been seen by you, may suffice to denote to you that my intention was to adore you without giving you the least knowledge of it. I confess I am unworthy to lift up my eyes to the Sister and Daughter of my Emperour; but where are the men that can merit her; or who is he in whom she can suffer this presumptuous thought, if it be not with a respect and a submission like mine? 'Tis not to day alone that I have been faulty, if I be to day faulty: for ever since that day on which you honour'd me with this Sword, which I have the glory to carry, no occasion neither in war nor peace could one moment divert me from the adoration of our great Princess: but would to God that she could see within my heart what have still been the thoughts my love hath produced; and I assure my self that this knowledge would appease an anger which my ill fortune hath drawn upon me. I have still conceal'd them to all the earth, innocent as they were, though the presumption of Stilicon's Son, make him dare to serve you openly, whilst I not daring so much as to sigh for fear to render my sighs suspicious, have ex-*

pos'd

pos'd my self to the most tormenting griefs imaginable. Virginia her self, who only in the world knows this secret, learnt it of me by surprize.

Constance spake in this manner, and the Princess, who notwithstanding her displeasure found reason in his discourse, and had but little of her own to contradict it, permitted him to speak without interruption. Virginia joyn'd with him to assist him in his justification, and spake so many things to the Princess, that she appeas'd part of her anger; she consented not that Constance should continue to speak to her of his love, of which she said she had too much knowledge; but that he should see her as he had been accustom'd, and in the mean time she left him not without hopes, that if by his actions he could advance himself to such an estate as might make the Emprour agree to his passion, she would not be contrary to it. This was all the favour he could at present draw from her: but as he had never hop'd so much, and had never desir'd more, he was in such a measure satisfi'd, or rather so much transported with joy, that though arm'd with all his moderation he could scarce contain it.

He had reason to be satisfied (said Pharamond to Valerius, interrupting him) especially with a Princess of the degree and humour of Placidia, and I find him already much advanced; but it is for great merits only like his, to produce extraordinary effects; and the unhappy ought not to accuse any but themselves for their ill fortune. He pronounced these words with a sigh; and Valerius seeing that it was already late, and fearing to give him any farther distance, would have remitted the remainder of his relation till the next day; but the Prince, who by some time of use had got a habit of sitting up, finding himself not at all inclin'd to sleep, pray'd him to continue his discourse; which Valerius did in this manner.

The end of the First Book.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

After that day (for I must omit in my Discourse several particulars, which would render it too tedious) my Master found his condition much different from what it had till that time been: for though the Princess did not give him the liberty which he might hope for to entertain his passion, but made him carry towards her a greater circumspection than he had hitherto done; yet the assurance that he had that his love was known and not disapproved, render'd him as much satisfi'd as if he had been encompass'd with all imaginable felicity. He saw Placidia every day, though he durst not use with her that familiarity which he had formerly done; and she did her self debar her self of those little liberties which she had been accustom'd to use with a person she did not all suspect; but time and his deserts begot in her somewhat more of favour, and by little and little by his respect and complacency, and the assistance of Virginia, she at first suffered, that his eyes should continually speak his love, and at length that his lips might presume to utter it; but 'twas seldom that she suffer'd this last; and his words were then accompanied with so profound an observance, and so absolute a respect, that the most strict severity could not condemn the least thing in him.

Constance

Constance satisfi'd with this happy beginning, resolv'd to owe the rest to his virtue, and render himself such by his Valour, that he might merit the approbation of Honorius. In this design his inclination agreed with his passion: for the love he had for Placidia, could not be greater than that he had for glory. So that equally animated by these two passions, he sought all occasions to acquire his ends in both, and render himself considerable. Fortune offered him an occasion not long time after, news coming to Rome, that Arduric King of the Gepides, and Arcaces King of the Alanes, with a mighty Army entred into Spain; and that they believed that Gunderic King of the Vandals was to follow them by the way of Hispania Beticæ: so that the Emperour found himself oblig'd to send a powerful Army into Spain, if he would not resolve to leave it a prey to the Barbarians, who had already promised themselves the conquest of that Country. 'Twas soon resolv'd to send this Army, but it took up some time to debate what Captain they should choose on so important an occasion. Stilicon expressed an averfiness to the Voyage; which made those that had accused him with the Barbarians invasion of the Empire, believe that he would not go fight against those men which himself had call'd in, for fear lest they seeing him march against them, should discover his intelligence with them; but others who judg'd more favourably did say, and with much more likelihood, that seeing his power over the inclinations of the Emperour began to fail, and fearing lest his absence might wholly lose it, he would not absent himself from his person, but resolv'd to wait on him more diligently than before, to preserve by his presence, that which his enemies might ruine should he part from Rome; whatever was the reason he stay'd, yet he gave order with great diligence to provide a puissant Army to march for Spain.

In the mean time the Emperour consulted with him, what General he ought to chuse; and though there were at Rome, a great number of famous men who had already commanded Armies with sufficient glory, and that Constance had not yet been a General, nor was past twenty four years of Age; yet the Emperour had so much regard to those great Actions he had done under Stilicon, to the report which Stilicon himself had made of his capacity to command an Army, and to his high Extraction, that considering him with a respect above all others, he preferr'd him to the Conduct of this Mighty Army. The inclination which the Emperour had for him, did much contribute to this command: but others have believed that Stilicon beginning to conceive some Eclipse from the greatness and merit of Constance, willingly condescended to find the means to send him away upon this fair occasion, and therefore in stead of appearing disgusted at his Honour, testifi'd by this means his affection, and the acknowledgment he had of his Sons safety, for which he confessed himself to be considerably engag'd to his Valour. In sum, my Master, thus preferr'd before all other pretenders, was nominated General in this important Expedition; and for the reasons I have already alledg'd, receiv'd that employment with an unimaginable joy; the hopes he had to advance himself to a degree worthy of Placidia, making him lay aside the grief he conceiv'd at parting from her.

He prepared to depart with all diligence possible; and by his liberality, and natural Magnanimity, caus'd to be prepar'd the most sumptuous and magnificent equipage, that Rome had for many Ages beheld: All those that accompani'd him in this Expedition, expressing a great deal of joy, caus'd both by the affection which all the World bore him, and the advantages which he had gain'd by his sweetness, and by his obliging humour, over the hearts of all men. One part of the Troops were to march with him out of Italy; and the rest were called out of the Provinces, to join with him before he came to the Frontiers of Spain, where was to be the Rendezvous of the whole Army, which consisted of near forty thousand men.

At length the day of his departure arriv'd; and after having taken leave of the Emperour, he went to render the same duty to the Princess Placidia: but on that occasion, he could not preserve his resolutions absolutely firm; for though he undertook this Expedition as a thing he had ardently desir'd, yet during these preparations for the same, he could not forget to testify often to the Princess, that though he went with infinite joy to serve his Prince, which might render him worthy to serve her, yet he could not at this separation defend himself from so violent a grief, that he was forced to make use of all his courage to support it. He said now nothing to the Princess concerning his passion for her, both because that he found her then taken up in Company, (not having yet so much favour as to oblige her to give him a particular audience) and for that the Emperour himself came whilst he was there, and after many obliging Caresses told him that he came once more to see him for that short time; but within few minutes perceiving the Princess alone, at a Window upon which she leaned, he adventured to tell her, her, That she was the Aim to which he directed all his enterprizes, and that he would not breath, but to think continually on her. Placidia had the goodness to return Answer, That she would condescend to any thing might serve to advantage his glory, and that she could never have any greater joy than to bear that his Valour was seconded by Fortune, whilst he might hope for any assistance he could desire of her. If it be so (replied Constance) I promise you Madam, that I will return vanquisher of the Enemies of the Empire: for if in fighting against them I can have the honour to be owned by you, they can never have Forces powerful enough to resist me. I promise you at least (answered the Princess) that my prayers shall be favourable to you, nor shall those that I make only be for the interest of the Empire and Emperour. Virginia shall testify at your return (continued she in making sign to Virginia to draw near) and let you know that in all things I desire your advantage. She could say no more without having other witnesses of her discourse; and my Master having bid her farewell with a Countenance which sufficiently denoted his passion, had that consolation, to discover in hers that she was not altogether insensible. You see Sir, that I abridge my discourse in things of small importance, and I shall do the same in the recital of the Wars, that I may have the advantage to stay longer upon things more particular, and more worthy your attention.

We parted from Rome with a flourishing Army, which accompanied Constance with an infinite joy, highly satisfi'd to serve under so famous and belov'd a General. In few days we met with the nearest of those Troops that were to joyn with us, and in few days more we were imbody'd with the rest; so that Constance with no small content beheld himself at the head of his whole Army: At the entrance of the Frontiers he was strengthened by the joyning of above ten thousand men of the Country whom fear had made desert their habitations, rather than be expos'd to the fury of the Barbarians; and in few days the same reasons drove many others in to us; so that at our Approach to the Frontiers, our Army consisted of more than sixty thousand fighting men. This reinforcement of so many armed men, and of a warlike Nation, was very necessary: for we understood that the Enemies Army consisted of no less than one hundred thousand, I mean that of the Alains and Gepides: for Gunderic, who had threatned us, was not yet come; and my Master used all diligence possible to come to a Battel with these, before the Vandals should arrive. To which purpose he gave all requisite orders, and not such as could be expected from a young Warriour, but from an old and experienc'd Captain; and having regulated with an infinite prudence the disorders of the Frontiers, and confirm'd the people as he pass'd in their obedience and fealty they ought to the Emperour, he march'd towards the Enemy with an admirable assurance; and they knowing themselves stronger than we in number of men, were marching towards us before they were advertis'd of our Advance, and in a large place on the Banks of the River Hebre, presented us Battel.

Constance, though less in number, confid'd in the valour of his Souldiers; the greatest part of which had serv'd in the War against the Goths, and therefore despising the Barbarians multitudes, refus'd not the Combate; but having rang'd his Troops in an admirable order, and encourag'd the whole Army with an eloquent Oration, he caus'd the Signal to be given. I will not spend time in telling you the particulars of a Battel, of which you already know the success; it was for some time doubtful, and disput'd with much bloodshed; but at length Victory courted us, and remained firm on our side: we lost ten thousand men, but slew forty thousand Enemies. Night made the slaughter cease; and during the darkness, Arderic and Araces, to dissemble their flight, having made many great fires in their Camp, dislodg'd their men, and pass'd over a Bridge of the River somewhat distant from thence, well known to them, and which they broke down as soon as they had pass'd. Constance to whom the Country was unknown, would not pursue his Victory during the Night, which was extreme obscure, nor engage his men in that darkness, hoping at the return of day to renew the fight, if the Enemies would abide it; or if they fled, follow them by day-light with more safety, than in that great obscurity. But in the morning he was much troubled when he understood that they were pass'd the River, and had broken the Bridge, so that he could not follow them to the other side, but by another at a small Village distant a great days march: Yet he comforted himself in this mischance, with the hopes he had to overtake them in few days, or force them to quit Spain; and having employ'd that day in interring the dead, dressing the wounded, and other affairs which may bulie the care of a General after so important a Battel, he march'd to the Bridge where he might pass the River, and from thence directly to the place where he had advice the Enemies were retir'd.

But they would not hazard a second Battel; and the two Kings being both understanding Warriours, did so serve themselves of the advantages they had gain'd in the Country, of the Forts and Cities which were in their power, and of the posts and passages which they had fortified, and so well delayed time, in expectation of a reinforcement from their Country or Allies, that they made us lose the season of the year; and the Winter approaching incommodious by reason of the great Rains, we were constrained to quit the Field, and to retire into the Cities, after they had done the like into those that were under their obedience: In the mean time on all opportunities that every day offered, Constance testifi'd a perfect intelligence in warlike affairs, and order'd and executed all things with a valour accompani'd with so much prudence, as might already place him in a degree equal to the most great and famous Captains. He had many valiant men in his Army, and had given the Conduct of his Cavalry to the command of two young men, of the greatness of whose valour he had good reason to hope, and of whose capacity to manage warlike affairs he had seen evident proofs. These were Artabure and Arcobinde, whose reputation began to spread it self through the World, and particularly that of Artabure, who had signaliz'd himself by a great number of renowned Actions.

During the Winter, Constance attempted several Enterprizes (as many as the season of the year would permit) and so diligently prosecuted them, that a great part of the Cities revolted from the Enemy, and put themselves under our protection; so that they had hardly any other places left to retire to, when the season should again admit them to come into the field. But why do I amuse you with the recital of things which you already know? To be brief, I will tell you in two words, that towards the end of the Winter, the Enemy having receiv'd a recruit of near thirty thousand men, quitted the Towns and places of their retreat, again resolving to try their Fortune; but it was so little favourable to them, that they were defeated in two great Battels, the last of which was so entire, that King Ardaric had much ado to save himself with seven or eight hundred Horse; King Arcaces was slain upon the place, and the whole Army cut in pieces, before Constance his compassion could stop the fury of his Souldiers.

After these great Victories, all the Forces that were garison'd in the Cities which the Enemies had taken, desir'd liberty to retire, and deliver'd the places into the hands of Constance; and all those of the Country, who either voluntarily, or through fear of the Barbarians had imbrac'd their party, and endeavour'd to shake off the yoke of the Empire, became humble Suitors to the clemency of Constance, who receiv'd them with an humanity only proper to himself; so that before the beginning of the succeeding Winter, there remain'd nothing to complete an entire peace to those Provinces. And the victorious Constance, after having gained three great Battels, made several considerable fights, and reduc'd more than thirty Towns to the obedience of the Emperour, was about to return to Rome, with hope to be received there, as the most great and most Triumphant Captain that ever entred those Gates, when he had advice that Gunderic King of the Vandals was entred into Betica, and had already made himself Master of many important places.

This News had afflicted him, if it had not given him occasions to acquire glory, and render himself more worthy of Placidia, with whom in all dangerous and perilous Enterprizes, his thoughts were still busied. In all Combates he invoked her name as a Divinity which govern'd the success of his Battels; and in all charges which he gave, turning himself towards me, who was always near his Person, and the only of his Confidants that had knowledge of his Love: Valerius, (said he) 'Tis to day that I must render my self worthy of Placidia, and raise my self to that degree whither merit can only raise me. Hitherto he durst never write to her, nor ever had permission; but when he saw himself depriv'd of hope to see her in the time which he once expected, and engaged in another War, which perhaps would be more durable than the former, he adventur'd to address a Letter to her; but it was in such respectful terms, and in such a manner as he might run the least hazard to displease her: for he resolv'd to send his Letter to Virginia, praying her in that which he writ to her, to give it to the Princess if she found it convenient, or if she believ'd she would pardon his presumption; but to burn or keep it, if she thought the contrary: with this precaution, he presumed to write to this effect:

Constance to the Princess Placidia.

Though it be already an Age that I have been absent from you, yet I should contemnedly endure the end of my Exile, rather than endanger the displeasing of you, if I did not see it prolong'd by those occasions which will render it without doubt much more tedious. I had patience till the end of that War which I was sent to finish; but since I must now march to a second, perhaps likely to hold longer than the first, Pardon me, great Princess, if I hazard to make a new protestation of my subjection: that which I suffer by so cruel a banishment, may merit that pardon, which I hope from your goodness, for a person that doth what is possible to render himself worthy only to serve you: Permit him to preserve his glorious hopes, if you will have him be invincible, and to believe that what he shall do for the Empire cannot be displeasing to you. That sweet hope will fortifie me against so rigorous a banishment, and will preserve him from all dangers, who ought never to die, but for the divine Placidia.

He sent this Letter by him whom he dispatch'd to Rome to advise the Emperour of the entrance of Gunderic into Spain, and of his design to fight him; which he put himself in a posture to do with all diligence possible: and seeing his Army a little weakened, by the Battels which he had fought, and by the hardships they had suffered; he drew together the most affectionate and most warlike of the people, and acted with so much diligence, that in less than a month he put his Army into a better estate than they were since their first entrance into Spain: Yet his Forces did not near equalize the number of Gunderic's; and therefore Constance knowing that he had now to do with men more valiant, and a more famous Captain than those he came to conquer, resolv'd to observe more wariness against him, than he had against the Gepides and the Alams: He grounded this resolution upon reason; for besides that he knew the Vandals to be numerous and warlike, he was certain that Gunderic was a prudent and experienc'd Soldier, against whom it behov'd him to use the best of his martial skill: He therefore not only march'd in good order towards them; but when he approach'd them, chose his posts with great diligence, which made the old Officers of his Army, most of whom had serv'd under Theodosius, admire his great understanding in War.

At his entrance into Betica, he received Letters from Rome; and by those of the Emperour, and Stilicon, who likewise writ to him, he found the great satisfaction and acknowledgment of Honorius; and the effect which his great Victories had won the minds of all the Romans; while he understood with what Praises they had extoll'd his great actions: but though these caused some motions of joy in him, yet it was not so sensible as what he received from a little Letter, which he found within a Letter which Virginia writ him, and which he knew to be writ with Placidia's own hand. The extasie of his own joy was so great, that before reading of it he was forc'd to shew twenty actions of a passionate lover, little agreeable to his natural reservedness. In the end he read these words:

The Princess Placidia to Constance.

I Ought not to pardon a liberty which you have taken without my consent: but what ought we not to pardon to so great a person, the Vanquisher of so many thousands of our enemies, and renowned for so many famous Victories? I at least owe this complacency to the Emperour and to the Empire whom you so successfully serve: And willingly do I continue my vows for you, since I perceive they are not unprofitable. I am likewise content to have a share in your great actions, since you desire it, and to keep you in my remembrance, since you have so well deserved it: return Conquerour, and return quickly if it be possible, and believe that both from the one and the other, I shall receive an infinite joy.

Never did the most favourable, the most tender, and the most obliging Letters give so much content to the most passionate lover, as these few lines gave my Master: and as he never hid from me the effects which love wrought upon his mind, so he express'd to me his present content by terms and actions, which made me judge it extraordinary. Valerius (said he) fortune is favourable to me in all things; but the greatest Victories that ever we can gain over our enemies, are not so considerable to me, as the least advantage I can gain over the heart of Placidia: this is that makes us fight, this is that will make us overcome, if it be possible.

By this joy which the good success of his love gave him, his desire to engage his enemies seem'd to be encreas'd, and that he now hop'd the Victory with more assurance than he had hitherto testifi'd. In the mean he neglected not all means to prosecute them: and in our entrance into Betica, he made several successful and advantageous Skirmishes with them, which though in themselves of no great importance, yet were counted as good Omens. Gunderic had then besieg'd a place; but judging well that he could not continue the Siege in the face of our Army, he rais'd it, and march'd toward us, to gain a passage passage which was very advantageous to him: But Constance who understood his intent, having sent Artabure first to view the post, the next morning went himself; and judging it a great piece of indiscretion to attack in such a place, an Army of an hundred thousand men, drew off to the other side, making shew as if he meant to assault certain places which were under the power of the Vandals, thereby to oblige their King to dislodge from so advantageous a place. The design succeeded to his desires; and Gunderic seeing us march by, followed as a man that scorned to decline the fight, but who, as well as Constance, knew, he had need to make use of all his prudence, against a person whose glorious actions had made him rather to be fear'd than despis'd.

Winter was now good part spent; yet to be short, we passed it quite through, partly in the Field, and partly in the Cities, without coming to a general Battle, though there were many Skirmishes of importance, which might deserve a particular mention.

At the return of the Summer, the two Generals expressed their desire to come to a set fight, but both endeavour'd to get the best advantages; Constance as the less in number, and Gunderic as a Captain that would overcome: but in the end, after several removals on both sides, and daily Skirmishes of partles, Constance so well ordered his affairs, that he joyn'd with the Army of Gunderic, in a plain between two Hills, which yet was not vast enough to serve the Vandals, with all those advantages which the number of their men gave them over us; and in this place he constrained him to come to Battle: never in Spain was there a more famous Engagement fought, nor more hotly disputed; but in the end the Victory did so entirely remain on our part, that more than sixty thousand Vandals were slain upon the place, and more than ten thousand were taken prisoners: but we lost seven or eight thousand choice men. Gunderic with about thirty thousand men, of whom a good part were wounded, retired into the Mountains, covered with Woods, and from whence it would have been difficult to have forc'd him. But Constance designing to prosecute his Victory, resolv'd to besiege him in the Mountains, and to that effect stopt up all the passages, hoping to famish them in few days. His thoughts and design did not deceive him: and Gunderic having try'd several ways to retire in the night, but finding his retreat impossible, extremely press'd with the misery and hunger of his men, of whom a great part were wounded, despair'd of safety any other way than by the Generosity of Constance; to which purpose he sends a Trumpeter to demand a conference: my Master agrees to his desires, and upon his Parol, Gunderic descends the Mountains to the place appointed: by being near my Master, and witness of all their discourse, I saw the King of the Vandals, whom I found to be a person of a gallant spirit, and of a bold and noble aspect; he highly praised the Valour and prudence of Constance, confessing that it did somewhat abate his misfortunes, to be overcome by so Heroick an Enemy, and one who in so many other places had gain'd such considerable Victories; and in the end demanded of him, how he would use his fortune, and the advantage he had over him. Constance with a becoming affability represented unto him the calamity of his present condition, that he could force him with all his men to perish in few days without the loss of one man; but that he scorned to abuse his fortune, against a Prince whom he had found so couragious: That he would therefore give him leave to retire with all his men, as well those that were with him, as those that he had engarrison'd in any places, upon condition that the places were surrendered immediately to him, and that he departed out of Spain, and all the Lands and Dominions of the Empire without delay.

Gunderic returned thanks to Constance for his nobleness; and having accepted the conditions with infinite joy, he sent instant orders to those whom he had left in the Cities, to quit them and attend his retreat: Constance giving Pass-ports to them, to the end that in their retreat they should not be set upon by the people of the Country, who took the Romans part. On the morning Gunderic departed from the Mountain, and took leave of Constance, who entertain'd him at a magnificent Dinner, and to court him with an extraordinary civility, freely return'd him all the prisoners without ransom. Gunderic having highly applauded his Generosity, retir'd, and march'd without stop out of Hispania Betica, which he left so free and peaceable, as if it had never been embroy'd in War: at the Frontiers he told the Officers of those Troops that had conveyed him, that the obligation he had for the Generosity of Constance, and the esteem which he had conceiv'd for his person, was so great, that it should hinder him from returning into Spain so long as he should live, or that he could but doubt he should encounter his person; but if by chance it should happen that he had no more Constance to encounter with, he would re-invade it with a Force that all the power of the Empire should with difficulty withstand.

Constance having so gloriously and with so many memorable Victories, completed the affairs of Europe; after having employ'd some time to establish certain necessary orders, settle the Provinces in an entire tranquillity, and fortifie the people in their fidelity, he began his march towards Rome with all that satisfaction which he could receive from the glory of his actions, and the joy which his hopes to see Placidia could inspire him with; but during the time which we were in Spain, there fell out things in Italy, which it will be necessary that I tell you, that you may understand in what condition Affairs were at Rome at our arrival. The War with Spain had lasted near three years; and the four years of Truce which Stilicon had made with Alaric being expir'd, without any endeavours of the Emperour to fulfil the propositions which had been made, Alaric at the precise end of four years not seeing any effects of the hopes that were given him, with an Army stronger than the first, re-entred the Empire, and by the way of Pannonia, Ilyria and Noritz, marched directly towards Italy. This news coming to Rome, affrighted the Emperour; and Stilicon seeing that of force himself must undertake this expedition (unless he would leave Italy, and perhaps the whole Empire a prey to the Barbarians) made haste to gather together all the strength he could; and having formed a considerable Army, marched in the head of it towards Ravenna (by which Alaric took his course) and made so great haste, that he arrived there on the same day that the Gotbick King encamped at Candian, a small Village not far distant, and where he had chose his post to besiege the City; but understanding that Stilicon was the same day set down before it, and had lodg'd his Army on the other side of the City, he remov'd his Camp to Palentia a little City not far distant; and after some few days of repose, bid Battle to Stilicon; but he finding himself too weak to dispute with the great numbers of the Goths, and prudently considering that the loss of a Battle in Italy might be but a prologue to the ruine of the whole Empire, refused it; and seeing himself strengthened by Ravenna, and in estate to amuse the enemies whilst yet it would be difficult for the enemy to force him to a Battel, he delay'd it, till such time as the Winter approaching, Alaric was constrained to retire into certain places, which made little or no resistance against his great powers; which also began so to waste, that it was impossible for him to maintain them in the Field.

Stilicon remain'd still at Ravenna, quartering his Army about it, and daily facing Alaric, but not giving him the opportunity to enterprize any thing: During the repose which the incommodity of the season constrain'd them mutually to give each other, the ancient propositions were renewed, and they proceeded so far upon them, that Stilicon publickly declar'd to Alaric, that he would not hinder the Emperours giving him those Lands among the Gauls, which the Emperour Theodosius had promised to the Visigoths; and that himself believ'd he could counsel him to a consent, if Alaric would send some persons of quality to treat with him. Alaric easily dispos'd himself to send Ambassadors to Honorius, to agree to whatever they found reasonable; and upon the Emperours parol to give them an honourable reception, to testify the greatness of his respect, and the confidence he had in his word, he sent the Prince Autalphe his Brother, and the Prince Wallia his Cousin-German, giving them authority to determine all things with the Emperour, submitting himself to perform whatever they should consent to. In the mean time Stilicon stayed at Ravenna till their return, to hinder Alaric from enterprising any thing, in case they should not conclude a peace; and from thence sent his counsels to the Emperour, as if he had been present with him: he had left Euchere at Rome under some pretext of indisposition, but it was to preserve by his presence, and that of the Empercs his Daughter, his credit with the Emperour.

We understood these things before we arrived at Rome; and the day that we entred, we were informed that the two Princes of the Visigoths were arriv'd two days before us, and had been magnificently received by the Emperour: But few receptions were comparable to that of the Victorious Constance; the Emperour himself, and all the City of Rome coming forth to meet him, and rendring him all honours little different from ancient Triumphs: And as amongst all who had obtained such Triumphs, few had so well merited them as Constance; so the Emperour did absolutely determine to make the ceremonies greater, if my Master by his modesty had not oppos'd it, and endeavour'd to hinder all Pomp and Magnificence at his entrance. Yet he could not but hear the acclamations of the people, who extolled him above the most famous Captains; those who said least, comparing him to the great Scipio, who some ages before, in the same Spain which he came from pacifying, had by actions much less glorious than his, acquir'd a most famous reputation.

Constance receiv'd with an incomparable modesty all these praises: for my part, I was ravish'd with joy, and concern'd myself more in his interest than himself: but that which most

most contented him in this magnificent occasion, was, that his glories might become a servant to his fortunes in Placidia's favour, as she had permitted him to hope. Amongst those which came to meet him, he knew the Prince Valia, who made him remember the friendship they had contracted, after having mutually prov'd each others valour: the greatness of this Princes court had perswaded him not only without envy to behold the glory of a person for whom he had conceiv'd so great esteem, but made him willingly joyn himself with those who came to render him this honour. Constance was highly sensible of this testimony of his affection, than which a greater could not be made; nor did he return a less suitable retaliation, but by all his actions and all his words, made known his acknowledgment of it.

Their Caresses did not finish till they approach'd the Emperour, near whom he likewise saw the Prince Autalphe, whom he saluted with a proper civility, and from whom he receiv'd all that was due to his merit, and the degree which he held among men. Having staid some time with the Emperour, who render'd him all imaginable Honours and Caresses, and treated with him about the most important affairs of the Empire; and having perform'd his devoirs to the Empress, who gave him likewise a reception suitable to the greatness of his actions, he prepar'd himself, spur'd on with joy, fear, love and many other passions, to visit the Princess, whom he understood about four days since was gone to a pleasant Palace of the Emperours, about forty furlongs distant from Rome, whence she was to return the next morning: though the time were not long, yet it seem'd so to the amorous Constance, who being advis'd that Virginia was likewise with the Princess, resolv'd with an impatience worthy of his love, to see her that very day, believing that he ought not to lose the occasion to visit her in her retirements, where he might make his addresses with more freedom, than in the crouds and multitudes of the Court.

He arriv'd at the City in a very good hour; and the days being yet of the longest, he could not doubt of time to perform this visit: and therefore withdrawing himself from his friends, whose entertainments might hinder him from executing his design, he left the Court, and taking with him none but me, and two servants on horseback to hold ours, we parted out of the gate of Ostia, and flew towards the Princess's Palace, with the greatest speed of our swift-footed horses. My Masters knowledge that both the Emperour and all the world did understand the particular respect he bore the Princess, and the interest which she had publickly express'd to have in the growth of his fame and fortunes, made him believe, that this diligence to wait on her, would not at all bring his passion into suspect, nor offend his friends, if to theirs he preferred the view of the glorious Princess. The way was accounted two hours riding at an ordinary pace, but we scarce made one of it; and at our arrival, there was yet two hours of Sun ere his descent into the Western Ocean. My Master out of modesty, had not sent news of his arrival to Rome, nor was the Emperour advis'd of it till the night before; so that his presence brought the first tidings of his being come thither: no person being by fortune come from Rome that day, which made the sight of Constance extremely surprize those that saw him; and as he was greatly lov'd and esteem'd by all the household of Placidia, so their surprizal was agreeable: They would have run to inform the Princess, believing she would entertain the news with no small joy, but he entreated them to stay; and having understood from them that she was only with Virginia in the Garden, and that he might go without danger of disturbing them, he went alone, leaving me with the chiefest of her attendants.

He had been oftentimes in the place, and knew all the ways both of the house, and into the Garden; and having survey'd several Alleys, without finding any person, he approach'd in the end to a Banqueting House, which is at the very utmost extent of the Garden, over which it hath a clear prospect, being fix'd upon high and strong beams of Cedar; the windows look'd forth upon a great and beautiful Channel, on the other side of which lies a vast and pleasant Meadow: Constance found the Ladies attendants of the Princess without the Banqueting House, who were no less surpriz'd at his sight than the other persons of the house had been, and who told him that the Princess was alone with Virginia, in the Banqueting House, whilst they had liberty to divert themselves in the Garden: He hindred them as he had before done the others, from giving the Princess notice of his arrival, telling them that it would be easie for him to surprize Virginia, who as the chiefest of his friends would be sufficiently interest'd in his return.

At length seeing the Banqueting-house open, and believing he might enter, he did so, but with that respect which his love taught him, and which might easily have been discerned in his Countenance, had there been any by to have mark'd it. At his entrance the Princess and Virginia were leaning on the Windows which over-looked the large and beautiful Streams:

Streams : and Constance entering with the least noise he could, while they being intent either upon what they view'd or what they said, did not at all turn towards him, who out of the respect he had for Placidia, would not be so rude as till she turn'd of her self, to interrupt her Discourse with Virginia : but in the mean time softly approaching a Table which stood in the middle of the Banqueting-house, and seeing their Pens, Inke, and Paper, upon which he might discern some Writing, his curiosity made him fix his eyes upon it, when he perceived them to be Verses in little Stanza's which the Princefs and Virginia had made to divert themselves ; they were in the form of a Dialogue ; and of every Stanza, which consisted but of four Verses, the two first were writ by the hand of Placidia, and the two last, which served as answer to the first, by that of Virginia : The two first Verses of the first Stanza, written by the hand of the Princefs, were these :

*Insensible is not my heart,
Yet not with ease from it I part.*

And the two last, written by the hand of Virginia, answered in this sort :

Who then can such a spirit prove That is invincible to Love ?

The two first of the second Stanza were :

*'Tis noble yet in such a mind
As mine, reluctancy to find.*

But to these Virginia not having answered, they had placed themselves at the Window without finishing the Stanza ; and my Master having once more read over the Verses, and believing himself to be concern'd in the Answer of Virginia, taking up the Pen, he ended the Stanza, by writing these two Verses under those of the Princefs.

*But never loving, then must I
Poor Constance miserable die.*

He did not at all disguise his Character ; and seeing that he was not perceiv'd, he believ'd that it would be a pleasant surprisal of the Princefs and Virginia, if he could retire without being seen, and give them time to view what he had writ. He did as he resolv'd ; and going forth again without the least noise, went to find the Ladies, telling them that he would stay some time with them, not daring to disturb the conversation of the Princefs and Virginia ; but he led them from the place where they were, for fear of being too soon discover'd, into a shady walk not far distant ; his intention being nevertheless not to stay long, having great impatience to see the Princefs, and to employ that little time he had to spend, in discourse with her.

In the mean time Placidia and Virginia having presently after his departure out of the Room withdrawn from the Window, and approach'd the Table, Virginia remembred that she had not yet finish'd the Stanza ; and therefore taking the Pen in her hand, she went about to answer those two Verses of Placidia's : but certainly never did any surprize parallel hers, when she beheld the Stanza finish'd, and by a hand which at present she could not know ; she shew'd such signs of astonishment, that the Princefs was oblig'd to demand the cause, and at the same time approach her, to see the reason of it ; which Virginia by shewing her the Verses soon made her apprehend, and rendred her surprize great as her own : they look'd upon one another a long time with amazement, demanding from each others eyes the reason of what they saw, but their wonder not giving them time to answer, they for a good while kept a profound silence ; till at length Virginia looking stedfastly on the Princefs, after two or three sighs ; Madam, (said she) I know not what you judge of what has happen'd ; for my part I know not how to apprehend it ; but were we still in the Religion of our Ancestors, I should believe that some god favourable to the passion of Constance, came and writ these, or brought him from the place where he was, to write them himself ; for in sum, it would have been very difficult for any one to enter here, and write them without being discerned by us ; nor is it less difficult for any to counterfeit so well the character of Constance, which you are not ignorant I am very well acquainted with ; but more impossible it is (continued she) that any should so far enter into his thoughts, since I am confident I am the only person in Rome that is acquainted with his passion for you. That which you say is most true (replid the Princess;) and if Constance be at Rome (as he may well be on his way thither, not having any thing more to do in Spain, having put an end to the War against the Vandals) I believe no other person than himself can have writ these two Verses; so well am I my self acquainted with his hand-writing. The Lines (replied Virginia) are no less his own than the Character; and if he be here, I shall be assured none but himself writ them. In sum, said the Princess, 'twill do well to know the truth, since no god as you say, hath finish'd this Stanza, or brought Constance hither to do it.

After they had endeavour'd in their thoughts to search the truth of this adventure, but found nothing of likelyhood, they quitted the Banqueting-House to enquire of the Ladies that attended, if they had seen any one enter there; but not finding them thereabouts, they went to seek them in the Alley whither Constance had withdrawn them, and who was preparing to return to seek them. They entred at one end of the walk, whilst Constance was at the other; so that by reason of the length of the Alley, they could not know him, though they might discern his Garments to glisten with gold and precious stones with which they were enrich'd, having the same on with which he that day entred into Rome, and which was a stately and magnificent warlike habit; nor when they drew nearer did they scarce imagine the truth; but Constance at the appearance of the Princess, having quitted the Ladies, and advanc'd towards her with a deportment full of respect, was in the end known by her, and she by the sight of him releas'd from her first astonishment, but cast into a second surprisal, which made her almost forget what had happen'd in the Banqueting-House, her mind being now wholly busied with thoughts how to receive a person who came to offer at her feet so many famous Victories; but Virginia less oblig'd to a severe reservedness than the Princess, no sooner knew him, but she express'd publick signs of joy; and being approach'd nigh him, See there, said she, the Apollo that finish'd my Stanza for me, and who hath not quitted Parnassus, and the society of the Muses, but the Pyrenean Hills and martial Fields, to come and make an end of my Poetry. The Princess had laugh'd at this discourse of Virginia's, if at the same time Constance on his bended knee had not address'd himself to her, as to his visible Divinity: she therefore lifted him up; and having saluted him with all expressible civility, would not that the respect he had for her, should hinder him from saluting Virginia.

After he had performed that Duty, and had spoke to the Princess, and heard from her mouth those first words, which were customary in such occasions, Placidia gave him her hand, leaning with the other upon Virginia; and having walked some time along the Alley; at length her self first broke silence: Constance (said she) I am so extremely satisfied to see you after an absence which hath rendred you famous by so many great Victories, that I first begin to speak to you, by telling you that I pardon the surprisal you put me into at your first arrival; for as I have already writ to you, 'tis of force that I pardon all things to so great a man, to whose power and skill in Arms all other powers are forced to submit. In sum, Constance, I see you return'd such as I have desir'd you should, considerable to the Empire, and to the Emperour; and in such reputation amongst men, that few ancient Captains have had so large a repute: but I will not now (continued she with a sigh) repeat your praise, nor represent to you the Grandeur of those actions you have done; but I assure you that no person can be more interess'd in them than my self, and that Virginia can tell you, as I promis'd you at your departure, what concern I have always had in them.

Constance received this discourse of the Princesses, with an infinite submission and acknowledgment; and bowing himself to her with a demeanour full of respect, Madam, said he, If that which you have done me the honour to tell me be true, as I ought to believe it, out of the respect I bear your words, I do receive from my actions, such as they be, the most glorious fruit I could ever hope for, and all that I could ever propose my self: but if you will be pleas'd to grace me so much as to own that little I have done, and all that I shall do for the future, as done by a person who has the honour to be yours, and who could do nothing but to merit the glory to serve you; I will not only not change my condition with the greatest men in the world, but I will believe that Fortune her self can add nothing to my happiness. They have made me write, and speak in your favour, replied the Princess, more perhaps than I ought to do; and if you be reasonable, you will not demand any thing of advantage. Ah Madam (said Virginia, interrupting their discourse with an excellent grace) after so long an absence, seven or eight years sufferance, and actions so great and important, you ought not to refuse the passion and love of Constance, since he desires nothing from you, but what you may grant him without offending your dignity, and the love you have for glory, and which you if you well remember have already yielded him. If I have yielded him anything (replied the the Princeſs) I have no intention to retract it; and the eſteem which I have always had for him, inſtead of being diminiſhed, is augmented by the ſame of his merit and fair reputation. I ſhould deſire (added the paſſionate Conſtance) if it might be permitted me to deſire it, that this precious eſteem might rather be augmented by the knowledge of what I ſuffer for you, than by the merit of what I have done for the ſervice of the Emperour: for I had rather be conſiderable to you for the paſſion which makes me die adoring you, than for all thoſe advantages, which Fortune or my Sword can give me; not that I would not endeavour by them to raiſe my ſelf to a degree might make me worthy to ſerve you, but that ſuch means producing a deſir'd effect over the inclinations of the Emperour, I might obtain my wiſhes over yours, if it be poſſible, by the proofs of a faithful paſſion, and compaſs my end, that if the Emperour one day can judge me worthy of the honour to which I aſpire, it ſhould not be only the reſpect you bear him, to which I would owe my Fortune. I think (replied the Princeſs) that there is little difference between this you now demand, and what I have long ſince yielded you; and I tell you again, if you can (as you are already well advanced towards it) raiſe your ſelf to a degree that may make the Emperour approve your deſign, I ſhall not only not be averſe to it, but favour you as much as reaſon, and what I owe to my quality will permit me. In the mean time (ſeeing that Virginia is witneſs of my this days folly) you may live in hopes that you are not indifferant to me, and that I will not do that for any man in the world, which I would for you.

Conſtance, who eſteem'd the favours of the Princeſs equal to the perſon that conſerr'd them, receiv'd this laſt with an extaſie of joy, which it will be difficult for me to expreſs, ſince he could hardly do it himſelf: he returned her thouſands of thanks, with all the marks of a grateful acknowledgment: And in the end, by the commandment of the Princeſs they wav'd that diſcourſe, and my Maſter having answer'd Placidia to many queſtions concerning his voyage, had the ſatisfaction to underſtand from her lips and from Virginia's, that the perſecutions which ſhe had ſuffer'd for the paſſions of Euchere, and the endeavours of the Empreſs, who was extremely ſolicitous for him, inſtead of being advantageous to him, had only produc'd a diſdain in the diſpoſition of the Princeſs, and that he was as unhappy as his Rival could wiſh him: their converſation held yet ſome time longer; and Conſtance had an entire permiſſion to do what ever might encline Honorius to render him happy, at which he ſo much rejoiced, that he could hardly contain himſelf.

But night approaching, my Maſter, whoſe reſpect forbid him to lodge in that houſe, took leave of the Princeſs. I had the honour to give her the good night; and the underſtanding the affection which Conſtance bore me, treated me with an infinite goodneſs: I only ſpeak this to draw thence an occaſion to tell you ſomewhat of her beauty, which I found ſo augmented, and in ſo an entire a perfection, that I was wholly ſurpriz'd and aſtoniſh'd: as for Conſtance, he was ſo tranſported with joy, for his good fortune, that all the way of our return he ceas'd not to relate to me his happineſs, and tell me what I have now recounted to you, with other particulars of their diſcourſe of leſs importance.

'Twas night before we arriv'd at the City, yet that could not hinder my Maſter from receiving a great number of viſits; ſo that the greateſt part of the night was ſpent before he could retire. The next morning he waited on the Emperour, and then receiv'd from him thoſe Careſſes that almoſt confounded him; nor did the Emperour ceaſe at bare Careſſes, but in few days made him know by the Dignities and Honours he conſerr'd upon him, that he had a deſign to raiſe him to the high'eſt degree a ſubject could aſpire to; and that, if Stilicon, who alone was above him, had more authority in the Empire, and over the Emperour, it was by a power uſurped, which it would be difficult to make him loſe; and not by that inclination which ſeem'd wholly to favour Conſtance. Few days after our return, to teſtify the confidence he had in him, the Emperour told him in ſecret, that he had been advertiſ'd by ſeveral means, that Stilicon had ill deſigns, and intended to uſurp the Empire: that it was he that lengthen'd the War with the Barbarians; that Alaric had by his Brother given him this advice, and that he himſelf had found it to be true, in that Stilicon did outwardly deſire to have peace with Alaric, and had counſell'd him to it in his Letters, yet he gave counſels wholly contrary to his profeſs'd intention, and daily repreſented to him the inconveniences to which he would expoſe himſelf, by giving to the Viſigoths thoſe Lands which they demanded among the Gaules: He told him likewiſe many other things with an intire confidence; and my Maſter receiv'd theſe marks of his affection, with a deep reſpect and true reſentment of ſo obliging a carriage; but concerning the intereſt of Stilicon, he ſaid he durſt not lightly give his judgment upon ſuch a man, who might truly be condemn'd as too ambitious, but for his great actions had merited well both of the Empire and Emperour: that it was a great while that himſelf had murmur'd at the too great authority which he ſaw him endeavour to uſurp, and had with many other noble

Romans impatiently born the yoke he had impos'd on them, but that this was all that was to be condemn'd in him, and that in the time that he had been with him at the War, he had found him so zealous a ruiner of the enemies of the Empire, that he could not believe he held any intelligence with them.

'Tis not an intelligence with them (answered the Emperour, interrupting him) that I accuse him of, but on the contrary it is believed that he irritates the people against us, by the discontentments which he gives them, and that he causes these broils in all corners of the Empire, to put all in trouble, and take opportunity during these disorders to effect his designs with more facility than he could hope for in quiet and peaceable times; especially knowing my spirit to be peaceable, and my complexion weak and delicate, he judg'd that by the Labyrinth of affairs into which he will involve me, I shall lose my courage, and be oblig'd to leave him an entire Authority, or associate him in the Empire; which will never agree with my intention. My Lord and Emperour (replied Constance) that which you say may have something of truth in it, yet perhaps not be wholly so; and therefore I shall counsel your Majesty not to believe any thing absolutely, nor yet to neglect any thing; you may still preserve your Authority without condemning a man, who may yet be necessary and profitable to you, especially upon the report of his and our enemies: whose accusation may the rather be judg'd false, in that his actions have testified, he hath not at all spar'd them, but well maintain'd the War against them; and in the mean time, though he should put himself in an estate to execute those wicked intentions of which they accuse him, you will not want faithful servants to defend you, and make him perish in the Enterprize.

He likewise added many things concerning this subject, to strengthen the Emperour's natural softness & timorous disposition, without absolute incensing him against Stilicon, whom he suspected only for an unmeasur'd ambition, but not at all for infidelity or Treason. But Stilicon was few days after called to Rome, by an ill fortune happening to his House, the death of the Empress Thermantia his Daughter, who left the World after five or six days sickness: as she had few qualities considerable, so she was lamented but by few persons, though the Emperour, who was naturally good and tender, seem'd much afflicted. Placidia's virtue (who was returned to Rome, the day after our coming from her Palace) made her take part of her Brother's grief, and endeavour to comfort Serenus the Wife of Stilicon, and Euchere himself, for their loss: but it was at the arrival of Stilicon, who had quitted Ravenna at this News, that the slavish Favourites did make their Lamentations, and accompani'd at least with appearances of theirs, the true grief he had in his soul. Constance induc'd by other motives, testifi'd himself touch'd for his ill fortune, as indeed he was: and Stilicon, who knew how to discern the thoughts as well as the actions of great men, receiv'd the civilities of Constance in another manner, than that of those persons whose vile complacence made them act it: for Stilicon himself he was griev'd at the very heart; and many there were that judg'd it less the force of relation that produc'd this effect, than the regret to have lost so potent a stay near the Emperour, and one of the strongest upholders of his Authority, considering that the Emperour had no Children by this Marriage.

In the mean time, to return to the interests of my Master, the two Visigoth Princes did every day see the Princess Placidia, and by the effect of her Beauty and ill fortune of Constance, Prince Autalpb Brother to King Alaric became passionately enamored of her. As he had pride enough to imagine that his love could not offend the greatest Princess in the World, so he took little care to hide it either from Placidia, or the whole Court of the Emperour: But the Princess being no less haughty, or perhaps having a pride grounded upon greater Reasons than those of Autalpb, was so little satisfi'd with a behaviour which she found so much different from that of Constance, and void of the respect which she thought due to her, that it appear'd to all mens judgments she had conceived an infinite avernsness for him. Not that Prince Autalpb was to be disdain'd for his person; for he was neither destitute of courage nor valour, his presence most comely and advantageous, and of a noble aspect; but there was something of such excessive pride seem'd spread throughout his whole Physiognomy, and his disposition declar'd him fierce, warlike, and barbarous, rather than a person polish'd and bred up in civil society. That of Prince Wallia his Cousin was quite different: for though he was valiant in War, in a most eminent degree, he was so sweet and affable in peace, and carri'd himself in all things with so much grace and address, that the most polish'd of the Romans did with envy behold themselves inferiour in all gentility to a Prince educated amongst the Barbarians; nor could they deny that both for body and mind, this Prince was one of the most accomplish'd men in the World.

The rivalship of the Gothick Prince, bred not a little discontent in my Master, rather out of a natural reluctancy we have to suffer Rivals in such occasions, or out of a prediction.

of the evils he was afterwards to be Author of, than for fear either Placidia or the Emperour should prefer him before himself; knowing well the advantages he had over such a Rival: but as his respect was unparallel'd, he would not testify any notice of it, nor speak of it to the Princess, believing himself too well establish'd in her spirit, to give cause of the least appearance of jealousy: but Euchere, whom in truth it concern'd to be no less wary than Constance, being of a different spirit, acted in a different manner; and having treated Placidia, in a more publique way, could not suffer patiently this Rival, without making appear his discontentment both to Placidia and many other persons: he found himself one day near the Princess in company with my Master, whom he did not yet look upon as his rival, though he saw him daily near the Princess; and not being able to dissemble the anger he had to find Autalpb his Competitor, he spoke to the Princess, and pressed her in such an indiscreet manner, that she was oblig'd to tell him, that she could not but express a distast that he should speak to her in that nature, that Autalpb and he were equally indifferent to her, and that she would intreat him, not to inform her who had either love or design for her, since he might assure himself, he neither had nor ever should have interest in her,

Euchere was so much abash'd at these words, that after having made a reverence to the Princess, he departed without returning any Answer; and my Master staying behind with her, and beholding her with a countenance that testified the satisfaction he receiv'd for his Rival's ill fortune; she soon dispell'd whatever of anger Euchere's discourse might have clouded her Face withall, and turning towards Constance with a pleasing serenity; And you Constance (said she) will not you likewise reproach me with Autalpb's love? No Madam (replied he) for though the punishment of Euchere may not have taught me my duty, it hath at least learn'd me not to fall into the same fault: I have, it may be, taken notice of Autalpb's love sooner than he; and if the concurrence of a Competitor ought to cause any grief, I have no less felt it than Euchere: but it does not make me forget that I am admitt'd only by your own goodness, and that the indulgence you have for my passion ought not to encourage me against others. If they deserve your smiles, I ought to suffer with patience what you please to afford them; if they be unworthy, you understand to give them that punishment they deserve, but in the mean time I ought to be silent, and permit you to act as my Sovereign, without searching into your intentions. You have that wisdom (replied the Princess) I could wish you to have; and to recompence it, I will tell you that you have much more reason than Stilicon's Son, to speak to me of the love of Autalpb, since I approve the interest which you have taken, as much as I have condemn'd his; nor should I have treated you like him, had you made to me the same discourse: but Constance, let neither Autalpb's nor Euchere's love alarm you, but be assured that neither the one, nor the other, nor possibly any person in the World can remove what you have gain'd upon the soul of Placidia. At the end of these obliging words, to which my Master answer'd not but with discourses full of the Extasies of Love, she told him all that Autalpb had made known to her of his Passion, concerning which she discours'd, in a manner that might make him judge that as his Rivals were like to be unhappy, so he was more fortunate than he ever hop'd. And to confirm him in this opinion, Fortune so order'd, that Autalpb and Wallia entred at the same time into the Chamber. Placidia receiv'd them together civilly; but Wallia beginning to enter into discourse with Constance, and Autalpb making use of the fair occasion his Cousin gave him, made his address towards her: she received him so coldly, that he was astonish'd, and hardy as he was, could not but lose a great part of his assurance: he remain'd a good while silent, but at length angr'd at his bashfulness, and reproaching his cowardliness, Shall I then be so unhappy (said he) to deserve nothing but your anger or aversion, for these marks which I have given you of the most respectful passion in the World? Certainly (answered the Princess so loud as to be understood by Constance and Wallia) those marks of passion of which you speak, cannot produce any other effect than what you cause them to deserve; and I cannot tell you why you should call that respectful, which is contrary and opposite to it. The Maxims of the Romans (replied Autalpb) are much different from those of other Nations: In the rest of the World a mortal person cannot be offended with what the Divinity permits, nay doth require from us. I am too religious (replied the Princess) to assume anything which is due to a Divinity; but there is so much owing me from the World, as not to admit those passions which you speak of, especially when neither approv'd by the Emperour, nor my self, as certainly yours will never be.

Having spoke these words with disgust, which rendred him as much discontented, as my Master satisfied; she called Wallia, for whom she had conceiv'd a great esteem; and my Master and he being drawn nigh, joynd themselves in a discourse, in which Autalpb hardly spoke any thing all the day: 'tis true, he was somewhat comforted by the company of those who came soon after to wait upon the Princess, amongst whom the most considerable were Virginia, Camilla, Hersilia and Hypolita, descended from the most illustrious Families of the Romans, and amongst the men, Maschezel, famous for his success in the African War; Heraclian, who rather by his fortune than virtue, was raised to some consideration in the Court; the valiant Artabure and Maximus, that same Maximus, who some time before your Majesty vanquished in two great Battels, and who after having some time stayed at Rome ashamed of his disgrace, was somewhat reviv'd by the same success and destiny of his successor Aurdlian, whose fortune had prov'd no better than his, and whom you defeated on the banks of the Rhynne, with the loss of his whole Army.

It was not only that day that my Master receiv'd those important proofs of the Princesses good will; but after that time finding in him all those things which might create a subject worthy of her affection, and to make him approv'd by all the world, she made no farther difficulty to testify to him that she lov'd him, and bore so great affection to him as he could reasonably desire; of which she gave sufficient signs on all sorts of occasions; but because those of her esteem were publick, few persons suspected the truth; and because the Princess her self did not desire it should be known, till Constance could get the approbation of Honorius, she engag'd him to conceal his love, till he had rendred himself so considerable to the Emperour, that he might boldly demand a Boon of so high a value. Not but that by the merit of those great actions which he had already done, he had already rais'd himself a name as famous as any the Captains of the ancient times, and by the Nobility of his Extract, which made him consider'd amongst the Romans, as descended from the Imperial Family, and by reason of the love and esteem which all the world had for him, and his virtue, he saw himself not only in an estate both to enterprize and hope for any thing, but he look'd upon Placidia as a reward so far above all his services, though lawfully and justly pretended, that he could not believe that all that he was, and all that he had done, could advance him to such a height as might make him dare to approach so sacred a Deity; and by this modesty he gain'd the heart of Placidia, and in the end engag'd her to all that affection she was able to conceive.

Fortune would therefore give him another occasion to render him more and more considerable, by the revolt of Cajan that famous Rebel, of whom you have already without doubt heard speak, who commanded the Roman Forces in Italy, and having in a long time form'd a party which by little and little by his design became formidable, in the end he saw himself at the head of a great Army; and exciting the Commonalty of Italy to a civil War, had rais'd a commotion which would hardly have been appeas'd, had it not been in time remedied. But the Emperour at first having cast his resolution upon Constance, and Stilicon not at all opposing it; my Master parted from Rome, and having in few days assembled that part of the Army that lay nearest, march'd against Cajan, who having an Army more numerous than he, advanc'd resolutely to give him Battel, and gave it most unfortunately for himself, for he lost his life with almost his whole Army; and my Master having ended the War, return'd full of glory, and laden with spoils: and all this in so short a time, that it was hardly thought he was departed from Rome.

Placidia, and all the friends of Constance, which were sufficiently numerous, were joyful at this his increase of glory; and my Master favour'd, besides these advantages, with the affection of the Emperour, found himself in a condition to demand any thing: but he had yet some reason to doubt the power of Stilicon, who maugre the death of the Empress, seem'd to be re-established in his former Authority over the inclinations of Honorius; and he likewise desiring the Marriage of his Son with Placidia, 'twas very probable he would oppose the pretences of Constance: and it was certain that Stilicon had yet in the Empire a power almost absolute, and that if the Emperour lov'd or fear'd him less than he had formerly done, yet he could not refrain that habit he had us'd to permit him, to dispose of and command all things; nor had he the courage to oppose his will, or overcome that powerful predominance he had over his resolutions: 'Twould be difficult to judge what were Stilicon's thoughts of my Master; it might be easily perceiv'd that he had an esteem and respect for his virtue, which could not oppose it self against the glory he had gained by his great actions; he likewise seem'd to be oblig'd for the safety of his Son. But it was as well discernable, that his greatness began to overshadow this potent Favourite, and that the favourable inclinations of the Emperour towards him, rendred him suspected to Stilicon; for when he permitted him the Generalship against Cajan, many persons believed that he designed it that he might expose him to a business wherein there was more danger than glory: however it was, he had never openly done him any injury, or attempted it against him, as he had several occasions to do, and had oftentimes made use of to others, whose fortunes he had re-inversed as he pleased, or as suited with his intentions.

In the mean time the Visigoths Princes pursued their Negotiation, in which they had found all with'd for success, by reason of the peaceable inclinations of the Emperor, if Stilicon had not found out new difficulties to retard the finishment of the Treaty; and Autalph himself, wholly abandon'd to the love of Placidia, rather than to the interest of his Brother, and Country, had not been unwilling to delay the Negotiation, to enjoy for a longer time the sight of Placidia, and endeavour to gain a heart in which he found few advantageous dispositions: As he was naturally proud and magnificent, so he made a most noble expence at Rome; nor was there any thing more splendid than his Equipage, or ought spared that might make him appear stately and sumptuous. But as he sought, though unprofitably, to conquer the heart of Placidia, he endeavour'd to gain the assistance of all those that were near her; and having been often witness of the esteem she publickly had shewn to my Master, without doubting any thing of Rivalship, he endeavour'd by means of the Prince Wallia, with whom he knew he had contracted an inviolable friendship, to engage him to serve him in his love.

He to this purpose spoke to Wallia, who unwilling to refuse to render him this service, though contrary to his thoughts, made him promise to use his best persuasion; and being used often to accompany Constance, after some other discourse, seeing himself alone with him, I would not abuse your friendship (said he) as perhaps I go about to do, if I could refuse to lend my succours to a malady, or deny my service to a person to whom I owe it all. In summ, though we are both of one blood, Autalph and my self, yet he is the Brother of my King, and may be my King himself; I cannot therefore refuse my obedience to those commands he lays on me, though never so contrary to my own thoughts. If he would believe me, he would, it may be, cease to love Placidia, who testifies so infinite an opposition to his suit: but in short, he will love, maugre my advice; or rather, he hath not the power to refrain from loving, and therefore himself hath commanded me to conjure you by all the friendship you ever professed to bear me, to do him the best office you can, by the power you have over her, and with the Emperor himself, if you shall find occasion. I know not with what confidence I can hope a success to this prayer, whilst I must believe that the interests of Placidia are far more dear to you than those of Autalph; but the earnest desire I have to serve him, makes me hope that you will not accuse me of indiscretion.

My Master stood for some time amaz'd at this discourse of the Gottick Prince; and having consider'd to the utmost, not knowing what balance to make use of on this occasion, looking on him with a sigh, I could wish with all my heart (said he) that in any occasion I could truly serve you, you should have certain experience of the power you have over me; and assuredly there should be but few difficulties which should hinder me from testifying the esteem which I have for you: but believe, if you please, that besides those reasons which are known to you, and which permit me not to torment the spirit of Placidia about what she professes so much averseness to, nor deserve her by recommending a person to the Emperor against her intention, I have other invincible ones, and such, to which all in the world ought to yield; and you, I hope, will believe them powerful, since they oblige me to refuse what you desire of me, which you may judge no small displeasure to him who would willingly spend his blood on any occasion to serve you. I am too much oblig'd to serve you (answered Wallia) and doubt not at all but those reasons which hinder you from performing a service to those desire it, are sufficiently convincing; but if I may without indiscretion tell you my thoughts (added he with a sigh) permit me to believe that you your self have a passion for Placidia; and I assure you that I have not only before suspected it, but judg'd that she is rather born for you than any man in the world. You honour me too much (replied Constance) by so advantageous thoughts; few men in the world can be worthy of Placidia; but when this that you suspect shall be true, notwithstanding the interest you take in Autalph's love, I shall not refuse to confess the truth to you, if you demand it, though I hid it from all the world beside. 'Tis enough (replied the Prince) and I neither will, nor ought to demand farther of you; but though I did know it, and though you had avowed it to me, you should never see me abuse the freedom you indulge; and except the interest of Autalph, which I can never with honour abandon, either in this, or any other occasion, you will find few persons in the world in whom you may more truly confide: I shall not tell Autalph of your suspected love, for without that I shall find other reasons sufficient to satisfy him.

After some other discourse, Wallia retir'd, and he went away well satisf'd from Constance, though he had not obtain'd what he desir'd: The same day my Master related this story to the Princess, making her sufficiently laugh at the choice which Autalph had made of him to serve in his love: she blam'd him a little, that he would give occasion to Wallia to suspect the truth; but in the end, considering Constance to be in an estate that he might publicly pretend to all things, she pardon'd him, nor was she herself much troubled. After some other discourse (beholding him with a sigh) Will you then (said she) employ the credit which you have with me, and that which you have over the Emperour, to give to Wallia a proof of your friendship? I shall do it without doubt (replied he) if you will order me; nor should I stay to attend those orders, if I did believe that in the love of Autalphe you would find all that felicity, and all that glory you deserve, and that a person loving you like me can desire. How! (said the Princess) if you love me so well as you would persuade me, can you sacrifice your interests and hopes to some other consideration? Yes, to that of your happiness (replied my Master) for the establishment of which, I would not only willingly sacrifice my hopes and interest, but with them something dearer than my life. Ah Constance (answered the Princess). I fear you do not love me at all! You may rather infer (replied Constance) that I do not love my self; and truly I love not my self so much as to desire my good fortune at the price of yours; nor would I be happy, if my felicity were to render you unfortunate. To repay your Generosity (replied Placidia, with an infinite sweetness) I'll tell you, that I would not enjoy felicity but with you; and if it be in my power to cause the happiness of any person, it shall be none but yours.

At these words, the most obliging that could possibly be spoken by a person of so high degree as Placidia, Constance was so much transported with joy, that hardly the presence of those persons that were within the Chamber, could hinder him from giving publick demonstrations; but at length having overcome that passion, and bowing his head with a most submissive behaviour, Would to Heaven (said he to Placidia) that I could one day merit that fortune to which you this day have rais'd me; but I find it so much too great for me; that I cannot imagine my strength able to support it. Their discourse could not continue longer, by reason of the company which drew near, amongst whom were Autalphe, Euchere, Heraclian, Artabure, and the excellent Claudian, so famous for Heroick Poesie, by which he had already gained so much glory, that the Emperour had caused his Statue to be set up in Brass in one of the chiefest places of Rome: It is true, that he was much inclined to Stilicon, and his House, as he had testifi'd by many publick proofs; and Euchere in all those Gallantries to which his love obliged him, was assisted by him in those petty works of Poesie, which his ingenuity could not produce. Yet this served him so little, that those who have chanced to see any thing which proceeded truly from Euchere's own studies, have not failed to attribute it to Claudian.

Yet this night he engaged himself in an Enterprize, in which he proposed to have the whole honour, though Claudian might have some employment; and to this end he spoke aloud before all that fair company, that within three days he would maintain in the great place of the Hippodrome, that the Princess Placidia was the fairest person in the world; and that he would break three Lances with those who would dare to dispute so undeniable a truth. This proposition of Euchere's pleased one part of the company; for the hopes they had of a pleasing divertisement; but it displeas'd others, and particularly his Rivals; who were troubled to see the glory of Placidia in other hands than their own; and Autalphe was about to break silence when Constance did it. You will be in danger (said he to Euchere) alone by your self to break three Lances; for you maintain a truth so much known, that few persons will enter into the lists to dispute it against you. I aver (added Prince Autalphe) that few persons will fight upon this quarrel; but it may give other persons considerable motives to dispute against him; and I assure you that neither you nor I shall be wanting to be of that number. Without doubt I shall not (replied Constance) if I can find any means to enter without doing an injury to the honour of the Princess: and I shall seek with you some reason or an other to enter, without disputing that truth, which I would no less defend than any other.

These words confirm'd Autalphe and Euchere, in the suspicion which they began to have of the love of Constance, and in their thoughts accus'd him of having so lately discover'd it; and from that moment they began to regard him as their Rival and mortal Enemy; for in summ, no sooner did they believe him their Rival, but they believ'd him belov'd of Placidia; and reflecting upon all that esteem which she had for him, and his industry in serving her, they both believ'd that it was Constance whom they ought to fear as the most assur'd of her favour; and at the same time, part of the hatred which they had for each other, was turn'd against Constance, as against him who without doubt would be more happy, and more fortunate: They both with their eyes testifi'd their thoughts; and Euchere answering to what my Master had spoke; It does appear (said he) that you will not want reasons less than Autalphe to break a Lance for the honour of Ladies; but under what pretext soever either one or the other comes, you shall find me disposed to defend both that truth which I have propos'd, and all those which I would maintain. It would do better, (said Placidia) to desist from this enterprize: for in divertisements of this nature, there arrives ofentimes accidents, and but little satisfaction. Ob! Madam (said Camilla, a fair Roman Lady that stood near her) why will you deprive us of so great pleasure; or why will you not permit what is only enterpris'd for your glory and the publick contentment? For your divertisement (answered the Princess) I consent to it with all my heart; but for my glory, I will not commit it to three courses of a Lance, nor would I have it consist in that beauty, which Euchre would render famous by his enterprize.

They returned in answer to this discourse of the Princess, many things which she had no desire to give attention to: and all the while the company stay'd with her, nothing was talk'd of, but this Challenge. Constance stay'd last, to the great regret of the other two Lovers, had yet some minutes conversation with Placidia, in which she would dissuade him from entering the Lists, telling him that it was not just that so valiant a Captain, famous for so many great Victories, should adventure himself amongst persons of a mean reputation, or serve himself with his Lance but at the Head of Armies: but in the end Constance obtained permission to enter, by telling her that it was in an Age, in which he could not dispense with such Exercises, and that it concern'd him so much to abate the Pride of those two insolent Rivals, that he could not without an infinite grief lose so fair an occasion, since if Fortune were not contrary to him, he hop'd to humble them by this Adventure.

The next Morning the Court of the Emperour was grac'd with the arrival of a Princess, renown'd amongst the fairest of the World; and indeed she was of so excellent a Beauty, that if the interest of my Master had not rendred me partial for Placidia, I might say that she was not at all inferiour to our Princess: It was Theodolinda, Daughter to the great King of the Huns, who having some time before made an Alliance with Honorius, would testify the confidence he had in his friendship, and the desire which he had to render his Alliance durable, by sending his Daughter to stay some time at Rome with the Princess her Sister. As she was Daughter to one of the greatest Kings of the World, so she came to Rome with an Equipage befitting her Greatness, and indeed wholly magnificent; but nothing was considerable to her self: and in truth, my Lord, I believe there are few Beauties in the World that have any advantages over hers; her skin was admirable fair; her complexion, compos'd of the most lively white and purest carnation in the World, did astonish those that beheld it; her Eyes seem'd full of fire, though they were black; and her Hair of the same colour, did marvellously well become her Face; the Beauty of her Lips did not at all yield to other parts of her person; and those Ladies that behold her with envy, must with difficulty endeavour to find any fault in her whole composure: Her mind was no less excellent than her body; for though it seem'd full of haughtiness mixt with a pride, which did present somewhat of Barbarism, yet is she by the report of those persons who from frequent converse have drawn their knowledge of her, indu'd with all charming sweetness.

But as she hath little interest in the Story of my Master, I shall forbear farther speaking of her; and I had spoken less, if I had not believ'd I ought this Testimony to a well known Truth. This fair Princess was honourably receiv'd by Honorius, and by the Princess his Sitter, and lodg'd in a convenient Apartment of the Palace, where she was nobly treated; and for the love of her, those sports were renewed, which after the death of the Empress had been intermitted in the Imperial House. Placidia being a person whose virtue made her look upon no person with envy, she cherish'd a very great friendship for the Princess Theodolinda; and Theodolinda having (and with reason) a good opinion of Placidia, as believing her inferiour to none, so she beheld her with a becoming respect and true affection. Cleomira a fair and complasant Princess, Daughter of the King of the Tongres, the ancient and faithful Ally of the Romans, was likewise come to Rome some few days before, together with the Prince Taxander her Brother, a Prince of great valour and merit: besides these Illustrious Personages, there was a great number of whom I shall make no mention, which made the Court more glorious, than it had been for many Ages.

The Night that preceded that Day on which Euchere was to perform his Challenge, Theodolinda, Cleomira, and many fair Roman Ladies, waited on the Princess. The Emperour likewise himself came thither, and with him Autalph, Constance, Wallia, Euchere, Taxander, Artabure, Heraclian, and other considerable persons of the Court, they began presently to discourse of the divertisement which they the next day expected; and Placidia willing willing to honour Theodolinda, told the Company that she would cause the design of that Enterprize to be changed, and have the same performed for the Beauty of that Princess, which was intended for hers: but Euchere who had the principal interest, testified his dislike; and Theodolinda defended her self with an excellent Grace, from the civility of Placidia, praying her to permit her to accompany her without any other interest than what she should have in her glory; and that when by a longer stay she had acquir'd Friends at Rome, she would not hinder those who might have any such intentions, the enterprising of any thing for hers.

The Emperour, whose disposition was naturally courteous, and more proper for converse with Ladies, than the management of great Affairs; told her a thousand obliging things upon this occasion, protetting that he himself would be her Champion, and maintain the Honour of her Beauty against the whole World: but in the end, after a long contestation, 'twas agreed that the Achievement should be executed in the manner it was proposed, though Placidia resisted it as much as she could.

During this familiarity, the Emperour seeing upon a Table a beautiful Scarf enriched with all that Gold or the curiosity of the Workmanship could give it of embellishment, taking it in his hands, and shewing it to the whole Company, Sister (said he to the Princess) methinks with some such present as this you ought to favour those that fight for your glory, and they will probably defend it better when encourag'd by such a favour. My Lord (answered the Princess) since there are so many of them in one intention, I know not to whom I may justly give it; and perhaps I shall raise a jealousy for a thing of so slight value. Give me leave to tell you (said Euchere most presumingly) that I was the only person had intention to fight for your Beauty, for no other can have any thing common in so glorious a design; and therefore if any one can merit so precious a favour, 'tis to me alone that you can give it with justice. Prefer not (answer'd Autalph, looking upon him with disdain) your intention to that of others; the proposition you have made, favours rather of boldness than respect and submission, and you ought rather to attend the success, than demand a reward, which we hope to merit as well as you. For us (said Constance, composing himself to suffer the pride of his Rivals) as we merit nothing, so we demand nothing. For my self (added the Prince Wallia, who stood next him) though I could merit a grace of so great value, I have that reason which would hinder me from demanding it. I have no reasons (replied Constance) which hinder me from demanding it, if I had what might make me merit it: but as I know my self too unworthy, I know how to submit my desires, and pretend to things I may more legitimately hope for.

The Princess Theodolinda, to whom the renown of Constance was not unknown, and to whom his person was not less pleasing than his discourse, looking on him, In truth (said she) your humility should work more upon me than the others boldness; and if the Scarf were mine, I would willingly give it you, and believe I could not put it in better hands. Constance made answer to this obliging discourse, with a demeanour full of respect and submission; and the Emperour, who esteem'd him far above all others, turning to Theodolinda, In truth Madam, (said he) *we find our selves such fair returns for the gift of one Sword which Placidia once gave to him, in whose behalf you speak, that if she will take my counsel, she shall likewise give him the Scarf, according to your intention. If your Majesty orders it so,* (said Placidia) *I shall not make any opposition; and those great Victories which he gain'd with the Sword I gave him, deserve perhaps the Recompence. And at these words, seeing the Emperour mak a sign to give the Scarf to Constance, she put it about him, whilst he made a reverence with one knee, to receive it with more respect.*

It will be difficult, Sir, to express my Master's joy for so dear and glorious a favour; but it will be no less difficult to represent to you the moodiness of his two Rivals, which was so great, that the presence of the Emperour could hardly restrain them from some effects of violence. By the joy that they perceiv'd in the eyes and in the whole action of Constance, they did not at all doubt that he was their most potent Rival, which made them convert against him the greatest part of the hatred they had conceiv'd against each other. 'Twas now that Euchere repented himself for having engag'd himself in this enterprize, of which by these unfortunate beginnings, he expected nothing but shame and dishonour: he had broke it off, if he dur'd; but he saw no appearance how to do it with honour; yet he comforted himself with the hopes to pick up some pretence from what should pass in this Action, to quarrel with his Rivals; and after having kept some time of silence, I wonder not at all (said he aloud) *that Constance doth win battels, since Fortune favours him in all things, even above his own hopes. Nor am I any thing surpris'd* (added the Cambick Prince) if that amongst the Romans, a Roman be preferred before Strangers; but I cherish my self with this, that not always Reason governs the Fortunes of men. Constance withheld himself with great difficulty, not being willing (especially in the time of his good fortune, which ought to make men bear with the unfortunate) to contest with his Rivals, as he would have done, if he had not been in the presence of the Emperour, Placidia, and the rest of the Illustrious Company; and only regarding them with a settled countenance, and holding down the Scarf, which he came from receiving, to beget in them more anger, Be it by Reason (said he) or by Fortune, I have those advantages, which I know how to preserve; and you shall see to morrow this high priz'd Scarf in a place, where it shall be permitted you to see whether you deserve it better than I. The presence of the Emperour prevented further discourse, but it would not appease the anger of Autalpb and Euchere, who seem'd more offended than the Gotbick Prince: but both the one and the other, after a little time, retir'd themselves from the Company, under pretence to prepare themselves for the following day; but it was rather out of choler, envy, or some hopes to put it quite off.

As this was an enterprize resolv'd on on the sudden, and for which only two days preparations were afforded; there was not to be seen that magnificence, which other spectacles had been adorn'd with, and which had without doubt been seen in this, by reason of the Illustriousness of the persons concern'd, if Euchere had taken a longer time to prepare himself: But though now there was no contrivances extraordinary, there was nothing to be seen more noble nor more rich, than the Arms, Horses, Liveries, and all the Equipage of the three Rivals. Immediately after Dinner, the Emperour himself advanc'd to the Hippodrome, which (in all places where the people could seat themselves; for all that which was within the Barriers, was reserved for the Cavaliers) was fill'd with multitudes; and the Emperour being seated near the Princess Theodolinda, all the Company were plac'd according to custom; only Stilicon, who for some indisposition, whether feigned or true, refused to be present.

Soon after, the proud Euchere entred the Lists, covered with Arms so rich, that the Gold and precious Stones dazzled the sight: he was mounted upon a fair Italian Horse, and had led after him several others covered with rich Liveries suitable to the rest of the Equipage, which appear'd most noble and sumptuous to all the Spectators. Autalpb followed soon after, attended by the principal of his Visigoths, and in an Equipage which though it had somewhat of Barbarism in it, yet attracted the sight with a great deal of pleasure, and was remarkably costly and magnificent: he was mounted upon a Barbary Horse, but somewhat bigger than the usual Horses of that Country, and snorting contrary to the custom; which Autalpb managed with so good a grace, that he made himself to be look'd upon by the whole Assembly, as a Prince of great courage, and whose presence denoted his Illustrious extraction: His Arms were extremely rich, and his Head cover'd with so large and fair a Plume, as cover'd all his Shoulders: his Liveries were noble, and his whole Equipage expressed the Grandeur of the Master. Constance came after them, but drew no less than they, the eyes of the whole Assembly, whose affections he had already gain'd: though their appeared in his Equipage less pride than in the others, yet it had no less magnificence, and all things were much better ordered; all the Liveries more proper and rich: for being naturally the most liberal man in the World, by his great expence he had done things in two days, which so short a time had hindred his Rivals from effecting: his Arms were composed of little Scales of Gold enamell'd with red and white, and enrich'd all over with Stones of infinite price: his Helmet made of the same workmanship, was adorn'd with a spreading white and carnation Plume, below which was to be seen hanging on his Shoulders the fair Scarf of Placidia, fastn'd with a great knot behind, and plac'd there with design to be better observ'd in the course, by the help of the wind which play'd with the ends that hung down, and wav'd them behind my Master as he ran: He was mounted on a most excellent Horse; which himself had brought out of Hispania Betica, and of which King Gunderic had made a present to him, at their parting; and such was the nimble grace of his Horsemanship, that the two Rivals were not a little displeas'd to see the whole Assembly fix their eyes upon him, but their choler was more inflam'd to see the Scarf; nor hardly could they moderate themselves, or wait the time proper to dispute so glorious a favour.

After my Master, several others entred; and amongst the rest, the Prince Taxander richly armed, and proudly mounted, the valiant Artabure, Arcobinde, Heraclian, Maximus, Flavian, and others, whose names are not unknown to your Majesty; the greatest part of which sent to the Princess Placidia, that if they ran against Euchere, 'twas not to dispute with him a truth which themselves would avow, but to give her a divertisement, if she pleas'd to accept it.

All things being reduc'd at length in the accusom'd order, Euchere having caused the Trumpeters

Trumpeters to proclaim the defiance which he made to all the World for the Beauty of Placidia, plac'd himself in the Lists with a strong Lance; and (when it was perceived that neither Constance nor Autalph pressed themselves to run the first course, Autalph out of pride willing to let Euchere gain some honour before he would put himself in an estate to oppose him, and Constance detain'd by other reasons not known to the Assistants) Flavian presented himself first in the Lists, and parting at the sound of the Trumpets at the same time with Euchere, they encountered in the middle of the Course with a sufficient force and courage; but Flavian was thrown over the Crouper, and Euchere finish'd his Carrier without being mov'd.

The whole Assembly applauded the Beauty of this Course; and Maximus taking the place of Flavian, ran with a success equal to his, and was thrown on the Ground without having shaken Euchere in his Saddle. The Son of Stilicon glorying in these two prosperous Courses, might behold Heraclian entred the Lists; and parting at the signal given, he encountered him with so much ill fortune for Heraclian, that he threw both Horse and man to the Ground with so rude a fall, that he broke his arm; nor could he raise himself but by the help of his Servants, who carried him full of pain, but more incensed against Euchere, forth of the Lists: The fair success of these three Courses raised so much pride in the haughty Euchere, that he began to call to his Rivals, and demand of them, if they thought the defence of Placidia's Beauty to be in ill hands; when Autalph believing him to have gain'd honour enough for him to run against him, and not being able longer to suffer his pride, he pressed before the rest, and presented himself in the Lists; but before the course making a sign to Euchere that he would speak with him, they advanc'd each towards the other; and Autalph lifting up the Vizer of his Helmet to speak more distinctly, and be the better understood, Euchere, said he (so high as to be heard by the Emperor, the Princes, and those that were near them) I come not to combat thee upon the quarrel thou maintainest; I know too well that Placidia is the fairest Person of the World; but I maintain that the defence of her Beauty is rather due to me than thee, and that no man in the World merits so well as my self the glory to serve her. These proud Speeches displeas'd both Placidia, and many other persons that heard them; and Euchere having listn'd to them with sufficient disdain; I should rather (repli'd he) answer this discourse with my Sword, than my Lance: but I hope that we shall have an opportunity both for the one, and the other; in the mean time I particularly desire thee upon this quarrel, as I have done all the World upon the first.

At these words they return'd to take their Carrier; and Euchere having chosen a new Lance, they parted at the accustomed Signal, encountering with an unspeakable force, breaking their Lances into thousands of pieces, without being moved in their Saddles: All the Spectators praised the gallantry of their Course; the second fell out in the same manner; but at the third, they having taken stronger Lances than in the two first, carri'd each other to the Ground with equal advantage. They seem'd enraged with anger the one at the other, and would have begun a Combat with their Swords, if the Emperor, and the Judges of the Field had not caus'd them again to mount their Horses, by parting betwixt them the honour, and ordaining that Euchere should continue his Enterprize to the end, and Autalph should with the rest attend the success.

Euchere being mounted on a fresh Horse, and seeing that Constance stood still in his first place without making any sign of coming to the Combat, he boldly desir'd him both with his Voyce and Gesture, and sent an Esquire to inform him that it was him that he attend'd to make proof against, and to merit by a blow of the Lance the fair Scarf of Placidia: but Constance having patiently listn'd to the Esquire, Tell Euchere (said he) that I have not yet found the reason why I should seek to combat a man that defends the Beauty of Placidia; but I hope to make him know that before the end of the day I may meet with one, and then I shall defend as well the Scarf as the Beauty of Placidia. The good opinion which all the World had of Constance, made them attend somewhat extraordinary in the design, whilst in the mean time a Knight whom they had not before taken notice of, appeared in the Lists; and having civilly demanded that Course from Artabure, who was about to undertake it, before he ran, he sent his Esquire to speak to Euchere; and Euchere being prepared to hear him: My Lord, said he, (aloud, on purpose to be understood by the Ladies, and Constance himself, who advanc'd for that end) my Master hath commanded me to tell you, that he runs not against you with any intention to offend the Beauty of the Princess Placidia; for though he avows that nothing in the World is fairer than she, yet that which he maintains against you, and against the whole World, is, that there is another Lady in the World, whose Beauty must not yield to any in the Earth. The Esquire at the words retir'd, and oblig'd the Spectatois to behold the unknown Knight with a more industrious view. He was cover'd with very fair Arms, and mounted upon a most beautiful Steed; but especially his great grace in the saddle made them conceive a good opinion of him. The Trumpets sounding, he parted at the same time with Euchere: and their shock was so rude, that the Lances were broken into innumerable shivers; Euchere lost his Stirrups, but the unknown Knight finish'd his Carriere without being mov'd. Stilicon's Son not having had any disadvantage all the whole day till now, made the Spectators more diligently cast their eyes on the unknown Knight, who having took another Lance after the example of Euchere, returned to begin another Course: they parted at the signal, and the unknown Cavalier with so much violence encountred the Son of Stilicon, that tumbling him over the Horses Croup, he made him measure his length on the ground, whilst he finish'd his course without making any ill posture in his Saddle.

At the fall of Euchere, all the people gave a great shout; and though the Princess saw her glory ill defended, yet she was not at all dissatisfied. But 'twas now that Constance advanc'd himself, and enlarging his voice to be understood by the whole world, Euchere (said he) Behold now what I sought for, which was to fight for Placidia, and now I take thy place with hopes to defend her beauty better than thou hast done. Placidia did with joy behold the grace and behaviour with which Constance proceeded in this action, and the whole assembly testifi'd their approbation of it by their cries and clapping of their hands; but whilst Constance was placing himself in the Lists with a strong Lance, he might behold the Esquire of the unknown Knight to approach him, who accotting him with sufficient respect; My Lord, (said he) my Master entred not here to combat against you, but since he cannot without so doing quit the Lists with honour; he hath intention to defend the proposition he made; but will only break one Lance with you. The Esquire return'd at these words, without expecting an answer: while Constance thought himself so oblig'd to the civility of his Master, that he would willingly have yielded him the honour without running against him, if by doing it, he should not have displeas'd Placidia: he made him a sign with his hand that he acknowledg'd his courtesie; and soon after they took their Carriere with so much fury, that they made all that beheld them admire the gallantry of their Course: yet neither the one, nor the other, moved in their Saddles, though the splinters of their Lances flew up into the Air. Constance went to take another Lance, believing that this equality of the Course would oblige the unknown Cavalier to run another; but he soon perceiv'd he had no such design, when he saw him depart the place, and disappear in a moment, leaving Euchere afflicted beyond comfort; but Autalph boyling with rage and jealousy, advanced before all others to run against Constance; and after having told him that he would run with him on the same conditions that he had done with Euchere, and with design to dispute with him the glory to serve Placidia, and not the price of her beauty; he made ready to begin his carriere, and at the sound of the Trumpets, pass'd the first course with little disadvantage; but in the second, Fortune was more contrary to him, and he was so rudely encountred by the Lance of Constance, that he was thrown out of his Saddle upon the ground, whilst my Master was not at all shaken.

The fall of Autalph caus'd a great shout through the whole assembly; for Constance being belov'd by all present, but only the Viscounts, there was scarce, except them, a person that did not rejoyce at his good success. Constance retired with modesty, not being willing to brave the unfortunate, though he had sufficient subject: and in the mean time Euchere, who had remounted himself, and who by the fire which darting from his eyes, made his anger appear, approaching fiercely towards him, and speaking with a loud voice; Since thou hast not vanquish'd me (said he) and that another Fortune cannot give thee any advantage over me, in my judgment, thou oughtest to have run against me before thou tookst my place. I took thy place (replied Constance) after thou hadst lost it by thy fall, and I have defended the beauty of Placidia, when it was without defender: if thou wilt run upon any other pretence, it is permitted thee; but I will now thus defend Placidia's beauty. Autalph, who full of rage was now come near the other two, not giving Euchere leave to answer, No person (said he to Constance) hath disputed with thee the beauty of Placidia, nor canst thou defend it better than me in a Combat where Fortune shall have less part than in this here. Euchere at this beholding Autalph with disdain, Let me alone (said he) to end my differences with Constance: for since he hath vanquish'd thee, thou by the custom of Arms canst no more dispute it with him. Thou art vanquish'd as well as I (replied Autalph) and by a person who hath no more valour than Constance. If he have but as much as I (said Constance, somewhat provoked) he has enough to humble the pride of either of you two; and I have enough to make you know in another place, and in another sort of Combat, that you are both unworthy of the glory to serve Placidia.

I know not whether 'twas anger that so transported Euchere, that it deprived him of his judgment, or the reliance he had on the authority of his Father, that made him forget the respect he ought to the presence of the Emperour: and whether Autalph being descend- ed of a Sovereign house, so far from being dependent on the Empire, that it made war against it on equal terms, believ'd that he was not obliged to have any consideration for Honorius; but scarce had Constance finish'd those words, when his two Rivals having drawn their Swords, he might at the same time feel two good handsome blows on his head. The choler which inflamed him at such an injury, made him make a cry, would have daunted the most assured; and passing with his head bow'd down between his two ene- mies, he stopp'd his horse about twenty paces from them, and at the same time with his Sword in his hand, he charged them with such a fury, as made them repent their over- daring enterprize. As they were somewhat abash'd for having both together assaulted him, so not having any greater friendship the one for the other than they had for him, they were the more dismayed; and my Master having found Euchere first, discharged so weighty a blow upon his head, that the Helmet proved too feeble to resist it, and the Son of Stilicon tumbled off his horse to the ground desperately wounded: from thence, with a quickness like to lightning, being mounted upon one of the swiftest horses in the world, he flew towards Autalph, before the Troop that ran to separate them could hinder him; and making a full thrust, pierc'd his right Arm which he had lifted up to strike him, so that with the wound he let fall his Sword. Then making two blows more with an infi- nite activity; he had not time, had there been any more to do, to have done any more; being environ'd by a hundred Swords drawn about him, by the friends of the one and the other, and by those whom the Emperour had sent.

The friends of Euchere and the Visigoths of Autalph's train would have made some stir, if they had dar'd: but though the power of Stilicon was great, the friends of Constance were more numerous than the others, and many valiant personages, who had fought under him in his Armies, gather'd themselves together about him with infinite joy. His choler was soon pass'd over; and putting his Sword into his sheath, as soon as they had carry'd off Euchere, and led off Autalph; in the midst of those brave friends that accompany'd him, he went to attend the Emperour, whom his actions had as much pleas'd, as those of his enemies had incens'd him: being come before him, Sovereign (said he in a most sub- missive manner) if I have offended the respect I owe to my Emperour, by defending my life against those who have assaulted it in his presence; I bring my head, and submit my self to suffer what your justice shall please to ordain. I am troubled (reply'd the Emperour) at the wounds of Euchere and Autalph, for Alaric's and Stilicon's sake; but I cannot ordain any punishment to that person who hath only defended his life: and if I did not believe his two ene- mies sufficiently punished, I would make them know the fault they have committed.

As the Emperour Honorius was naturally mild, and could not as yet overcome the power Stilicon still preserv'd over him, nor would provoke Alaric upon the point of concluding with him a desir'd peace, so he would no farther express his anger against those who had so insolently violated the respect due to him, believing that their wounds were dangerous, and that they might possibly be punish'd more severely than he desir'd. For the Princess Placidia, she was surpris'd with many several passions upon this occasion: at first she was fearful of Constance, when she saw him assaulted by two such furious enemies, but after- wards not having any thing of cruel in her nature, she was troubled at the wounds of Autalph and Euchere, though their persons were little dear to her, believing they might be dangerous, and in the end prove the loss of those two men; but at last, when she under- stood there was little danger of their lives, she was extremely joyful, to see their pride abas'd, and all that adventure succeed so happily advantageous to Constance. The Prin- cess Theodolinda, who had conceiv'd a great esteem for my Master, was equally glad of his happiness, remembering the judgment she had given of him the night before, when she procur'd him the favour of the fair Scarf. But in the mean time they were extremely troubled, and all that magnificent assembly with them, who that unknown Knight might be, who had thrown down Euchere, and run against Constance without disadvantage, of whom for his fair and happy courses, they made many favourable judgments; but if they had a desire to know his person, they had no less to know the beauty for whom he com- bated: Placidia told Theodolinda, that it was assuredly for hers, and that it was no wonder, if in sustaining so just a cause he had so good success.

That night my Master would not for modesties sake go near the Emperour nor the Prin- cess, believing that it would in some measure be an Insulting over the misfortunes of his Rivals; yet there stay'd with him a great number of his friends, that the whole fortune of Stilicon scarce led a train like him; but the next morning understanding that the Emperour would willingly see him, he went to attend him: passing through a Gallery he encountred Stilicon, follow'd by a train of those whom his credit kept ordinarily about him; and my Master having civilly saluted him, Stilicon returned his salute but coldly; and in the passing by told him, You once saved my Son's life, and yesterday you would have deprived him of it: but I hope you will gain less glory and less advantage from the last action than the first. As I did my duty to save your Son's life (replied Constance) I did the same in repaying the injury he had done me: and as you hold no obligation to me for the first action, so you have no reason to complain of the last. He would not answer him more roughly, not being able to restrain himself from a consideration for him, excusing likewise the grief of a Father for the wounds of a Son, and the shame he had for the ill success of his enterprize. But Stilicon returning to him, You hold (said he) perhaps from me that fortune, which hath put you into an estate to offend me; but that same power which assisted you to mount so high, may likewise make you descend, if it enterprize it. Constance utterly lost his patience at this discourse, and looking upon Stilicon with disdain, I scorn (said he) to hold any Fortune from you, who are perhaps my inferior in all things; I owe it to my Birth, and to my Virtue; and as it is fixed upon other foundations than yours, I hope it will be more durable, and less exposed to those accidents which may reverse it.

Many considerable persons, who were present, hindred this discourse from proceeding farther; and my Master's friends leading him away, lett Stilicon extremely incensed at the last answer Constance returned him. In sum, he had been so little accusom'd, for many years, to find any persons in the Empire, who durst give him replies of this nature, that he could hardly appease himself for this rencounter; it making him reflect upon those marks he had already observed of the decay of his fortune, and making him believe it already changed, since any other person but the Emperour durst speak to him with so much boldness: Both the one and the other made their complaints to the Emperour, who yet something fearful of Stilicon, but loving Constance, as knowing the reason on his side, would take neither party, but charging them not to proceed farther in their difference, promis'd to accommodate all things so soon as the wounds of Euchere were in a better estate.

Fortune at this time resolv'd to make my Master as happy now, as afterwards she intended to make him miserable; for the Emperour taking him by the hand, and leading him into a little Closet, having beheld him some time without speaking; In the end, Constance (said he) if you have a true and faithful friendship for me, I would have you freely tell me a truth, which I am to demand of you. I'll tell it you certainly (replied Constance) though my confession would cost me all that I esteem most dear; and I protest that the loss of my life should not make me tell you the least falsehood. I would then (replied the Emperour) have you tell me sincerely whether it be true that you are enamour'd of the Princess Placidia, as many persons believe, and which considering the things that are pass'd, it is difficult to doubt. Constance changed colour at this discourse of the Emperours; and fixing his eyes upon the ground, remained in that posture, without replying any thing. The Emperour judg'd easily by his actions a part of the truth; but willing to know it more assuredly, and entirely, he press'd him in such sort, to answer him precisely, that Constance seeing he could not shun it, endeavour'd to expel that astonishment which had surpriz'd him; and lifting up his own, toward the countenance of Honorius, with an aspect but ill assured; My Lord (said he) all your authority is necessary to draw from me a confession of that misfortune, which I have hitherto hid from all the world, though I fell into it in the infancy of the Princess: But since it is discovered contrary to my design, after having been for so many years kept secret; and that it is perhaps by my evil conduct that my Emperour hath known it; give this presumptuous person all those punishments that are due to him, and believe it, Sir, that I will not murmur at all, to die for that Princess, whom I am resolv'd to adore to the last moment of my life: I will not at all justify my thoughts, though they are certainly such as I owe to the Sister of my Emperour, and that in lifting my eyes to her, I have not forg't any thing which a faithful subject should pay to his lawful Sovereign. 'Tis only the rashness of others that hath discovered me; and as I could not suffer that they should publicly serve her, whom I durst only adore from the bottom of my heart, passion forc'd from me that prudence, which till then rul'd the conduct of my love.

Constance would have spoken more, but the Emperour hindred him: 'Tis enough Constance (said he) and it suffices me to understand from you that which I have desired, without demanding further justifications of an offence which I willingly pardon you, if Placidia will do the like: you are of so illustrious a blood, as cannot injure hers, since your Ancestors have held the same dignities with ours: and for the merit of your person, it is such, that without the assistance of your extract, there's nothing but what you may fairly assure unto. I believe my Sisters thoughts are not much different from mine: I desire, for the love I bear you, they may be the same, not being of the humour, as you well know, to violate her inclinations; but if she be not at all contrary to you, you may be assured that I shall be always favourable to you, and shall assist you to overcome those difficulties, which you may meet with in her spirit, where my assistance may be necessary.

Constance was ravish'd with so much joy at this discourse of the Emperours, that seeing himself alone with him, he threw himself at his feet, and embrac'd his knees with a demeanour which made him know the greatness of his passion; and in sum, told him all that repentment, which the reception of so great a favour could put into his mouth: and the Emperour opening himself entirely to him, bid him be certain of his good will, and assuredly rely upon it; but that it was not yet time to make it publick, and that it were best attend till the return of Autalph, and the conclusion of the peace with Allric; and that things were in that posture, that there should be no more reason to fear the ill intentions of Stilicon. Constance receiv'd this advice of the Emperours with a becoming respect, and so much joy, that he could hardly dissemble it before him.

Parting from the Emperour, he encountred the Prince Wallia, whom he had not seen at the Jurs, and who excus'd himself, that by reason of a fall he had got from a Horse, he could not be assitant at that publick divertisement: and as he infinitely esteem'd his friendship, he ran to him as soon as he sp'd him; and drawing him apart to entertain him, I should despair (said he) if what hath passed between Autalph and me, should cause any alteration in our friendship: and although I am not ignorant of the obligations you have to that Prince by reason of the nearness of blood, yet I would have you believe that you owe something to the friendship which you have sworn me: And I protest with truth to you, that if Autalph had not struck me, I should have suffered all things from him for your sake. You may perhaps add (replied the Gothick Prince) that amongst Rivals 'twill be difficult to preserve a good correspondence; but be it for that occasion, or for any other, that this disorder is happen'd between you, I know well how to discern those occasions which engage me to take the part of Autalph, from those which give me the liberty to consider so precious a friendship as yours, which there shall never be any thing of force sufficient to hinder me from opportunities to preserve at the price of my life. There pass'd many other civilities between them; after which Wallia having told Constance, that he was going to make an excuse to the Emperour on the part of Autalph, for the fault he had committed, he told him likewise that he would entreat the Emperour to make reconciliation between Autalph and him, though he did not hope there could ever be a cordial friendship between them, till the love either of the one or the other ceas'd, which he had less reason to hope of his than of Autalph's part.

After they were parted, my Master went, or rather flew to the Princess, not able to contain his joy, and dying with impatience to make her a partaker of his good fortune: she no sooner saw him, but she read a part on his visage, perceiving in his eyes, and throughout all his countenance, something of an amorous extasie; but being ignorant of the cause, Constance (said she) I did believe you more moderate in your good fortune than now you seem to appear; and I have observed that in those great Victories which you have won, you have testifi'd less joy than I observe in your eyes for the advantage over two men. Though I had but that subjects of joy (replied Constance) though perhaps it ought to be as great as any I have drawn from those Victories I have gain'd against the enemies of the Empire; yet modesty would persuade me to dissemble it, how great soever; but my spirit is now fill'd with a joy so great, that there is no modesty can restrain it, or hinder it from breaking forth. The Princess at these words testifying a curiosity to know farther, the persons that were with her retir'd to the other side of the Chamber; and Constance remaining alone with her, told her word for word all the discourse which had pass'd between him and the Emperour; and representing to her his torture, with all those marks of joy that could be given by a person so infinitely passionate, he had the honour to know that the Princess was as sensible of it as he could desire. In effect, she testified without any dissimulation, that she could not hear news more welcome, and more acceptable to her; and that since the Emperour had the goodness to remit his happiness to her will, he might be certain he should not be long a stranger to those assurances she had given him of her affection; she counsell'd him however to give the Emperour that satisfaction he desir'd of him, by concealing this truth till he thought fit to declare it. Virginia arriv'd soon after; and receiving this relation from Constance, did so partake in his good fortunes, that she could not dissemble the joy which she resent'd.

That night the greatest part of the Court being with the Princess Theodolinda, together with the Princess Placidia, Cleomira, Camilla, Hersilia, Flaminia, and many other Roman Ladies; the Emperour himself came, and with him Constance, Wallia, Taxander, Artabure, and many others: they discoursed of several things, which rendred the conversation very pleasant; amongst the rest, the Emperour having found occasion to praise the beauties of Theodolinda, according to his humour, dwelt longer than ordinary upon that subject: but Theodolinda having a while hearken'd to him without interruption, My Lord (said she) make my beauty no longer your subject; it appears sufficiently that it is not such as you speak it, since among all those valiant Knights which compos'd that gallant company we yesterday beheld, there was not so much as one that did entreprize one single Course for its honour. Ab Madam! (replied Placidia) if you remember, 'twas contrary to your will; and believe, that if you would have permitted, there would have been many who would have embrac'd with too much joy that fair opportunity to signalize themselves. I had so much reason not to request it (replied Theodolinda) that I could not abuse the civility you proffer'd me; but if any one had been so well intended (continued she with a sigh) they needed not have consulted my consent in such an attempt. But Madam, said the Prince Taxander, would you have given that permission, had it been demanded? I know not (replied she) *whether in a day wholly devoted to the Princess Placidia, I could have agreed to it; but well I know, 'twas not at all necessary to demand it.* But if any one (added Prince Wallia) had been so hardy as to enterprize it without your knowledge, could you have pardon'd it? We can easily pardon (replied Theodolinda) those things that make for our honour: for such an offence would be so obliging, that it rather deserves an acknowledgment, than reproof. Take care (replied the Emperour) *lest you unawares engage your self to an acknowledgment: for I am much deceived if that brave unknown person, who unhors'd Eucheré, did not combat for your beauty: and you have then sufficient advantage, since the glory of the Course was paried between your Cavalier and Placidia's.* 'Twas truly equal between us (replied Constance) but I fear I should difficultly have maintain'd the honour I had got, if we had run two other Courses. It is more likely (replied Wallia) *that he feared himself to lose what he came to obtain, and that he believ'd he might with honour depart the Lists, after having run without disadvantage against such a personage as Constance.*

At these words my Master turning his eyes towards Wallia, could not restrain the thoughts that surpriz'd his spirits; Ab Wallia, said he, you give me great suspicions. And there is no little probability, added the Emperour, that he for whom you answer so modestly, is no other than Prince Wallia. There is so much truth in what I have said (replied the Vistogoth Prince) that I might very well make this discourse, without giving cause of suspicions. But to the purpose (said the Princess Cleomira) Where were you yesterday, when the whole Court was to view those fair Jests? There's many persons know (replied Wallia) that by the fall of a horse upon me that morning, I was so bruis'd, that I was forced to keep my bed all day. He spoke not these words with so much assurance, but that the whole company casting their eyes upon him, made him blush as if he had been convicted of some great crime; and in the end the Emperour approaching him, pressed him so hard, that he had no longer power to disavow that truth which he had an intention to conceal for a longer time: At the same time he saw himself expos'd to the Contest he made with him for his Dissimulation, and the praises which they gave him for the honour which he had acquir'd; and the Emperour having likewise urg'd him to confess whether it were not the beauty of Theodolinda he design'd to maintain; After the favour she hath done me in pronouncing my pardon with her fair lips (said he) I will not disavow my folly in committing to so much weakness so important a quarrel. In truth (replied the Princess Theodolinda, blushing to see him blush) you have testifi'd little weakness upon that occasion; and though you are paid for this civility you have done a stranger by the glory you have acquir'd, yet I will all my life confess my self oblig'd to you. But Madam (said Flaminia, a Roman Lady of great quality, but of a malicious spirit, and little beauty, her countenance being more swarthy than fair) if he had been overcome in maintaining this quarrel, as such an accident might have arrived to him, as well as others, would you yet have any obligation? I should however be oblig'd to his intention (replied Theodolinda) and it may be more engag'd than I am, since I should have caus'd that grief which would have seiz'd him for being unfortunate in his Enterprize. You are too grateful (replied Flaminia with a great deal of indiscretion) I should owe no favour to a man who should hazard my glory upon such an occasion; and I assure my self he would not have made himself known for that unknown Knight, if Fortune had not been more favourable to him, than to Eucheré. If the same ill Fortune had attended me (replied Wallia to Flaminia) *it should not have boasted to have run for the beauty of Theodolinda: but because* you have profess'd you would have own'd no obligation, I would have affirm'd that I had contracted for yours.

At this answer of Wallia's, all the company to whom the capricious humour of Flaminia, as well as her person, was displeasing, could not refrain from laughing so loud, that though she had design'd to have return'd somewhat more malicious, she could not be heard. But there was no person present but spoke somewhat in praise of this noble design of Wallia's, by which he had gain'd so much honour; but amongst the rest, my Master mildly complain'd of him, that he had depriv'd him of his glory upon so famous an occasion; and Wallia protested to him that it was with an infinite regret that he ran against him; that he did not believe he would take the place of Euchere; that he could not with honour, or without offending the Princess, whose beauty he maintain'd, excuse himself from one Course, which, said he, you know was all I would make. I am too tedious on these small things, the recital of which are not so important to the life of my Master; but what will it be to you to know a great man, whose actions, without doubt, have long since flown even to these parts of the world?

In the mean time the Emperour having received the excuses of Autalpb and Euchere, by Wallia and by Silicon, visited both the one, and the other; and their wounds not being very dangerous, though they were great, in few days they were reduced to a better estate: no sooner were they perfectly recovered, but the Emperour made them embrace with Constance, though he judg'd that amongst Rivals it would be difficult to establish a true friendship. Autalpb being cur'd, and finding little satisfaction at Rome, as to his love, press'd the treaty with the Emperour. And though Silicon endeavour'd by many difficulties to break it off, yet in the end, seeing he could not oppose himself longer, without making it manifest, he desir'd the continuance of the War, and by the knowledge of that render himself odious to the Emperour and people, he consented to it; but it was with an intention more malicious than all the obstacles he had before caus'd, and of which the dire effects did soon after appear; and the Emperour, as well by his own inclination, as by the counsel of well-intended persons, and particularly of Constance, who was willing to procure the absence of Autalpb, gave to King Alaric a part of Aquitane, and other Lands among the Gauls, which the Emperour Theodosius his Father had promis'd to his Predecessor.

Few days after the Articles were sign'd, and that the Gothick Princes had their Letters in good form, they took leave of the Emperour and the Princess, and all persons with whom they had contracted acquaintance. Autalpb had at this separation, a long discourse with the Princess Flacidia, to whom he protested, that notwithstanding the disdain she had for him, his passion for her should be eternal: but though the Princess testifi'd little correspondence to his affection, yet she treated him at his departure with sufficient and becoming civility. Silicon dissembled before the Visigoth Princes, the particular resentments which he had against them for the interests of Euchere, and told them that he should yet find some occasion to testify his good intentions. Autalpb and my Master acted at this separation each according to his humour, and the estate of his fortune; Constance like a man happy and favoured, and Autalpb like one whose soul the ill success of his love had fill'd with despight and envy against those he believed more fortunate than himself. But the departure of Wallia did sensibly touch my Master; and with all the marks of imaginable affection, they confirm'd a thousand times the promises which they had made of an eternal Amity; my Master having known in this Prince so much virtue, and so many great qualities, that he believed to whatsoever degree Fortune might raise him, he ought not to neglect his friendship. The sadness which he marked upon the visage of Wallia at their separation, much afflicted him, for it seem'd no less than that of Autalpb, who could not without a sensible grief lose the sight of Flacidia.

Pharamond would willingly have dedicated the rest of the night to that attention he thought due to the adventures of Constance; but Valerius unwilling too much to abuse his freedom (though the Prince testified he could not have a greater joy than that of hearkning to him) after having promis'd to begin the next morning at what hour he pleas'd; he gave him the good night, and retir'd to the Chamber which Pharamond had caus'd to be prepar'd for him; leaving the Prince rather troubled with the consideration of what he had related, and with the evils himself relented, than dispos'd to give the rest of the night to sleep.

The end of the Second Book,

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

THe valiant Prince of the French-men was no sooner awaked from that little sleep which his cruel disquiet permitted him to take, but he sent to enquire after the health of Constance, and afterwards of Marcomire and Geneband. For the two last, 'twas told him that their wounds were in a good estate; but for Constance, 'twas related that he had had a little Fever since his departure from his Chamber: that for the present the fit was over; but in regard he had but ill rested that Night, it was necessary he took some repose.

The Prince was troubled for Constance, and had been much more, had he believ'd that it had been accompani'd with any danger: but seeing himself depriv'd of seeing him for that part of the day, he was resolv'd to dedicate it to the relation of the rest of his Adventures, as Valerius had promised him, what he had already heard having strongly interest'd him in all the rest of his life: And to this purpose seeing Valerius himself enter among those who came to give him the Good-day, he made him come into his Closet; and having given orders to some of the most considerable of his Army, he prayed them to take charge of all things, and permit him to spend that Morning with Valerius. After they were entred, the faithful Esquire of Constance, having reassur'd Pharamond in his perplexity for the health of his Master, seated himself by his command near his bed; and seeing that the Prince lent him a diligent ear, he continu'd in this manner the Discourse which he had begun the day before.

The Continuation of the History of Constance and Placidia.

THAT which remains to compleat the Relation of the life of my Master, is without doubt the most important, and most worthy your attention: For as the Discourse I have already made you, hath been a continual chain of good Fortunes which till that time waited upon Constance and his designs, or to speak better, shews you the success that was an inseparable companion of his virtue, without afflicting him with the least disgrace; so you will perceive that in the end not being able to fallise her self, she utterly overturn'd by the sole effect of her natural inconstancy, all that happiness which for so many years, and by so many great actions he seem'd established in: but with the cruel revolution of the Fortunes of Constance, you will likewise see that also of the greatest part of the World, of which the particulars of most importance are without doubt come to your knowledge, since they are of such consequence as not to be obscur'd to any.

Oh my Country, with what courage can I relate thy ruines, which hath made the whole World take compassion upon thee, and have without doubt drawn tears from the eyes of those Barbarians that caused it!

After the departure of Autalph, my Master remain'd at Rome in a most happy estate, and in the fairest hopes his own wishes could entertain; for as the intentions the Emperour had to favour him were known unto Placidia, so this great Princess made no difficulty to testify the desires she had to render him entirely happy, so soon as the conjuncture of Affairs would permit the Emperour to publish his inclinations: Not but that he was yet troubled at the corrivalship of Euchere, and power of Stilicon, which might well somewhat obscure him, since it was formidable to the Emperour himself; but being assured of the affection

affection of Placidia, and that of Honorius, he suffered with less disquiet than impatience which his love made him resent, and attended the compleating his felicity, with an entire resignation to the will of Placidia.

Honorius had scarce begun to taste the sweetness of that repose which the peace he had concluded with Alaric gave him, when from all sides there arrived news which infinitely perplexed him, and cut off the hopes of peace from all those who most earnestly desir'd it. 'Twas first reported that Constantine the Son of Aldroet King of Britania Armorica, having been sent by his Father into Great Britain, anciently called Albion, the conquest of which had cost so much Roman blood, had by his valour rendred himself so considerable to the people of that stately Island, that they had chosen him for their King; and he not contenting himself with those bounds which the Sea had given to his Dominions, had caused himself to be proclaimed Emperor, and with a mighty Army was ranging amongst the Gauls. To this, they added for many particulars of the valour of this Prince, his excellent Conduct, and great experience in War, that such an Enemy could not but be formidable both to the Emperor and Empire.

Honorius was beginning to raise Forces to oppose him; and advising about it with Stilicon and my Master, when there came other news to Rome, the cause of greater trouble and changes. There was at first a dull report, that at the entrance into Gallia, there had happened a great fight between the Armies of Alaric and the Romans: sometime after it was said that the Romans had been cut in pieces by the Visigoths, without knowing the cause of renewing the War; but in the end there arrived some Visigoths at Rome, who had charge from Alaric to demand a particular audience from the Emperor, make their complaints, and inform him the truth of those things, of which he was yet ignorant.

Honorius, though opposed by Stilicon, comply'd with their desires: and after they had shewn their Charges, and deliver'd the Letters of Alaric full of complaints and bloody reproaches, they related, that at the same time that Autalph and Wallia departed from Rome, Stilicon had with diligence dispatched Messengers to him who commanded the Army he had left at Ravenna, who was a Jew both by Nation and Religion, named Saulus, a hardy and valiant Man, and whom Stilicon for those reasons had raised from degree to degree, unto the height he now possessed, as a man in whom he had an entire confidence. That by those Messengers, and by many Letters which they shewed the Emperor, he had given him command, but a command accompanied with great promises, to follow the Army of Alaric, when they advanc'd to march into Gallia, and seek occasion to fight them, or at least to begin again the War, and break that peace which had been concluded. That Saulus obeying punctually Stilicon's injunctions, parted some few days before Alaric decamp'd; and marching by those ways which were best known to him, just at the entrance in to the Gauls (without Alaric's having the least suspicion of his march, by the belief he had of the occasion the Romans had of an Army to oppose their Enemies in Gallia) he had placed his whole Forces at a Post by which the Goths must of necessity pass: And while Alaric and his Troops marched without any suspicion, and in a manner out of any war-like Order, the perfidious Saulus, had charg'd them with so much violence, that he soon made a terrible slaughter. That King Alaric himself, and the Prince his Brother, were both dangerously wounded at the beginning of the encounter; and that by their misfortune the Visigoths were reduced to such extremity, that they were scarce able to make resistance: when Prince Wallia having ralli'd the most valiant with an admirable diligence, came to the succour of the rest, who encourag'd by his valour, in the end put the Battel into such a posture, that the almost-defeated Visigoths, against all appearance, by the effects of an admirable courage, changed the face of the Combat, and gained an entire Victory. That so cruel a treachery had in such sort incens'd the Souldiers, that they scarce left alive one of their Enemies: That Saulus their Captain being slain among them, they found about him Letters of Stilicon's, which discover'd his whole Plot. That King Alaric oblig'd for his safety, and this fair Victory, to the Valour of Wallia, lay wounded in a little Village near the place of the Battle; and from whence he had sent them to know the reason of this unworthy treachery, and to protest, that if such a satisfaction were not made as the greatness of the Injury did merit, he would with Fire and Sword destroy all Italy. In sum, they gave the Emperor the Letters, which they had taken in the pockets of Saulus, which Honorius soon knew to be the hand-writing of Stilicon; and in which he had not only given Saulus order to attack the Visigoths, but to act many other things, which discovered clearly the intentions of Stilicon, and particularly a short Letter, of which the substance was this.

Stilicon to Saulus

Fight in what manner soever you can: It is not so important for us to overcome, as to renew the War, and hinder a peace so contrary to our intentions. Yet I could wish the defeat of Alaric, and the Princes of his House, because they desire not War with us; which perhaps their Successors may more willingly incline to. Constantine is upon the point to enter amongst the Gauls; Gunderic returns to Spain, and Pharamond will ere long have passed the Rhine: We have too long been without War, which stops and interrupts the course of our designs. The Alliance we have made with the Huns, shall if possible endure but a short time; nor shall much time be spent e're the Empire be full of troubles, to give place to the execution of our thoughts. You may judge of the part you have in our Fortune; for Stilicon and Euchere can never forget what you shall contribute.

By the reading of these words, and by the discourse of the Visigoths, the Emperour entirely knew the designs of Stilicon; and finding them agree with the suspicion he already had of him, he began to consult with himself, how to assure himself against such an Enemy, and how to revenge himself of his perfidiousness: and having manifested to the Visigoths, the displeasure he had for the treachery which was acted towards them, for which the Actors had been sufficiently punish'd, since they all perish'd; he promised that he would do them such reason, that their King should confess himself to be satisfied; only entreating them to dissemble, and not make too publique a demonstration of their resentment.

Honorius now resolv'd, though with a great deal of reluctancy, upon the death of Stilicon, but his disposition being naturally tender, 'twas rather his fear that carried him to this resolution, out of the dread he had of a person whose power made him doubt his own safety, than any inclination to cruelty; nor was it for a disposition like his, a small enterprise to punish such a man as Stilicon; who had at his devotion not only the Governours of most places, but the greatest, and greatest part of the Officers of the Armies: and the Emperour feared with reason, lest if he had any knowledge of his design, he would put himself in a condition to hinder the execution of it, and raise yet greater troubles in the Empire. The oldest of his Counsellors, when he demanded their advice, told him, that there could be no mean in that action: that he ought to oppress Stilicon before he gave him leisure to defend himself, or so much as to suspect a design against him; not doubting but that if time should be given him to retire, he would be sufficiently powerful, both in Men, Cities and Money, to begin a War, of which the success would be doubtful.

By their discourse the Emperour was fortified in his resolution, and now thought of nothing but the means to execute it: and to this purpose, after having examin'd his thoughts, what persons he ought to employ, as well for this execution as those events might follow it; he fixed his mind upon Constance, as upon the most hardy, most powerful, and most affectionate to his interests, of all those whom he durst confide in; besides that he believ'd him particularly concern'd in Stilicon's fall, as against a person who had lately declared himself his Enemy, and who notwithstanding their apparent reconciliation, might probably trouble him in all his designs, and particularly in that he had for Placidia. He therefore the same day sent for him, and retiring only with him into his Clofset, having made a preamble to the discourse he had to make him, with all sorts of Careffes, and testimonies of his affection; he related at large, all he had understood from the Envoys of Alarie, and shew'd him the Letters of Stilicon, by the sight of which my Master could no longer doubt of his infidelity, nor find reasons to justify him, judging clearly of his design, both by his Writings and proceeding.

But when the Emperour, having finish'd his complaints, and declar'd the design he had to put Stilicon to death, told him that he had cast his eyes upon him, as upon the most faithful of his Friends, the most couragious and powerful of all the Romans, and him who ought most desire the death of a man, who was his continual opposer; and in the end conjur'd him by all the affection he had promised him, and by all he bore Placidia, to execute his will: Constance taking him by the hand, and kissing it with a behaviour full of love and respect. My Sovereign (said he) my life is yours, and I should be the most ignoble and most ingrateful of all men, should I not be always ready to sacrifice it for your service: for as you have permitted me to hope from your goodness a price which ought to carry me willingly to any thing may merit it, so I shall be always ready to serve you to the last drop of my blood, and with joy shall I spend it all for a Prince who hath conferred on me this never too highly to be valued favour. But Sir, if I may yet merit any thing from your goodness, permit me to tell tell you, that you have not, it may be, a Subject more capable to oppose the noxious designs of Stilicon than my self, that is, in ways conformable to my courage, and those employments you have honour'd me with: and if Stilicon be to be fought with either one to one, or in the head of your Armies, to destroy him, with all those that favour him; no man can do it better than Constance: but to be his Executioner in those ways which you think best to dispatch him, you cannot in the whole extent of your whole Empire find a man so improper as my self. I need not alledge to your Majesty that I bare my first Arms under him, and that I cannot with honour draw that Sword against his life, which I first drew under his command: This reason is not sufficient for me to dispense with the obedience I owe to your will; but certainly, Sir, you would be ill served by me in such an enterprize, for I know so well my own heart, that I dare tell you, that in any design I undertake, the least objects of pity are capable to disturb me, and then the success, without doubt, will not answer your intentions. But as I have boasted my self capable to serve you in other ways, so there are persons less able than my self in them, but more fit in those which you purpose. Give to every one an employment agreeable to his inclination and capacity; and whilst I assure for your service the affections of the Romans, and the fidelity of the Governours of Cities, and Officers of the Army, and prepare all things for the sequels which such an affair may draw with it; Give Heraclian, or Maximine, or other such men as them, the Commission, of which they will acquit themselves much better than I shall understand to do, especially if you engage them by any great interest. It is not (added he a little after, seeing the Emperour listen peaceably unto him) but that if I durst speak in an affair of so much consequence, I should take the liberty to tell my Emperour, that this guilty Stilicon is still the same Stilicon, whom you so far honor'd as to espouse his Daughter, and who at other times by many great and important actions, hath well serv'd both his Emperour and the Empire, and whom if your Majesty would, you might assure your self of, without dipping your hands in the blood of one you have called Father; and so preserve advantageously that reputation of clemency, which you have so well acquir'd, and avoid those troublesome thoughts, which a bloody execution must bring to your memory: for in sum, Sir, I cannot refrain from telling you, that how criminal soever he is, the fortune of such a man makes me compassionate him; and willingly would I spare some of my blood to save his life, so that his safety might not cloud your repose, or the Empires quiet.

But what means can there be found (replied the Emperour) to assure us against his designs, without putting him to death? For I avow to you, that it is with an infinite reluctancy, and by a necessity that himself hath imposed upon me, that I took up this resolution. You may cause him to be arrested (repl'd Constance) and imprison him in the Hippodrome the rest of his dayes; and as I know the number of his enemies to be much greater than that of his Friends, so I can assure you, that few will embrace his party when he is depriv'd of liberty. The way you talk of is very uncertain (repl'd the Emperour) and I believe it will be very difficult to arrest Stilicon, and his Son, who must be arrested with him, without killing them: you see what a great number of persons accompany them, who will perhaps be so hardy as to put themselves in his defence. In this case (replied Constance) none can accuse you of the death of Stilicon, nor can any other but himself be guilty of it, since he draws it by his resistance.

With these words, and many others which he added, my Master inclined the Emperour only to cause Stilicon and his Son to be arrested, though many have believed otherwise; and the same day he gave order to Heraclian, who mortally hated Stilicon, and had redoubled his hatred against Eucherus, for the fall with which he broke his arm: he having a soul much different from that of Constance, received it with joy, and executed it with sufficient cruelty, as all the World knows. You have without doubt understood, Sir, the particulars of an Adventure known to the whole World, and that belief shall hinder me from repeating it to you, and suffer me to tell you in few words that Heraclian having received Orders to take Stilicon and his Son, alive or dead, accompanied with the Pretorian Bands, he went to his House, and met him coming forth thence, together with his Wife and Son, and a great number of persons of his Train; nor did he only arrest them as he had Order from the Emperour, but under some appearance of resistance which some of his made shew of, he slew Stilicon, and his Son Euchere; and the Princess Serena, born of the blood of Emperours, throwing her self between her Husband and Son, received two mortal blows, of which she dyed the same day.

Thus fell Stilicon, a man without doubt endowed with great and noble qualities, and who for his Heroick Actions, was raised by the Romans to the highest Dignities, and had merited not only to be the Father-in-law of his Emperour; but to have the absolute Government of the whole Empire. Policy and Valour seem'd in him weaved together, to make him both a great Politician, and a great Captain; and he might without doubt, have merit-

ted a chief place among the ancient Hero's, if the glory of his life had not been blasted by his last unworthy intentions. His Son being slain with him, there scarce remained a person of his Family: for being by extract a Vandal, he had few kindred at Rome; so that no trouble followed his death: for as well for these reasons, as by the diligence of Constance, and the Authority he had over the Men of War, all things remained in that peaceable condition after this action, as if no such thing had arriv'd.

The Emperour testified himself not well satisfied with the severity of Heraclian, and was pleas'd himself to shed some tears at the death of Stilicon's Lady; but he soon after comforted himself, as well for the belief he had to have procured an entire repose by this execution, as for the satisfaction he had to see that it was not disapprov'd by any person; and that both Rome, the Empire, and the whole world judg'd Stilicon to have been justly punish'd. As for Constance, though he had little reason to love Stilicon, and in probability ought not to be troubled at the death of a Rival like Euchere, who by the Authority of his Father, might have very much troubled him: Yet it is most certain, he was touch'd with so much pity for their misfortune, that he could not for many days forget the trouble it caus'd; so that amongst the very friends of Stilicon, there were few that manifested so great sorrow. The excellencies of Placidia's nature made her sensible of the misfortunes of this house, and deplore with excessive tears the death of Serenas; and though she never had other than aversion for Euchere, yet she could not hear the relation of his death without some marks of compassion.

By the death of Stilicon, Honorius regain'd his Authority, but it rendred little repose to the Empire: for were it by the devices of Stilicon which had given subject to the Barbarians to assault the Empire on all sides, or by the will of Heaven, to abate the proud power of a Sov'raignty continued for so many ages: they began hardly to taste the change which the death of that great Favourite had wrought both in the Court, and in affairs, when it was understood at Rome, that the Gauls, Spain, Germany, and many other Provinces of the Empire were threatn'd to be attack'd more fiercely than ever, by the Vandals, Franks, Britains, Burgundians, and many other Nations. There ran likewise a Report that Alaric notwithstanding the satisfaction that the Emperour had given him, did yet meditate something against Italy, and seem'd not contented with the League he had made with Honorius.

But that which caus'd the greatest dread to the Emperour and the Romans, was the entrance of Constantine King of Great Britain amongst the Gaules, and the progress he had made there: for hardly was it understood that he was entred, but that news was seconded with a relation how he had cut in pieces all the Forces which oppos'd his March, and that by the terrour of his Arms he had render'd himself Master of that Country, which is particularly call'd the Province of the Romans, unto the great City of Arles, before the which he was encamp'd, and hop'd in few days to take it: To this discourse was added wonderful praises of the valour and experience of Constantine, whom they compar'd to the most Heroick personages of the world, and the greatest Captains of past Ages, and of whom they spoke as the most formidable Enemy the Romans had since the time of Hannibal.

Whatever inclination Constance had for the War, or for the occasions to acquire glory, in a time when no person could dispute with him the chief employments; yet he could not but sigh with grief to think he should by these troubles be banish'd from his sweet hopes, not believing he could demand their accomplishments with honour, whilst he was forc'd to go fight in this present necessity of the Empire; he therefore delay'd not to resolve himself, though he was mortally afflicted; and not only counsell'd the Emperour what he should do to defend himself against such a world of Enemies, but demand'd of him the command of the Army to oppose Constantine, judging this Expedition the most important, and considering the glory that he might yet acquire against an enemy whose reputation was so great, and against a man to whom many Nations had already given the Title of Emperour.

Honorius, with a thousand praises of his Generosity, which made him prefer the service of his Prince and Country before so dear an interest as his love, consented to his demand. Protesting to him, at his return from this Expedition, he would not only give him Placidia, but by marks more considerable than the gift of Placidia, testify the esteem and the affection he had for him, Constance took this discourse for the greatest promise could be made him, not believing that it was in the power of the Emperour, nor any man breathing, to bestow on him a greater or more considerable gift than that of Placidia. Thus by the hopes to possess her, he endeavour'd to moderate the grief which he had to part from her, and prepar'd himself for his Expedition with all diligence requisite in so urging a necessity. In few days all things were put in a condition fit for his departure; and the Forces he was to command having received Orders to joyn and embody themselves, the day of his departure came.

The Princess, who dissembled no longer the affection which she had for him, knowing it to be approv'd both by the Emperour, and all the world, all the time which preceded it had manifested sufficient sadness; and when he took leave of her, she abandoned her self so to grief for a person of his Honour and Courage, that at the sight of it, Constance was astonish'd, and felt his to redouble. She testified the resentment which she had by words which fully discover'd it, and persisted in her sorrow after an extraordinary manner, when interrupting her; I am too much oblig'd to your goodness (said he) for the part you take in my misfortune; for in brief, mangre the glory which I may possibly acquire, I must call that misfortune which separates me from you; yet this notice which you take thereof, gives me a sweet consolation, by making me see that I am happy above my merit, and above my hopes; and though I never parted from Rome with those hopes as now accompany me in this expedition, and that I may well suppose at my return, I shall be the most happy among men; I have something in my heart which hinders me from being so sensible of this joy as I ought, and which makes me fear some extraordinary change in my fortune. I know not (replied the Princess) *how you come to have these predictions, but I confess to you that I cannot overcome the sadness which I have for your departure, whatever opposition I make against it; and if I could, without wounding your reputation, hinder your expedition, I should do it with all my heart; not but that I judge well, I may be more afflicted at this last parting, than at others you have made, as well because the first were necessary for your glory, and your design, as because you truly are, and ought to be more dear to me now, than then; but though by these reasons I excuse a part of my grief, yet I vow to you I feel something so little common, that I cannot but draw from thence evil presages. Endeavour you, if it be possible, to prevent the effects; and as you have no occasion longer to fight for the purchase of honour, but only to preserve what you have acquir'd, and that no person disputes it with you, seek not danger without necessity, but consider that a great Captain, on whose person relies the whole fortune of the Empire, ought not to expose himself like a young Adventurer. Remember likewise that this Placidia, who in your first Combates had no reason to take that concern in your life, which she now does, hath some part in you, if all that you would persuade her is true; and that you ought to preserve your self for her, when you would not do it for your self.*

Constance at these obliging words bowing down his head, and fixing his lips upon one of the Princesses fair hands, which was the greatest favour his services, or the Emperours concurrence could yet obtain for him; I am asham'd (said he) at the favour you do me; and this life which you too much honour by the honour which you give it, is not worthy of the interest you take in its preservation. I have an infinite greater resentment than I can express; but you shall permit me to tell you, if you please, that it is not on that side Fortune threatens me; and that if I had nothing but death to fear, especially in these occasions, where it is so familiar, my heart would not be at all troubled. I hope to Heaven, I shall return to see you, and return Conquerour of the Enemies of the Empire; but I can scarce establish in my spirit the hopes of that sole happiness I can desire, though according to all appearances, I never had more reason, since your fair lips, and those of the Emperour, have assured it me. As you fear of our side (added the Princess) *so I fear of yours; and if you can assure me from the fear which I have of your life, I will assure you from that you have of my affection; and I promise you more solemnly than I have hitherto done, that at your return you shall find Placidia, as faithful and affectionate as you can desire. Receive* (continued she, presenting him her hand) *the word which I give you, and be assured that by my own will, I will never be to any, but to Constance.*

All my Masters grief could not hinder him from being sensible of some joy at this discourse of Placidia's; and at the same time the Emperour entring the Chamber with the Princess Theodolinda, and many other personages; Constance for respect sake, retiring from Placidia, and approaching towards him, and beholding him with a behaviour which denoted something extraordinary; My Lord (said he) *I promise you that I will overcome your Enemies, and powerfully contribute to the repose of the Empire; but remember if you please, that you have promis'd me Placidia. As she is a possession too great for me, so I shall never overcome the fear I have to lose her; and now in departing from her, I can with difficulty preserve the hopes you have given me: not that I distrust the word of my Sovereign, I believe it inviolable, but I distrust that same Fortune which hitherto hath so well treated me; and going now upon your service, I conjure you Sir, to preserve me Placidia. Yes* (said the Empeyour) Yes, Constance I will preserve her as dearly as my own life ; and you may certainly be assur'd of the promise I have made you before gods and men, that by my consent, Placidia shall never be any's but yours.

At these words, Constance endeavour'd to dispel his sadness ; and some time after he had taken leave of the Emperour and the Princess, he bid adieu likewise to Theodolinda, who had an infinite friendship and esteem for him ; to Cleomira, and to many other considerable persons, who interest'd themselves in his Fortunes ; and particularly to Virginia, to whom he bore a most transcendent respect, which was encreas'd by the esteem he had for her, in regard that for the love of Placidia, she had refused to marry with the principal amongst the Romans, and had fully resolv'd to yoke her self to the fortunes of the Princess.

The most considerable persons of the Court would follow my Master to this War : Artabure march'd with the chiefest in employment ; the young Castinus, Anaxilla, Arrobinde, and many others, amongst whom was Taxander, a Prince of great merit, who though Sovereign of a fair Monarchy, chose to serve under him, and would begin his first proof in War, under a man who at the age of twenty seven years had already surpass'd the reputation of the most ancient, and most experienced Captains. With this fair Troop, Constance parted from Rome, accompanied with the Vows of all the people, to whom he was infinitely dear for his virtue : and having joyn'd his Forces, and rendezvouz'd that body which was to compose our Army, we march'd towards the Gauls, and particularly towards the Province of the Romans, in which Constantine had already made so great progress, and where he at present besieg'd the strong City of Arles.

The Events of this War having been so important, that they could not but come to the knowledge of all Europe, and particularly of a Prince interest'd like your Majesty in the Roman affairs, I shall endeavour to be succinct, and yet speak as much as I ought, that I may not be silent of my Masters greatest Actions. We had made but a few days advance, when we understood that Constantine had taken Arles, and having plac'd in it a strong Garrison, was gone to besiege the proud City of the Massilians. This advice made us hasten our march, though Constance hoped that Massilia might stop the Enemies proceeding till our arrival. As this occasion was more important than all the preceding, and the Enemy more formidable than any that Constance had hitherto overcome ; so his Army was greater, and more numerous than any he had commanded : for when we entred amongst the Gauls, it was compos'd of more than fifteen thousand Horse, and sixty thousand Foot-men. With this potent Force we advanc'd by great marches ; and passing by the Country of the Alexandrians and Lucernois, we approach'd in the end to the Province of the Romans ; but by reason that Constantine had broken the Bridges in several places, our march was more tedious than Constance either expected or desired ; and we were forced to give time to Constantine to render himself master of the proud City of the Massilians, which having besieg'd by Land and Sea with an extraordinary vigour, he had in few days carry'd by an absolute Force, against the opinion of the whole world, and against all evident appearances.

Constance knowing by these actions what man he had to deal with, thought he ought not to neglect any thing which experience had taught him ; and Constantine, to whom the reputation of Constance was not unknown, thinking himself oblig'd to employ all his judgment to preserve against so great a man what he had already gain'd, parted from Massilia to come and encounter us ; and in the mean time sent before several small bodies to dispute the passages, and to perplex and impeach us upon all opportunities possible. In effect, they gave us an infinite trouble, and it was in many combats with these Troops that Artabure did nobly augment the general opinion which was before had of his Valour, and that the Prince Taxander and Castinus began to make themselves known by many signal actions. 'Twas at this time that those two brave men which now attend your Majesty, and which yesterday knew my Master, and made you know him, having receiv'd some injury from Constantine's party, presented themselves to Constance, and during the whole time we were in Gallia, fought under our Banners.

In summ, notwithstanding the endeavours and hindrances of our Enemies, we at last entred into Provence, which they had almost entirely reduc'd to their obedience : but as neither of the two Chieftains could despise the other, and knew of what consequence the success of a Battel would prove, they would not give it but upon good grounds ; and to that purpose fought daily all the advantages which the knowledge they had in this martial mystery might instruct them to find out ; hereupon several Skirmishes happen'd, wherein Fortune was various, but still much blood was shed. In one of these, the two Generals encountered each other with their Swords in their hands at the head of some Cavalry ; and after

after having furiously run together, they exchang'd several blows, with which both were wounded: but the coming in of their Troops permitted them not to finish their Combat, though they had a great desire, and parted mutually perswaded of each others Valour.

In the mean time, as they had a reciprocal esteem, and were both highly generous; they made war with a noble civility upon all occasions that were offer'd, oftentimes sending back prisoners without Ransome, and treating in all things like men truly great and magnanimous. Some months were pass'd before Constance could find such an occasion as he desired, to give battle; but in the end, being advertis'd that Jovian who commanded over a part of the Gauls for the Emperour, had taken Constantine's part, and was levying Soldiers in those Countries that were at his devotion, to come and joyn himself with him, and that in all probability he might in a very short time arrive with a considerable Army; he judg'd it not best to attend him, and permit himself to be encompass'd by two potent Armies, since that of Constantine alone was at least as numerous as his, and in a condition to dispute the Victory: he believed now that these expectations of Jovian had been the cause of Constantine's endeavouring to shun the Combat, and doubted not but that without farther delay he ought to constrain him to come to a general Battle; he therefore sought all means possible: and Constantine, who naturally scorn'd to flee fighting, and acted not all he might have done to evade it, because in effect he found himself in an estate to fight any Army which was neither stronger nor better disciplin'd than his, and with an enemy, to whom the event of the fight must be of more hazard than to him:

Mov'd by these reasons, or others unknown to us, he oppos'd himself little to the design of Constance, neither disput'd the passage of a River, by which we must of necessity get at him, and where he might have stopp'd and fought us at an advantage. 'Tis most true, that Constance knowing how dangerous it was too precipitately to divide his strength before an enemies Army, had pass'd over a party of his by night; and those which in the morning found themselves on the other side the River, were strong enough to defend themselves against such Troops as Constantine might send to attacque them, and give time to the rest to pass over with more leisure: Constantine was blamed that he did not endeavour to defend this passage; but perhaps not thinking that Constance desired so soon to come to battle, he had neglected that precaution, which might have hindered him: however it was, the two Armies faced each other without any obstacle which might hinder them from joyning, in a great Plain adjacent to the City; and after having began by some Skirmishes, they at length came to a general Field.

The two great Captains, both of the one and the other party, did all that could be hop'd from their valour and excellent conduct: and many valiant personages who fought under them in different employments, signaliz'd themselves by an incredible number of noble actions: in short, all the Soldiers fought so courageously, both on the one and the other side, that night shut in before victory had declar'd her self for either, though the Plain was all cover'd with dead bodies floating in blood. The two Armies stood all that night in the same field, where they had so eagerly contended; the two valiant Generals employing themselves wholly in acquitting their charges, and in seeking those advantages, which might yield a happy success to that Battle, the beginnings of which had been so horrible and doubtful.

No sooner did the day appear, but at the sound of the Trumpets, the Fight was renew'd: Artabure commanded the right Wing of our Army; Constance having placed himself in the head of the left, that he might be oppos'd to Constantine whom he had observ'd the day before, to fight in the right of his. Taxander and Constance commanded our Cavalry, and both the one and the other in that memorable day acquir'd a worthy reputation: It will be difficult for me, to recount to you those many famous deeds by which my Master this day made his valour and his skill in War deservedly admir'd: but I must needs avow, that Constantine forgot not any thing which might be expected from the most valiant men and greatest Captains. The Victory was disput'd with a resolution equal to that of the preceding day; and we oftentimes beheld our selves in a condition that might rather make us fear than hope: but in the end, Constance, irritated with so long a resistance, after having had two horses slain under him, and two tired with the extraordinary travel he made them suffer; running through all the Ranks, and shewing himself to the Soldiers, he encourag'd them in such a manner, by his speech, by his action, and by his example; and did so seasonably succour those whom he saw worsted, that in the end his enemies began to quit the field, and by little and little, disorder and fear increas'd, they abandon'd that Victory, which they had so valiantly disput'd.

'Twas in fine, as entire to us as we could desire: for the enemy having left more than fifty thousand dead upon the place, the rest were in such fort scatter'd, that Constantine could very difficultly rally a small number, at the head of which he made an admirable retreat to the City of Arles, which he had taken some time before, and where he intended to stay, out of the confidence he had of the succours which Jovian had promis'd him. This Victory was great and advantageous, but it cost us twenty thousand lives. And always when Constance hath spoken of it, he hath been us'd to say, that the Romans in this Battel had truly vanquish'd the Britains, but that Constance had not overcome Constantine; and that by the experience of fighting him hand to hand, as he had done that day, he durst affirm that he had been invincible, had he but commanded men as valiant as the Romans, or if Fortune had been less contrary to him.

This knowledge he had of his enemy, made him judge that the whole War consisted in his sole person; and having given charge to Artabure to beat up and down the Plain, and not permit the vanquish'd to rally, and form such a body as might obstruct his designs; he without delay laid siege to the City of Arles, whither Constantine was retir'd. The King of the Britains was astonish'd at this diligence of his enemy; and though his courage was not at all lessen'd by the loss of this Battle, he repented his having inclos'd himself in that manner; judging well that Constance would not give Jovian time to come and succour him; besides a belief he had that Jovian, after having heard of his defeat, would not rashly engage the victorious Army. Things fell as he had fore-judged: for Constance finding the City he attack'd unfurnish'd with many things necessary for defence, and weaken'd in several places, by the breaches which Constantine had made when he besieged it, and which they had no time to repair, he press'd it in such fort, and gave so many vigorous assaults, that in few days Constantine lost all hopes to defend it, and resolv'd rather to trust his safety to his Sword, than to the Walls of the City: and to this purpose, one day when Constance caus'd an assault to be given, after having for one part of the day defended the Walls with an admirable valour, and constrain'd ours to retire with sufficient loss, in all places where he encounter'd them, on a sudden, whether it were that the present occasion inspir'd him with that resolution, or whether he had taken that resolution before he mounted on horseback, with a number of the most valiant and best armed he had with him, causing a Gate to be opened, when it was least expected, he threw himself among the first of our Troops that he found in his passage, resolving to lose his life among the Roman Swords, or open himself a way through our Army.

This unexpected sally caus'd so much fear in the first whom he encountred, that he had no great difficulty to rout them; and if the heat of the Combat had not made him forget the care of his safety, he might without doubt have pass'd through the disorder he had caus'd: but being chafed by some light wound he had, and encourag'd by the first success which he had, aspiring at something more than the retreat, he engag'd himself farther than he ought in prudence to have done, or than himself had resolv'd; giving time to the Prince Taxander to come with Brigades of Cavalry, to the assistance of those whom he had attack'd: after those succours, there came likewise more; so that in the end Constantine found himself encompass'd with his, a good part of whom he saw slain before him, and had himself his Horse killed under him; and having acted things worthy his prodigious valour, and to speak truth rais'd up a rampart of dead bodies about him, he obstinately determin'd rather to lose his life, than receive it from his enemy: when his good fortune led Constance into the same place, whither the confusion of the sally had spur'd him, and where understanding the danger he was in, he made a lane through his own men to come up to him; and seeing him on foot all covered with blood, and yet in that condition making the most hardy fear his approaches, he commanded his men to retire, with so much authority, that there was not one, but at the same instant obeyed him.

His valiant enemy having time to breath and turn his eyes on all sides, knew him by several marks, but particularly by this action; and seeing that he was engag'd to him for his life, he would no longer dispute it with him, but presenting him his Sword; If you be Constance (said he) I render my self to you, nor can I disdain to yield to the Fortune and valour of so great a man. Constance at the same time alighting, and receiving the Sword which he presented him; As Lieutenant of the Emperor (said he) I receive the Sword you yield to him; but as a man that knows how to render what he owes to so noble a Prince as you. I give you the Sword of Constance. And at these words, taking his Sword from his side which by fortune was not the same he received of Placidia, he placed it at that of Constantine, who received this civility with the best grace in the world, and with all the marks of a true and noble courage.

Constance

Constance at the same time having caus'd a fair Horse to be given him, and others to such of his train as wanted: he led him to his Tents riding by his side, and telling him all those things which he believ'd seasonable to comfort him in his misfortunes. In brief, he treated him in as noble a manner, as his best friends, in his and their greatest prosperity could have done: The next morning, the City being surrendred, he conducted him thither, judging it more commodious than the Camp; gave him the fairest apartment, and caus'd him to be serv'd like a great King, taking nothing from him but the name of Roman Emperour, which his Subjects had given him: and in truth, all the civility he render'd him, did seem to be truly due; for I believ'd at the sight of him, never to have seen any personage of a nobler aspect than he, and whose whole person would sooner create an affection and respect together. Nor was his person only excellent, or he only a great and valiant Captain; but these qualities accompanied with all those which might render a Prince accomplish'd, and with a politeness of spirit, hard to be found in those of his Nation: he was enrich'd with as much sweetness in his conversation, as fierceness in fight, and with all that might render a man amiable both to one and the other sex. His age was little different from that of Constance, and the conformity of their minds and virtuous inclinations, gave them a mutual esteem.

Constance having taken his Parol, took from him all sorts of Guards, and forgot no manner of civility or good treatment could possibly be made; and Constantine receiv'd them with a noble acknowledgment, and infinite marks of affection to him that render'd them, testifying with much earnestness how much he was sensible of them: but in few days he could not dissemble that grief which perplexed him, which by little and little augmented in such manner, that in the end he began to change his colour; which Constance perceived with an affectionate sorrow, praying him in terms full of kindness to inform him the cause, protesting that he would do all things possible either to comfort or serve him, not being able to imagine that change of Fortune could produce such a change on a spirit like his, especially since he had promis'd him all civil usage from the Emperour, and durst hope his future condition might be as happy as his past; and in the end, he told him things so obliging, that the Captive King being touch'd with his generosity, having intreated a patient audience, open'd himself entirely to him, and gave him the recital of his whole life, the particulars of which are not yet come to my knowledge, nor are at all necessary to that of the life of my Master. Constance hearken'd to the Heroick adventures of Constantine with admiration; and when he saw it was time to give him that consolation that was necessary for him.

Generous Prince (said he) the interest I take in those great things which you have made me understand, is such, that it will make me perhaps forget one part of my duty, to serve you as I desire. You know that I am Lieutenant and subject to Honorius, whose prisoner you are, so that I cannot dispose of your liberty without his consent, or running a hazard to incur his indignation: but because his goodness is well known to me, and that liberty is necessary for you, I will hazard all things rather than render miserable a Prince of such merit; and out of the hopes I have that the Emperour will pardon me, I declare you to be free, and give you power to retire when you please. If the Emperour condemns my proceeding, I shall present him my head for satisfaction; but if he approves it, as I hope he will, I demand no other conditions from you, than that you no more invade the Lands of the Empire, nor suffer more the name of Emperour, which you have receiv'd, as I understand by the recital of your life, against your own will, and which is not at all more glorious to you than the Title which your illustrious birth and great actions have given you.

Constantine admir'd the generous demeanour of Constance; but not being willing to abuse his generosity by putting him in danger to provoke the Emperour, and seeing himself forced to accept it, by the resolution which Constance had testified, he did it with this condition, that Constance should promise to write to him the truth, whether the Emperour were well satisfied with his disposal of his liberty; protesting, that in case he were not, he would come and submit himself, as soon as he heard of it, without finding the excuse of any necessities that might impede him. 'Twas upon these conditions that he accepted the liberty which Constance gave him; and having testified those acknowledgments a soul great like his could imagine, and promis'd to return to demand the continuation of his friendship, as soon as his affairs would permit him; he parted from Arles with the Convoy which Constance had given him, leaving us all full of the esteem we had conceiv'd for his great qualities.

Scarce was Constantine gone, when we understood that Jovian had his Army on foot, and had himself taken the name of Emperour. Constance having nothing which might defer his marching against him, parted from Arles with thoughts much different from those which possess'd him when he went to the war against Constantine, and with a confidence full of disdain of his enemy; which led him against him as to an assured enemy: and truly the effects did not at all falsifie his hopes: but to abridge the recital of this War, I will only tell you, that having with a swift march pass'd through the Country of the Gaballes, we encountred Jovian among the Vivariens; who knowing that we had lost a great part of our men in the Combat against Constantine, refused not at all to fight, but presented us battel; but it proved a bloody one, both to his party and himself: for he was slain, and almost his whole Army cut off by so general a defeat, that its parallel hath scarce ever been seen.

But this Victory, though so entire, cost us more than all the others we ever gaincd: for my Master being wounded in the Arm with an Arrow, the steel was found to be impositon'd, and the victorious Constance not only reduced to the extremity of his life, but after we had several times despaired of it, by reason of the dire effects of that cruel poison, he staid a whole year in the City of the Tediosages, whither we caused him to be carried, not only without recovering his health, but without leaving us at the end of the year any hopes of his safety. From this misfortune proceeded all the rest which have rendred his life miserable: For in the time that he strugled and disputed with death, happened the ruine of my unfortunate Country, and those pityful disorders which have drawn compassion from the whole world, and which Constance had been able to hinder, and had hindered without doubt, if this cruel wound had not deprived him not only of the means, but the very knowledge of it, by the diligence we had to conceal from him those miseries, which without doubt had deprived him of the little life he had remaining.

It is fit that I should briefly tell you (though without doubt it is long since come to your knowledge) those sad accidents, which happened in Italy, after our departure thence. My Master had had frequent news, and had received several Letters from Placidia, fill'd with plentiful marks of her affection, and the share she claim'd in his honour; but after the Battel was gain'd against Jovian, he receiv'd no more; which without doubt redoubled the grief he felt for his wound: For in the time that the afflicted Constance was as it were lost to all our hopes, we receiv'd the cruel news of the desolation of our Country; and in summ, by many messengers, and by the general report which was spread through all, we understood the entire loss of all Italy, and the particular loss of the deplorable Constance, who alone in the world was ignorant of it, by the diligence of his attendants, and my self in particular, who resolv'd to rob him of that knowledge, which would have without doubt robb'd him of that poor remainder of his life, seeing he was incapable to remedy those misfortunes. Hear, Sir, what we were advis'd of, which I shall tell you, to pursue the order of my discourse, and not to inform you of those things which are certainly already known to you.

Some time after we had quitted Italy with the fairest Troops of the Empire, and that almost all the rest were sent into Spain or Germany: Alaric, who after the defeat of Saulus, had by reason of the indisposition of his wounds remained some time to repose himself upon the Frontiers of Gallia Narbonese, was no sooner recover'd, but he understood with the death of Stilicon, and the departure of my Master, all the rest of the troubles which threatned the Empire: and knowing that all the Forces which could defend it, were dispers'd in so many different places, that Italy by their distance, the death of Stilicon, and the absence of Constance, and many other brave men, who were employed in other expeditions, was left naked and destitute, both of men to fight, and Captains to command; and was in summ, in such an estate, that he could never find a better occasion to render himself Master of that fair Country:

'Twas this intelligence given to Alaric (more than the resentment of an injury, for which he had been too well satisfied) together with the sollicitations of his Brother, who provok'd him against the Romans, hoping by the war to find those means to conquer Placidia, which he could not hope for in peace, that engag'd him to break the League he had made with Honorius; to which he wanted no pretences, by reason of the foul play offer'd by Stilicon's orders; though he well knew the Emperour was innocent, and that he receiv'd all the satisfaction he could desire: in short, spurr'd on by whatsoever motive, he had no sooner recover'd his health, and understood that Constance was far engag'd in the war with Constantine, but he departed from the place where his Army was encamped, and re-entring Italy, like a declar'd enemy march'd directly to Rome, burning and laying waste all the Country as he went, committing those hostile actions which he had not practis'd in other wars with the Romans. By misfortune, as I have told you, he found no Leaders, nor no Forces considerable in Italy to oppose him; and having cut in pieces all those that durst make head against him, without finding any obstacle to stop him, he arriv'd at the Gates of Rome.

Honorius was departed some time before to retire himself, to Ravenna; and because it was believ'd he was led thither by some love, which he would not publish, he had left the Princess Placidia at Rome, and with her Theodolinda, Cleomira, and many other illustrious personages of their Sex; but no man of command, nor any Forces to defend them; so that at the arrival of Alaric, the Romans were in such sort surpris'd, that they had hardly the assurance to shut the Gates, or put themselves into any posture of defence: In the end, necessity forcing them, they effected it in the best manner they could possibly, and this was by the exhortation of the Generous Placidia, who endeavour'd to put some order into their disorder, and to defend as long as it was possible their lives and their liberties.

Alaric discreetly judging that by reason of the multitudes of people that were in Rome, it would be difficult to render himself Master by force, or at least without loss of a great part of his Army, of whom he stood in need; and being advertis'd that there was but small store of provisions in the City, he resolv'd to starve it; believing with a great deal of appearance, that he might do it with much facility, by stopping all the passages so, that nothing more could be carried in. This was not very hard to effect; and by the orders which he took in few days, there entered nothing more into the City.

Alaric either at the entreaty of Autalpb, or by his own motion, sent several messages to the Princess Placidia, to tell her, that she, together with the Princesses Theodolinda, Cleomira, and other persons of their Sex, might have liberty to come forth; exhorting them not to stay in a City, which within few days was destined to utter destruction, promising to treat her with all the respect which was due to her birth and merit. But the Princess foreseeing that Alaric solicited her not to go forth, but to put her in the hands of his Brother, as she had sufficient cause to suspect; nor being willing to confide in these Barbarians, who had so ill kept their faith in the treaty with Honorius, returned answer to the King of the Visigoths, That if the Heavens had resolv'd the destruction of Rome, she should be ready rather to fall in its ruines, than commit her self to the faith of those persons who had so treacherously violated it with a Roman Emperour: That she hop'd for succour from Heavens, and from Honorius (who in truth ought to have given it her) ye if she were deprived of that, she could be content to dye with so many thousands of innocent persons who were envelop'd in the same calamity.

She not only return'd this Answer, but with an admirable courage; acted what should have been done by Honorius; and taking his place upon this occasion, she animated the people both by her words and example to the defence of the City; and diligently endeavour'd to provide for the necessities of the most needy, and to distribute provisions with equality, that all might be equally exempted from that Famine which threaten'd them, and unto which Alaric strove to reduce them: Nay, so much generosity and equity had she at this time, that notwithstanding the greatness of her degree, she would not exempt her self from the publick misery, retaining no other provisions for her self, than what she caus'd to be distributed to others, whom she thought to strengthen and fortifie by her example. The Princess Theodolinda, to whom they likewise offered a retreat, though she beheld her self in that condition with sufficient fear and grief, yet was so much touch'd with the virtue of Placidia, and had vow'd to her so much friendship, that she could not resolve to forsake her; and though often solicited to it by Placidia her self, she resolv'd to run the same fortune with her, maugre all the accidents which could happen: It is true, they had some hopes that the Emperour would give them some succour, they did absolutely expect it, but they were deceiv'd in their hopes; for this feeble and fearful Prince, instead of endeavouring to relieve the chief City of his Empire, shut himself up in Ravenna, which he caus'd to be well fortified and stor'd with provisions, for fear lest it should be attack'd. Posterity will hardly believe this truth of the Son of the great Theodosius, but it is certain, that during all the siege at Rome he stayed at Ravenna, either busied in those loves whereof he was accused, or in a stupid tranquillity which could have found place in no other breast but his.

Autalpb demanded several times to speak to the Princess Placidia, but she constantly refus'd to see the enemy of her Brother and Country; nor would she give this subject of suspicion to Constance, whose absence she regretted, and perhaps sometimes complained of, judging with reason that he ought to abandon all things to come to her assistance. She would not have refus'd to have spoken to the Prince Walia, whom she both esteem'd for his virtue, and the friendship that was between him and Constance; but he appeared not at all in the siege; and it was reported that he had intreated Alaric to dispense with him, boldly telling him, That he could not shew himself as an Enemy against that place where he had so lately been so nobly entertain'd both by the Emperour and all the Romans.

In fine, Victuals beginning to want, the Famine in a short time grew so great, that it produc'd the most pitiful effects in the World, and the poor people began to make use of all things for the preservation of their lives. The Horses, the Dogs, and the Catts were eaten; yet in these extremities, and worse, the persuasions of the courageous Placidia, did as it were by force withhold the people from surrendring. They came at length to extremities so deplorable, that they will hardly find belief; and the Princess, who would not be exempted, had part in these miseries, as well as the meanest of the people. 'Tis reported that the most loathsome Animals served for nourishment to men; nay, that there were some women who slew their own Infants to preserve their lives with their proper blood. At last, by the will of the angry Heavens, the Romans no longer able to support their miseries, one cruel and fatal Night, some of them which guarded the Gates, to deliver themselves from the horrible death which threatned them, treated secretly with Alaric, and opened a Gate to several Troops, who at the same time opening a passage for the rest of their Companions on all sides, the whole Army of the Enemies entred.

Scarce did the day appear, but the Visigoths were become Masters of the Town; and no sooner were they so, but the Sword, Fire, Pillage, Ravishings, and all other sorts of miseries usual at such times, endeavour'd to make a second Troy of this proud City, which had for so many Ages been the Metropolitan of the World: Blood ran in streams down the Streets, Fire devoured the Houses: The cries of the Women and Children pierced the Heavens; and in all places was to be seen nothing but horror and dreadful desolation. I am overwhelm'd with grief to recount to you the deplorable misery of my Country, in which I was the more concern'd through the misfortune of many persons dear to me, who were expos'd among the rest to utmost miseries: And pardon me, my Lord, if I am oblig'd to abridge this Recital the most I can possibly.

The Princess Placidia, and those that were with her, were first adverted of the publick misery, and their own particular, by the noise and horrible cries which resounded in their ears from all sides of the City; and in the end, by the multitudes of miserable people, who hoping to find a safety there, ran towards the Palace. Placidia rais'd her self up; and Theodolinda, Cleomira, and many others, drawing near to her much affrighted, she began with an admirable courage to exhort them to submit to the will of Heaven, since their Religion did not permit them to follow the example of Cleopatra's and Portia's, and other famous persons of Antiquity, who by a voluntary death deliver'd themselves from those miseries which they might fear in such destructions; and was about to form a resolution conformable to her great Virtue, when she spied the Prince Wallia enter into her Chamber: the view of this Prince, whose goodness she was acquainted with, gave her infinite consolation, knowing the Authority he had among the Visigoths; and advancing towards him before Theodolinda, whom his presence had likewise much assur'd: Ab Prince (said she, approaching him with a behaviour full of Constancy and Majesty) are you our Enemy? You, whom we have so much esteem'd? Wallia could scarce restrain tears at the sight of a spectacle which touch'd him to the bottom of his soul. Madam, I am not only not your Enemy (said he) but I may truly say that I have not been so to the meanest Roman at this unfortunate season, and that I was at a great distance from the siege: though I was not able to prevent it, I have at least contributed nothing to it; and had not appeared, if I had not done it out of design to do what I at present act, and if I had not believed that my service would not have been unprofitable to you at this time.

Placidia was about to answer him when she saw Autalph enter, who had follow'd Wallia with all speed possible, and was perplexed to see, that, notwithstanding his love, another had before him rendred himself to the Princess, whom he adored. Placidia received him not as she had received Wallia; but yet with a constancy and gravity agreeable to her degree and virtue; which augmenting the love and respect of Autalph, made him ashamed to see himself arm'd as he was, and in the posture of an Enemy before the Princess, whom he pretended to serve: he knew not in what fashion he ought to speak to her, when she preventing him with a becoming assurance; And well, Autalph (said she) is it in this manner that you return to see Placidia? Do you bring Fire and Sword into a City from whence you so friendly parted, and from which you never yet receiv'd the least offence? I come (replied Autalph) like a Lover rather than an Enemy, and I come to conquer by my Arms that which my love and service could not give me; and for that, rather than for any other consideration, have I perswaded the King my Brother to re-enter into Italy. These words possessed the the mind of Placidia with a mortal grief; and she was about to return him an answer, when she understood by many persons who entred the Chamber with cries and pitiful lamentations, the deplorable estate the City was in, and the horrible cruelties exercised by the Visigoths. This Discourse touched her with so much pity, that those tears which her own interest could not make distil from her eyes, now fell from them in great abundance; and turning her self towards Autalph, with a gesture which all afflicted as she was, made her yet appear more beautiful than he ever before had judged her; Al Autalph (said she) there are other ways than by blood, slaughter, and the ruine of our Countrey, by which to testifie your affection; and but little am I oblig'd by the knowledge of these cruel proofs you give me.

She was now about to turn to Prince Wallia, who was approach'd to Theodolinda, and of whom more willingly than of Autalph, she would have demanded what favour they desir'd for the miserable people; when she was advertis'd that King Alaric was come to visit her, and was ready to enter into the Chamber. She immediately address'd her self to him with a most assur'd behaviour; and instead of having recourse to supplications, preventing what he was about to say; Alaric (said she) is it possible, that you knowing the God which we adore, should with so much cruelty shed the blood of a people which have never offended you, and with Fire and Sword destroy this City, which all Ages, and all Nations have respect'd? Alaric was touched with the words of Placidia, dazzl'd with her Beauty, and charm'd with the Grandeur of her courage; and being willing to testifie the respect and consideration he had for her: Princess (said he) I am sorry that you are expos'd to the misfortune which you endure; but you must excuse me if I cannot help those afflicting objects which at this time present themselves to your view: for the Pillage of the City I promised to give to my Souldiers, and cannot now hinder them from taking it, though I had a design to do it; but for the slaughter, and other disorders, though they are difficultly prevented in confusions like this, yet I shall do all that is possible for me to stay it. And at the same time calling for some of his Attendants, he commanded them to proclaim through the whole City, that the people should retire themselves into the Temples; and that no Souldier should enter or commit any offence, upon pain of death, against such as had so taken refuge.

This Order being well observ'd, sav'd the lives of many thousands of persons; but the unfortunate City was expos'd to pillage during three dayes; and the Riches of so many Kings, and so many Nations, which by a Series of Victory had been gather'd into that City, Mistress of the World, became a prey to a Barbarous people, who hardly knew the price of it, and who unworthily tramp'd under feet the most sacred things, whilst they in their own thoughts triumph'd over the whole Earth, by insolently oppressing those who had for so many Ages been Masters of it.

However, Alaric assur'd the Princess that she should receive all good usage from him, but would not promise her liberty, telling her it was not in his power to give: for at his coming to Rome, he had destin'd the Pillage of the City to his Army, and the Princess Placidia to his Brother the Prince Autalph.

Placidia was like to die at these words; but being endow'd with Courage, Virtue and Piety towards Heaven, she call'd them all to her assistance, and resolv'd to undergo all, with an entire resignation to the will of that God which we adore. Yet she would often reply to Alaric with a Noble constancy, that she understood how to suffer, since Heaven had been pleas'd to ordain them, all the miseries of that Captivity into which she was thrown; but she hop'd that though Autalph was his Brother, yet a Generous King would not do any violence to the Daughter of the Great Theodosius.

Alaric return'd her the most civil replies, but gave her few reasons to hope otherwise; and this desolate Princess, notwithstanding all her constancy, deplor'd her misfortunes for many dayes in such a manner, as wrought compassion even in those that caused it, and which had obtain'd from them any other thing but that which she desir'd: I doubt not at all but she dedicated one part of her tears and sighs to the miserable Constance; that she lamented him at some times, and accused him at others; but as the thoughts she then had are not come to my knowledge, I can only speak by conjecture.

In the mean time she was honourably serv'd, but diligently guarded, as well as the Princess Theodolinda, of whom it was reported that Alaric was become Amorous, though he kept her with a promise to send her to the King her Father, so soon as he should depart from Italy, where he intended to make no long stay.

In sum, having continued some dayes at Rome, withdrawn by other designs, or fearing the return of Constance and his Army, having plac'd a Garrison in the City, and establish'd Attalus Governour with an absolute power, leading Placidia, Theodolinda, Cleomira, and many

many other Illustrious Captives, and particularly Virginia, who stuck to Placidia in her misfortunes more than before, nor would ever abandon her; he repass'd Italy, destroying in his way Campania and Lucania, and leaving throughout all, cruel marks of Barbarous Tyranny.

We receiv'd this heavy News in the City of the Teciosages, otherwise called Toulouse, at the time wherein Constance was in the greatest danger of his life; and we judg'd well it was not fit to inform him of a misery would have prov'd his death, and to which he could lend no remedy being then in a condition that he could scarcely speak or remove himself, by the effect of the cruel venom which had reduc'd him to that deplorable extremity. However, some dayes after, Artabure, to whom he had given the command of the Army, judging that miserable Italy had need of help, told him that he had receiv'd advice that the Goths again threatned Italy, and that it was believ'd they intended another invasion; that they were seiz'd of the Avenues, which was the reason he received not Letters from Rome, as he had done before; and Constance who found a great deal of likelihood in this discourse, though he was but in an ill estate to examine it, knowing well that the Army was no farther necessary in that Country where all things were peaceable, pray'd Artabure to lead it back into Italy, to go and understand if his Country stood in need of his succours; which Artabure did, after having been several times intreated.

He was follow'd soon after by Taxander and Castinus; nor staid there with Constance, besides those of his Family, which was noble and numerous, any more than a body of Cavalry, which had accompani'd him in all his expeditions, and had every man vow'd never to forsake or abandon him.

It was after the departure of the Army, that I received a Letter from the unfortunate Placidia, which she had writ to my Master at her departure from Rome; but I durst not deliver it to him, only kept it without opening, till such time that I might fitly render it: I contented my self to let him be seen by the Messenger of Placidia, praying him to relate to the Princess the estate wherein he had seen him, and how well he was excusable, if he had not succour'd her misfortunes, which were not yet come to his knowledge, nor could for the present come without apparent danger of his life.

The Messenger of Placidia was sufficiently griev'd at the misery of Constance; but I permitted him not to make himself known; nor did he desire it himself, when he saw to what extremity this great person was reduc'd.

Thus had my Master languish'd for nine or ten Moneths, and languish'd still with little hopes of recovery, when a certain person presented himself unto us on the behalf of the King of the Vandals, who having understood in Hispania Betica, which he had again invaded, the cruel sickness of my Master, and remembring the courtesies he had formerly receiv'd from him, sent him this person, whom he knew to be the most expert in Chirurgery in all Europe; praying him to trust him, and promising him, that if his Evil were capable of cure, he would in few dayes restore him to his health.

There were several persons about my Master, who would have dissuaded him from making use of him, telling him that Gunderic was an Enemy of the Roman Empire, and that not having a greater obstacle to his designs than such a man as Constance, by whom he had been already vanquish'd, 'twould be easie for him this way to send him out of the World; and that perhaps he had sent him Death, instead of a cure. But Constance disdain'd any such distrust; and instead of suspecting the King, whose generous spirit he had experienc'd, of such a treachery, he receiv'd with a becoming acknowledgment this proof of his remembrance; and without deliberating farther, threw himself wholly upon the experience of that man, whom he had sent.

From this generous confidence he reap'd his health and safety: for this person, who truly was the most able in the World in his Art, having begun to work his cure in another manner than all those that had gone before, in few dayes gave us great hopes, and in few others, there appear'd visible signs of the recovery of my Master.

But why do I so long amuse you in this unpleasant Discourse? Let it suffice that by the knowledge and diligence of this man, whom I believe rather sent from Heaven than Gunderic, Constance recover'd an intire health, and in less than six Weeks saw himself in a condition to mount a Horseback, the happiness had transported us with joy, if it had not been too severely moderated by the grief we must needs cause in him, at the relation of his misfortunes. I observ'd often that he was astonish'd to see sadness in my countenance, at a time wherein he guess'd I should have receiv'd satisfaction; but in the end, having with a great deal of wariness, hinder'd the whole World from telling him the cruel News, before his entire recovery; I believ'd it was now time to let him know it, since he was in a condition to apply some remedy.

I sought several means to free my self from this troublesome passage, when I was releas'd of this pain, by the arrival of an Envoy from the Emperour, who with the news of the sack of Rome, the ruine of Italy, the captivity of Placidia, which were known to us, related likewise that Alaric was dead at Consense: that Autalpb his Brother was crown'd King of the Visigoths, and after his Coronation had espous'd Placidia; so that the deplorable Constance at the recovery of his health, understood the loss of his Country, and that he had suffer'd a particular loss, of which without doubt he was more sensible than he could be of that of his miserable life, which was as it were only conserv'd to let him know that he had lost Placidia, and lost her for ever.

'Tis now, mighty Sir, that I find my self to have undertaken too great a task, and involv'd in too great a difficulty for me, to represent to you the grief of Constance at this astonishing news: you may understand it better by imagination, than I can make you do it by discourse; and you may judge, that as the loss that he had was so great; as never to be sufficiently bewail'd; so his grief was such, as no discourse can express: at first he had some difficulty to fancy there could be truth in such strange news; but turning his eyes upon our countenances, and reading in them the sad confirmation of his misery, he was too much perswaded, and felt in an instant all that can be imagin'd of most terrible affliction: 'Twas at this time that he made use of all the assistances of his great courage, to support him from falling under so great a stroak of Fortune; he had need likewise of those of Religion, which permits us not to seek an end of our evils by a voluntary death: and it is most certain, that if the fear of Heaven, which he always reverenc'd, had not withheld him, he would a thousand times have pierc'd his own bosom, rather than have outliv'd the loss of Placidia: his grief was vigorous and piercing, a grief above all that any other soul is capable of; it broke not forth in feminine cries or extravagant words, but shew'd it self in his countenance, with something more lamentable than tears or plaints could make it: at the remembrance whereof I find my soul so pierc'd with pity, that I can scarce be able to continue my recital.

After that day he spoke to none: if he utter'd any words, it was only the name of Placidia, which he would often repeat, lifting up his eyes to Heaven with a most mournful countenance: it was impossible for us to make him take any nourishment; and several dayes after we could difficultly oblige him by the same considerations which had perswaded him, to live: but it was now he began to lament, and utter those words which without doubt would have made Autalpb himself compallionate his sufferings, if he had heard them.

He knew not himself what judgment to make of his Fortune, though he could not but behold it alwayes deplorable; and if sometimes he accus'd Placidia to have too slightly espous'd Autalpb, against what she ought to her love and to her word which she had given him, he presently lamented her being constrain'd by hard and cruel Captivity, to espouse a man she lov'd not, or rather to be made a prey to a Barbarian, to whom she alwayes had an aversion: but whether the one or the other busi'd his thoughts, both in the one and the other he found himself equally miserable: But he was prepossessed with so good an opinion for Placidia, that he could not believe she could forget him to espouse Autalpb, without being truly constrain'd, and that she found her self in that condition wherein she was forc'd to accept the Marriage, to avoid an injury less supportable to her virtue.

Ab Placidia (said he sometimes) is it possible that you could forget me, after so many promises which ought to be inviolable in a Soul like yours! Ab Constance (said he presently after) is it possible that thou couldst not succour Placidia in those extremities to which she was reduc'd, and in a Captivity so little agreeable to the fortune of a Daughter of the Great Theodosius! Ab cruel ones (added he, regarding us with some marks of resentment) wherefore have you conceal'd from me my misfortunes, in a time wherein though not able to remedy them, I might at least have had recourse to a remedy had freed me from those ills to which you have cruelly reserv'd me? What can you hope from those unjust effects of your affection? Or what good do you for me, endeavouring to preserve a life, the sad condition of which you have foreseen? Alis (continu'd he soon after) is it possible that those miseries known to all the World, should be so long since conceal'd from him who had more interest in them than all the World together? Or is it possible that I my self have been depriv'd of this consolation, to understand by some marks of the remembrance of Placidia, that in her Captivity she hath not forgot me?

These words which he repeated several times, or others like them, made me believe that it was now time to deliver him the Letter of Placidia, which I had diligently kept, and approaching to him, I presented it him, telling him in what time I had receiv'd it, and relating to him all the particulars pass'd with the Messengers of the Princess. Constance received received the Letter without speaking one word; and after having twice or thrice kiss'd it with innumerable sighs, he open'd it, and read these words.

Placidia to Constance.

I Know not whether I ought to lament, or accuse you; but as my inclination leads me still to judge well of you, I will believe that our miseries are unknown to you, since you have not succour'd us. Italy is desolate, Rome is lost, Placidia is Captive; and that which ought to be more sensible to you, if you love her, she is captive of Autalph. He pretends that I am his, by right of his Conquest, and demands me for his Spouse without consulting my will; but can you consent, Constance, if you are still faithful to me, or if you are in a condition to oppose it? They lead me I know not into what Countries, and lest do I know to what condition my miserable fortune reserves me. Lament my miseries, Constance, if you cannot remedy them; and be assured, that if I be not threaten'd with any greater danger than death, I shall willingly sacrifice my life, to preserve my self wholly yours.

It would be difficult for me to represent to you the diversity of Constance his thoughts after the reading of this Letter; on the one side he found comfort, from the knowledge he had of the remembrance of Placidia, and the firmness of her affection: on the other, he found himself overwhelm'd with such grief, understanding the miserable condition of so great a Princess, that scarce all the force of his spirit was capable to support it. Just Heaven (said he, so soon as sighs gave leave to his words) you whom Placidia hath so religiously ador'd, is it possible that you have abandon'd her to the miseries of a sharp Captivity, or permitted that like a vile slave she should follow a victorious Army, whilst you take away all means to assist her, from the miserable and deplorable Constance? Or rather, was it just to throw him into an estate which deprived him of the knowledge of her misfortunes in a time when he might have remedied it; to draw him out of it, now she is no more capable to receive it, and restore him to a life much more cruel than that death from which you have recover'd him?

Soon after again reading over the Letter, and thinking on the time in which it was writ; Alas (cried he) in this time I had yet some hopes left that Placidia was a Captive, but not yet wife to Autalph; now she is, since so it hath pleased my cruel destinies; and this Barbarian King is sufficiently satisfied for those advantages I at other times had over him, by those he hath now gain'd over me. And then making reflection of what he had understood of that fatal Marriage, and considering that Placidia had not espoused Autalph till after the death of Alaric, and that he was King of the Visigoths, he found some consolation, judging that he could not dispose her till he had gain'd the Sovereign Authority, and Placidia had no farther refuge and defence to flee to: but at the same time his grief, ingenious to torment him, would persuade him that this new quality of Autalph might shake her constancy, and that being able to resist him whilst he was a Prince without a Crown, and a person much disadvantageous for her, she had permitted her self to be overcome when she had seen him rais'd to Sovereign Dignity. This thought might have afflicted him, if it could have gain'd any foundation; but by the knowledge he had of the soul of Placidia, he scarce entertain'd it one moment: and not being able to accuse the Princess, he accus'd only his own misfortune.

'Twas now that he recall'd to mind the actions of his past life; and looking with some disdain upon the glory he had acquir'd amongst men, by those memorable Victories he had gain'd over so many Kings and famous Captains, he accus'd Fortune to have so well serv'd him whilst he travell'd for the interest of the Empire, and to have so cruelly abandon'd him now that she had some Empire over his own. Vain honours (said he) vain advantages drawn from some happy Combates, you have serv'd only to my ruine; for if by your assistance, Constance had not been advanc'd to the highest degree among the Romans, he had never hop'd the possession of Placidia, nor ever become thus miserable by the loss of his hopes. You shall therefore never abuse me more, but I willingly renounce you, as I renounce all Dignities, all pleasures of my life, and all society of men.

I shall be tedious, Mighty Sir, should I relate to you all the complaints which were the products of my Master's grief; that which afflicted us most was, that time did not at all diminish it, and that it having made him relapse into his malady for some days, we wanted but little to lose what the help of Gunderic had restor'd to us.

We were still at Toulouse, retain'd by the weakness his relapse had caus'd, and the uncertainty in which he was, what course he ought to take; when we understood from Rome by a man

a man which Artabure had sent to him to enquire of his estate, That after the departure of Aleric, Attalus whom he had left Governour in Rome, not contenting himself with that quality, had caus'd himself to be call'd by his, Emperour of the Romans; and now endeavour'd to make himself be acknowledg'd for Emperour throughout Italy, seeing that Honorius remain'd at Ravenna, in so entire a tranquillity, as if he had not the least interest in the miseries of Italy. That the Romans had lamented their misfortunes, but that they were constrained to suffer by reason of their present weakness, seeing themselves disur-nish'd of all their Strength, abandoned of all humane assistance, despoil'd of all their riches, disarm'd, and the greatest part of them employed in the rebuilding of those Houses the Flames had ruin'd and consum'd. That the insolent Attalus had for some time kept them in obedience and subjection; but that at the arrival of Artabure with those Troops he led back, the face of things began to change: That Attalus had lost his courage; and having understood that Artabure march'd directly to Rome, with design to assault it, distrusting the Romans, though miserable and disarm'd; he was departed from the City, and having rallied some other Troops, and joyn'd them with those that went forth with him, he had endeavour'd to form a Body to put himself into a posture of defence; but being encountred by Ariobinde and Castinus, who led a great part of the Cavalry, he was defeated, and having left on the place the greatest part of his men, had sav'd himself with the rest that could follow him; and as it was believ'd, was departed out of Italy, leaving that which remain'd of the miserable City free from his Tyranny, and that of the Visigoths: so that there rested nothing but the return of the Emperour, to which he was earnestly press'd by the poor people, though he had so feebly abandon'd them to the mercy of their Enemies.

Scarcely had we understood this news, in which as a Roman I found some subject of consolation, when we were advertis'd by the persons of the Country where we were, in whom the virtue of Constance had begot an infinite love and respect for him, That the same Attalus whom we before spoke of, and he who having caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Emperour, had been driven out of Italy by Artabure, had quartered the night before with seven or eight hundred Horse, a small days journey from the City where we were, and intended that night to lodge at a Village which was not above six or seven hours journey distant, with design as it was reported, to retire into Spain, not daring to return to the Visigoths, having usurp'd a Dignity so much above him, and so ill sustain'd it: that the Cavalry of his train committed a thousand disorders in the places through which they pass'd, which in part had oblig'd the inhabitants of a place he had ruin'd, to give this advice.

Though Constance in renouncing all things, had likewise renounc'd all desires to signalize himself, yet he could not understand that one of the principal destroyers of his Country, and one of those who had most of all contributed to the captivity of Placidia, and he who had been so impudent as to usurp a quality due to none but the Brother of Placidia, and whom he acknowledg'd for his Lord, should dare to pass so nigh him; and that he should not resolve to fight him, and let him feel some effects of his just anger: and to this purpose, having given order to draw together six or seven hundred horse, who as I told you would never abandon him, he caus'd himself to be armed, though yet weak with the sickness he had endur'd.

But before he mounted on horseback, he caus'd that person to be call'd, which was sent him by the King of the Vandals, and to whom he was so much beholdng for his recovery; and after having given him a recompence so magnificent, that he could not perhaps hope so much in all his life from the King his Master: You shall testify to King Gunderic (said he) the acknowledgments I have for an action so full of generosity; but without assuring him, that I am too unhappy, to hope my self able to return a sufficient satisfaction: you may tell him if you please, that he hath made me the gift of an enemy, and that that life which he hath render'd me by your assistance, is much more cruel than the death from which he hath deliver'd me. He spoke these words with a sigh; and the Vandal, to whom the cause was known, lamented his misfortune without wondring at his discourse, and departed highly satisfied with the rich presents he had receiv'd.

One hour after, we mounted on horseback; Constance having design'd not to march by day, lest Attalus should be advertis'd: but having good guides which led us all the night, we arriv'd in the morning at the Village where Attalus was lodg'd, precisely at the time he was about to depart. Though the number of his men was somewhat greater than ours, Constance delayed not to assault them; but flying amongst them like a Lyon at the head of a Troop which couragiously followed him, he struck such a terrour into them; that they scarce made any resistance. Having met with Attalus amongst his Troops, he dealt him so furious a blow on his head, that what with the blow and the shock of his horse he bore him with his to the ground; and as we fought against the destroyers of our Country, with more heat and fury than in all the former Battels, we soon cut in pieces almost all those which accompany'd him, without losing more than fifteen or twenty of our men.

My Master having defended Attalus from being slain, and seeing him before him much affrighted, after he had with much Sweetness laid before his eyes the cruelties which he and his had exercis'd, and the crime he had committed in usurping a quality so much above his sphere, or theirs who had establish'd him in that which he had despis'd; he told him that his intention was to send him to the Emperour Honorius, to whom he for many reasons ought this satisfaction: but that he need not at all fear his life, which he did not only promise him he would demand of the Emperour, but assur'd him he should obtain it. Attalus, who had not conceiv'd so large hopes, and whose courage was much dismay'd, return'd him thanks for this effect of his goodness, and resolv'd himself to support his ill fortune, not doubting but Constance had sufficient power to obtain his life of Honorius, who naturally was not at all inclin'd to cruelty.

My Master had little conversation with him, being unwilling to insult over his misery, finding himself not in an estate to tell him any thing that might be acceptable; but seeing a Visigoth near him whom he straight knew, having before observ'd him in the service of Prince Wallia, he design'd particularly to entertain him; and having demanded of him news of the Prince he serv'd, as of a man whom he infinitely esteem'd, he entreated him the most pressingly he could, to tell him sincerely, what he knew of the marriage of Autalpb and Placidia, and what he had heard spoken of the resolutions of that Princess to espouse him, and how she carried her self at her marriage. The Visigoth hearing himself honoured with the Prayer my Master made him, after he had told him that what he demanded of him was not known to him, but by the report at Rome, from whence he had not stir'd since the departure of Alaric, he could therefore give him no other account, but what he had from the same report, which in summ was,

“ That as well at Rome as in other places, whither her adverse fortune led her a Follow“ er of the Conquerour, Placidia had with a marvellous courage resisted the pursuits of “ Autalpb; letting him still know that the change of her condition could not alter her in“ clinations: That this Prince knowing that all he try'd by love was vain and unprofitable, “ resolv'd several times to make use of the privilege of War, and force her to espouse him;
 “ but in such extremities he had recourse to Alaric, who though he desir'd the repose
 “ and satisfaction of his Brother, yet could not resolve to do this violence to a Princess, “ both whose Birth and Virtue he respect'd: That by this consideration, and as some said,
 “ by the prayers of the Princess Theodolinda, of whom Alaric was enamoured, she defend“ ed her self against Autalpb until the death of Alaric, whom a violent malady which seiz'd “ him at Consense, took in few days out of the world: That Autalpb being crown'd King “ of the Goths after the death of his Brother, had not only persevered in his love to Pla“ cidia, but gave her to understand, that if she did not in few days consent, he would “ make use of his authority to possess her: That the Princess still resisted him as much as it “ was possible, endeavouring to dissuade his design by all those considerations she believ'd “ capable to withhold him; but in the end, finding them all unprofitable, and that she was “ threatned and in danger to satisfy the passion of the Conquerour in another condition “ than that of his Spouse, the fear of so horrible a mischief made her suffer the other more “ patiently: That she was married and crowned Queen of the Visigoths, at Consense; and “ twas reported that though she espous'd the King Autalpb, with an inexpressible re-“ pugnancy, yet after their marriage she liv'd admirably well with him: That some time “ after they departed from Consense, and went into the Province of the Lactans, which “ is a Province of Spain bordering upon the Mediterranean Sea, which in a short time the “ Goths reduc'd to their obedience, and from whence they intended to pass among the “ Gauls to possess their Lands which they pretended to appertain to them, and which were “ assign'd to them by the Emperours Theodosius and Honorius: That it was in Barcelona, “ the capital City of that Country, that Autalpb at present kept his Court and reign'd “ peaceably.

This discourse of the Visigoth gave some satisfaction to the spirit of Constance, though it increas'd his grief: and upon the knowledge he had of the place where Placidia was, he form'd a resolution, which some days after he put in execution; he determin'd once more to see Placidia, whatever dangers might arrive in the execution of such a design: but because he could not march with his equipage, without being taken notice of, nor go with

with any train in those places, where his Countenance was so well known both to the King and to most of those persons who were near him; he therefore not only sent into Italy the Cavalry which came to fight against Attalus, but he would that all his House and Family should take the same course, keeping none with him but my self, and two men to serve him.

Leontius, who commanded the Horse, was much troubled to part with him; nor were the Officers of his Household less afflicted to abandon him; but both the one and the other were constrained to obey, which they did somewhat the more willingly, because he promis'd them he would in a short time be at Rome, whither he commanded them to go and attend him. He gave to Leontius the conduct of Attalus, charging him to present him to the Emperour, to whom he writ a Letter in these or the like words.

Constance to the Emperour Honorius.

I Have acquitted my self, Sir, of the promise I made you to overcome your Enemies; but you have not preserved for me the Princess Placidia, according to yours. Though my services had not been considerable, a Sister like Placidia was without doubt worthy of your assistance; and I cannot comprehend for what reason you should abandon her to the Barbarians: But it is not for us to judge the actions of our Sovereign; and you are it may be so sufficiently touch'd with the losses you have had, that our complaints need not renew them to your memory. For my self, having lost Placidia, I have nothing more to preserve, and nothing but death can be as dear to me as my life is odious: I go then to flee from the one, and seek the other, by those means Heaven shall be pleas'd to allot me. And for the last effect of my fidelity, I send you Attalus, whom the justice of Heaven deliver'd into our hands, that he might be committed into yours. You may punish his unjust Ambition by letting him know the difference between his present condition and the dignity he would have usurp'd; but spare him if you please, a life which I request of you, and which I have presum'd to promise him, upon the knowledge I have of your Clemency.

This was the Letter which he writ to Honorius, for whom, notwithstanding he was not so well contented with him for the loss of Placidia, he preserved a respect accompanied with a tender affection.

Leontius parted with the Cavalry he commanded, and all the Household of Constance, and we understood afterwards that being arrived at Ravenna, he presented Attalus to the Emperour, who led him in triumph to Rome, where he enter'd few days after; and that he confin'd him to the Island of Lipari, not inflicting on him any other punishment, upon the recommendation of Constance.

We parted at the same time from that City, where we had made so unfortunate a stay, as well for the cruel distemper of my Master, as for the deplorable news we receiv'd; and with that little equipage I told you, we went to seek the Country inhabited by that terrible Nation which had laid ours desolate. To accomplish this design, we had no very great journey; for we had only to cross a part of Gallia Narbonnese to arrive at the foot of the Pyrenean Mountains, where the Province of the Lacetans is situated.

I shall not be so tedious as to recite the particulars of our Voyage, in which there was nothing of divertisement or agreeable to you: for running only where the passion of Constance called us, we made no stay at any place we pass'd through, which might give us leisure to make any particular observation: besides, my Master's grief to which he had so entirely abandon'd himself, busied us in that nature, that it left no place for other thoughts. His eyes seem'd fix'd on all sorts of objects, and his spirit incapable of the remembrance of any thing, but his sad and cruel loss. Hardly at my pressing entreaties would he take any nourishment, or any moments repose; nor could he think that what he went to seek was in another's Arms, and bound with such chains, as nothing but death could loose, without being surpriz'd with an affection neither to be equaliz'd nor describ'd. He often express'd more by his silence, than by his tears and lamentations: and as my Master hath truly a noble patience, and a resolution not common, he restrain'd his grief as much as he could possible; not permitting it to break forth, but by those marks which he could not conceal nor dissemble.

In this sad condition we travers'd the Country of the Niëibriges, pass'd nigh unto Narbonna a famous City, which gives a name to a part of the Gauls, and in the end, entred into Spain: in approaching it, Constance inform'd himself every day with the particulars of his misfortunes: and when we were a good way entred into the Country which was subje^t to Autalph, we understood that the Barbarian King was much more fortunate in his Marriage than he could have hop'd, considering the unjust ways by which he accomplish'd it; and that his virtuous Spouse making her inclinations yield to considerations of Duty, had conform'd them in such sort, that according to the common opinion, the Gothick King was no less in possession of her soul than of her body, and tasted those sweetnesses which seldom encounter in inclinations once so different.

This knowledge of the happiness of Autalph, and of a happiness so unjustly got, cast the afflicted Constance into extremities of grief; in which all his virtue was necessary, though by that virtue he found this consolation, that Placidia was not unhappy, which she had been without doubt, if by her admirable wisdom she had not overcome those repugnancies which dayly oppos'd themselves to her repose and felicity.

Ab Valerius (said he to me in these thoughts) Is it then true that Placidia loves so truly the Barbarian King, whom force and violence made her husband? how would she have loved a Spouse whom she had receiv'd from her Parents, and from her own inclinations? but by the bonds of that duty which hath something in it more cruel than the Goths themselves, she hath forgot him whom her Parents, and her very inclinations destin'd her. Alas (added he) it is too true, but however, what misery I find for my self in this cruel knowledge; I cannot, though it render me eternally miserable, desire that Placidia should hate Autalph; and I ought to desire that she would eternally forget me, if my remembrance would bring any trouble to her repose.

He made me often such discourses as these; and in this sad conversation we approached Barcelona, a fair City near the Sea, where the Gothick King at present kept his Court; we knew before our arrival that Prince Wallia was not there; that he had been a long time departed, and scarce any news heard of him since the death of Alaric: though my Master esteem'd and lov'd this brave Prince most particularly, and that though at another time he would gladly have encountred him, in this he was not at all troubled at his absence, having resolv'd if he had been there, to conceal himself from him as from the best of men, not finding it convenient to discover himself to him at a season in which he could not be favourable to him, without being the contrary to the King his near Kinsman.

Constance his resolution not to be seen by any person that might know him, and having reason to fear many persons whom he had seen at Rome, made us attend the night to enter the City, and then we went to seek a lodging in one of the least frequented streets, and most distant from the Palace. So soon as we were arriv'd and retir'd into our Chamber, my Master began to invent with me some means to see the Queen, and use the best caution, much less for the danger which might threaten him, than for the consideration he had for the repose and interest of that great Princess, which he might disquiet by an imprudent conduct.

The better to inform our selves in this occasion, he propos'd to regulate his designs by the passages of affairs at Court; and having caus'd our Host to be call'd, we understood from him that we were arriv'd in a fortunate time. That Virginia, she whom the Queen of all the persons that attend her esteem'd most dear, and the good and faithful friend of Constance, had the same day espous'd Hilderic the Favourite of the King, and the chief personage amongst the Goths, next the two Princes Sigeric and Wallia: that all the Palace was to spend this night in pompous solemnities: that on the morrow, in honour of such a Marriage, in the great plain of the City, courses were to be run, like to those my Master ran at Rome in the Hippodrome against Autalph and the unfortunate Euchere, which the Visigoths had first introduc'd into Europe, which the Gauls call Tourneys, the English Tilt-ing: That Knights of all Nations would be receiv'd, and that the Queen her self gave the reward to the Conquerour.

This news touch'd the spirit of Constance with several different motions; and if upon one side he could not understand without some resentment, that Placidia took her share in joy and divertisement whilst he was overwhelm'd with a mortal sadness; on the other, he rejoyc'd within himself for the happiness of Virginia, whom he always dearly lov'd, and whom he esteem'd more than ever, for the fidelity she had testified to the Princess: and besides, though he refus'd the dancing and other divertisements of that night, in which he well believ'd he could not see the Queen without running an apparent hazard to be known, yet he hop'd in the spectacles of the following day, when it would be permitted to all to go arm'd in the City, and to present themselves in that estate in the place without being oblig'd to discover his Countenance, he might be there as well as others, and enjoy with liberty the so much desir'd sight of the Princess, who would shew her self publicly publickly upon the Scaffolds for that purpose erected with infinite Magnificence, and then he would attend till Fortune and his own diligence gave him the means to see her more particularly.

At this present, though loaden with such an abyss of sadness, he found sparkling in his soul some desire once more to signalize himself before the Princess Placidia, by some action that might please her, and abate the pride of that odious Nation which had depriv'd him of all his happiness. So soon as he entertained this thought, he resolv'd to put it in execution, having but little time to prepare himself for this action, in which he resolv'd to appear without any Magnificence, and only adorn'd with the marks of that grief which rul'd his mind; he would therefore have no other Arms than the same black ones he wore in his Voyage, giving only order that Night to add something to his Shield; but because his Horses were wear'd with the length of his Journey, he commanded me with the assistance of our Host to seek him one to serve him in this occasion: and Fortune would, that for the great price he charg'd me to offer, I found one of the fairest and best that were to be found in all these Provinces; and which as he desir'd, was of a colour correspondent to that of his Arms and whole Equipage. After this, having given some other orders for such things as were most necessary in such an occasion, he intended to dedicate the rest of the Night to repose: but it was more difficult to him than all the preceding Nights; for the impatience he had to see the Princess, whom he knew himself so near to, did scarce permit him a moment of sleep.

I will not entertain you with the thoughts which tossed and perplexed his mind during this long Night, though they might well deserve a place in our discourse, if they would not render it of too excessive a length; I will only tell you that the next morning, as soon as he understood that all things were ready in the great place, and that the King and Queen having din'd, that they might have the longer time for divertisement, had with the whole Court taken their places on the Scaffold, he put on his Arms, mounted upon the fair Horse I bought him; and charging his left hand with his Shield, and his right with a strong Lance, he march'd with his Visier down towards the place where the Courses were already begun, not being follow'd by any but one Esquire, whom he had taken in to his service in the Gallick War, and whose favour could not be known by the Visigoths.

He resolv'd to give them time to signalize themselves by the first Courses, before he would present himself in the Lists; and as he had a design to fatigue his eyes with the view of the belov'd Object of his heart, he took his stand in a place where over the heads of the people he might see the Queen seated on a high Scaffold to be easily observ'd by all that were in the place. This sight had almost made all his strength forsake him: he trembl'd with the violent motion which his passions gave to his whole person, to see that Princess so much belov'd, seated by the side of her unjust Possessor, and his cruel Rival, in that happy estate to which he had so much reason to aspire.

Placidia seem'd to the eyes of Constance accompani'd with all those charms which ordinarily attended her; her admirable Beauty still preserv'd in the hardships and changes of Fortune, produc'd its accusom'd effects in the spirit of a Lover so faithful, and so passionate. However, after the first violence was over, and that Constance had moderated his fury, he then beheld her with far less disturbance than before. It seem'd to him, whether so in truth, or by the inclination we naturally have to flatter our selves, that there were some marks of sadness upon the Countenance of the fair Queen, and that her eyes possessed not all their gayety and ordinary splendour; she appear'd more pale and wan than at other times; and indeed, to assist at so pompous and solemn a rejoicing, all the ornaments of her person seem'd extremely negligent.

Virginia sat next her, adorn'd with all that magnificence that beftted the solemnity of her Marriage; but she appeared in all her actions to accompany those of the Queen, who holding down her head in a kind of languishing manner, seem'd to entertain with her the objects presented to their view. Alas, what were the thoughts of poor Constance, beholding, or rather devouring with his eyes a treasure which had so cruelly been taken from him! What discourses did his present sad estate cause him to make of his past Fortune, and all the actions of his life! You may comprehend it well, Sir, by the experience you have of so great a passion, without which it will be impossible to represent it.

He had so fix'd his thoughts upon these sad considerations, and the sight of those belov'd eyes, that he seem'd to have entirely lost all remembrance of the Courses, and design he had to signalize himself. In the end he recollected himself, and seeing that they were already well advanc'd and that the people celebrated with cries of admiration the force of some Visigoth Cavaliers, who had already thrown to ground all that had presented themselves elves on the place; judging it now time to shew himself, making the people give way, and advancing within the Barriers, he put himself in Rank with those who were prepar'd for fight. Those who saw him pass simply arm'd, and without any Train, were far from imagining that he was the great Constance, whose reputation was so gloriously spread through the World, the vanquisher of so many Kings, so many Nations, and the valiant Upholder of the Empire. However, though without any Train or Magnificence, he appeared in the Ranges with a grace, that made him be noted among all the Adventurers, as somewhat more than ordinary. His Arms were wholly black, as well as his Helmet, as was the Plume which cover'd his Helmet, his Lance, his Horse, and all his Furniture being of the same colour; but upon his Shield was to be seen represented a Cupid laid upon a Bed of dead and dry Ashes, such as they figure to blazon lost Hope, with these words which seem'd to come out of his mouth, I AM ALIVE, THOUGH HOPE BE DEAD. And at the lower part of the Shield were written these Verses:

*After all Hope is flown above,
Still with a Faith and Truth to Love.
Alas! that this to none can be,
Afflicted Constance, but to thee.*

He had caused these words to be written in the Gallick Tongue, in which the name of Constance which he bore, and the virtue of constancy have the same termination; so that he had reason to believe, that it would be of that virtue, rather than of him, that these words would be understood: they were read by those who were the nearest to him; and as well by their sense, as the blackness of his Arms, they judg'd the sadness of his soul; and from the little hope which he preserved, began to call him in the place, the Sad Knight, or the Knight of lost Hope.

He still beheld some Courses in the place where he had took his stand, till at length espying a Visigoth, proud, and full of Glory, for the great number he had overcome, he was resolv'd to abate his pride: without delay he presented himself in the Lists; his noble posture in the Saddle, and the grace wherewith he carried his Lance, and manag'd his Horse, oblig'd the King, the Queen, and all the Company to behold him with a strict observation; but their admiration was increased, when they saw him part like Lightning, and encounter his Adversary at the middle of the Course with so much fury, that he overturn'd both Man and Horse to the Ground, without so much as being shaken in his Saddle. All the multitude echo'd forth their Acclamations at the fall of the Visigoth, and at the Beauty of the Course; but their cries were augmented when they beheld the Fortune of the second to be like his Predecessors, and that afterwards with the same facility he threw down all those that presented themselves. In short, Mighty Sir, for it is not necessary to recount to you the little important particularities of every Course, he bore to Ground all the Cavaliers of the place, without so much as losing a Stirrup, or that any one oblig'd him to a second Course.

The King and whole Assembly could not dissemble their amazement; and the Queen herself, who till then seem'd little touch'd with curiosity at any thing which passed, could not refrain from testifying an infinite desire to know this Stranger, nor from beholding with some concernment the marks he gave by his Equipage of the sadness of his mind. In the end, Constance scarce finding any more to dispute the Glory of this Day, began to repent himself of having done so much; not doubting but that if he were forc'd to receive the Reward from the hands of the Queen, who intended to present it, he should be oblig'd to discover his Face, which he would not do in that company to purchase an Empire, since he could not do it without putting in danger the repose of Placidia, a thousand times dearer to him than his life, which he must likewise have apparently hazarded.

He fought with infinite perplexity the means to draw him out of this trouble, not being able without excessive grief to abandon a reward which could not but be dear to him from the hands of Placidia: yet hearing with displeasure the Acclamations of the people, who declar'd him victorious; when he saw the Barriers clear'd to a Knight proudly armed, and whom he understood by those stood near him to be Hilderic the Favourite of Autalph, and the Husband of Virginia, who (having till then been dispensed with in the Courses, because of the interest he had in that solemnity, which was this day celebrated for his sake, could not observe in the Countenance of the King the displeasure he testified for the fall of all his Knights, without putting himself upon an endeavour to repair the disgrace they had suffer'd, though he hop'd little in himself the success of such an enterprize; preparing rather to keep company with the others, if he could not revenge them) was retir'd from near the King, and had arm'd and mounted himself with all speed possible.

My Master no sooner understood that it was he, but finding in this rencounter a fair occasion to retire, he embrac'd it without further deliberations; and advancing towards Hilderic in the posture of a man that would rather speak to him than fight him, he encountred him just at the entrance into the Lists; and reaching his mouth to his ear; I will not (said he, in the Gotbick Language, which he spake perfectly well) dispute with Hilderic the glory of this Day, to whom it is entirely due, with the possession of Virginia; and I would testifie to Virginia, by the consideration I have for her Husband, the true respect I continually bear her.

His Helmet so much conceal'd the tone of his voice, that though Hilderic had been familiar with him, he could not have known him: and he had no sooner spoke these words, but spurring from him without attending an Answer, and forcing with his Horse a way through the Multitudes, he got out of the place without any farther stay.

The King and Queen, who with all the company taking notice of his departure, wonder'd no less at it, than at the fair Courses he had made; not being able to imagine for what reason he should disdain a reward, which could not but be considerable to all men, coming from the hands of so fair a Queen: and Hilderic more astonish'd than they at the words of this valiant Unknown Person, being approach'd the Scaffold, and having recounted the discourse my Master had made him, their surprize infinitely augmented, not being able to fancy whom this Friend of Hilderic's or of Virginia's should be, that was so willing to yield so great a Glory, and whose strength was as extraordinary as his behaviour.

But Placidia being alwayes just, and especially to those who testifi'd an affection to her faithful Virginia, on a sudden took a resolution worthy of her self. It is not justice (said she to Hilderic) that the respect that this Unknown Knight hath for you, should make him lose the reward he is willing to yield you; and since you are this day sufficiently happy in the possession of Virginia, without pretending to other advantages, answer the noble behaviour of this brave Unknown, in letting him receive what he hath so generously abandon'd. At these words she took from her Arm a rich Bracelet, and presented it to Hilderic; who receiving it without returning other Answer than a profound reverence, parted from the place, and flew after Constance with all possible speed.

The croud and throng of the people had so hindred my Master in his design of departure, that before he could reach the end of a Street that butted against the Lists, Hilderic overtook him; and knowing him by his Arms, and particularly by his Shield, he address'd himself to him, with an excellent Grace: The Queen is too just (said he) and Hilderic too acknowledging of your civility, to rob you of a reward, which you have so gloriously acquir'd, and which comes from a hand too Illustrious to be disdain'd: Receive then from my hand what the Queen hath sent you; and if you will not that I know to whom I am so much obliged, give me at least the means to let him know the esteem I have for his merit, and the obligation I have for the glory he would procure me.

Constance deliberated some time what resolution he should take; but in the end, not being able to resist the desire he had yet to receive this precious favour from Placidia, and judging he could not refuse it without offence, he accepted the Bracelet, which Hilderic presented him; and answering his Discourse without discovering his Visage; I had an intention (said he) to leave you that reward, which you have perhaps merited better than I; nor would I now receive it, came it not from the hand and by the orders of the Queen: But since you are pleas'd I shall hold it from her and you, you shall receive if you please this small gage of the affection I owe to the Husband of Virginia, and you shall permit me to demand yours, when I can make my self known to you better than now I can.

Finishing these words, he pulled a Ring from his finger, and having put it upon that of Hilderic at the same time that he receiv'd the Bracelet from his hand, he quitted him without attending an Answer; spurring from him with an infinite speed, when he was encountred by three or four men on Horseback, who told him that they had order from the King to oblige him to make himself known to them, or to bring him before his Majesty; I can do neither the one nor the other (replied Constance very fiercely) nor had I come, but knowing that at such times as these, both access and retreat are free to all the World. We have however an Order from the King (replied he who had first spoke to him) which we must execute; and you will difficultly defend your self from either seeing him, or making your self known to us.

At this discourse Constance was enraged with a choler, he could not dissemble; and beholding them with a look full of fury; You may tell your King (said he) that I am not his Subject, and that he ought perhaps bethink himself more than once before he violater in my person the right of Nations and publick Liberty: And seeing at the same time that one of them opposed his passage, and was about to lay hold of the Bridle of his Horse, he assaulted him with so much violence, that tumbling him out of his Saddle, he made him extend his length upon the Pavement, and flew from the rest with so much swiftness, that they immediately lost the sight of him. 'Tis true, that Hilderic at the bruit was approach'd to him, and being willing to favour his retreat, hindred them from pursuing him, by telling them that whatever desire the King had to know him, he was certain he would not approve of this violence. And he having a great Authority in the Court, they obeyed him without replying: but because in the shock with which my Master had thrown the Goths to Ground, the Buckle which held his Shield broke, it fell down; and some body having taken it up, presented it to Hilderic: he beholding it sometime, very circumspectly read those words upon it; but fearing he should not be able to discover the Master, he sent it away, with a design to shew it to Virginia.

After this he return'd towards the place, but in his way looking upon the Ring which the valiant Unknown had put upon his finger, and on which he had not yet had time to cast his eyes, it was no mean astonishment that surpriz'd him, when he beheld it to be a Diamond of such an extraordinary greatness and value, that it could not part but from the hand of some great Prince, and one highly liberal. He was vex'd he had receiv'd it, but could not now help it: and when he was come in to the presence of the King and Queen, who were departed from the place, to return towards the Palace; he equally surpriz'd them, with the relation of what he had seen Constance do, and the richness of the Present he had receiv'd from him.

Antalph vow'd that his men had gone beyond the limits which he had prescrib'd in the order he gave them; and by the diligence Hilderic took to appeale him, he shew'd very little anger for the refusal of the Stranger to obey him, and design'd not any farther search; yet both himself and the whole Court judg'd by the Grandeur and nobleness of his behaviour, and by the richness of his present to Hilderic, that this Unknown must be a person of a considerable degree; and many there were who suspected him to be Prince Balamir, Son to the King of the Huns, a Prince of great valour and reputation, and who had before been seen in several places, and upon the like occasions, in the equipage of a person that would not be known.

This Adventure in which the whole World found something highly extraordinary and unusually excellent, afforded them a subject to entertain themselves the rest of the day. But when Hilderic had opportunity to speak more particularly to Virginia, and had caused her to hearken with attention to the words which the sad Knight had told him, and those which were writ upon his Buckler, which he brought to shew her; he put great suspicions into her mind, or at least gave her sufficient employment to torment her self withal, in seeking that truth which she could not know; and yet in which she conceiv'd a great interest.

All the Court supp'd that Night with Hilderic, whither the new Marri'd was conducted with an extravagant Magnificence; but after Supper the Queen retir'd into the Closet of Virginia with her alone, where being private, she demanded of her, who this Unknown might be, that had testified such an affection and consideration for her, and who by what one might judge, both by the greatness of his Actions, and value of the Present he had given to Hilderic, could not but be a man of great importance. Virginia took some time to consider, before she gave answer to this discourse; and the Queen having again solicited her:

I know not, Madam, (said she) if I may tell you all I think of this Adventure; but I believe that you will enter as well as I into deep suspicions upon so great appearance. At these words she caused the Shield to be brought from the place where Hilderic had laid it, and after having shew'd the Queen the painting upon it, and read several times the words which were written; when she saw the Queen enter as well as she into deep thoughts, and betray several tokens of a great astonishment:

And well, Madam (said she) upon which of my Friends do you believe that my suspicions may fall with appearance of Justice? Or which of them would be in so sad an estate as this Unknown appeared to day, abandoned of all hopes, and yet loving faithfully after the loss of his hopes, able with so much facility to vanquish all the Goths, make so rich a Present to Hilderic, and preserve yet some affection for Virginia, and in sum, write those words which you see upon that Shield, if it be not the great and unfortunate Constance? That equivocation on the virtue which bears his name, might well deceive the Visigoths, as was without doubt his intention; but it could not have the same effect on a Roman spirit, and a Roman interess'd like my self self in the Fortune of the great Constance; and I believe I may say after him, of him that has done all these things.

*Alas! that this to none can be,
Afflicted Constance, but to thee.*

Whilst Virginia was uttering these words, the Queen seem'd overwhelmed with a deep meditation, or rather cast into a mortal perplexity; and her behaviour already discover'd to Virginia the cruel disturbances which began to torment her: she remain'd some time in this estate, holding her eyes fix'd on the ground; but afterwards softly lifting them up upon the countenance of Virginia;

I am loath to believe (said she) that I am so much abandon'd by Heaven and by Fortune, to lead hither Constance in a time when he cannot come but to trouble my repose, such as it hath pleas'd Heaven to give me; and besides, that it is uncertain whether he be living, or escap'd from that cruel distemper, which my Messenger found him in: he hath without doubt too much prudence, and considers too much my repose and my reputation, to come and expose both the one and the other to danger, as his presence of force must; and therefore, Virginia, I will not believe my self so unfortunate as you would persuade me; and so much do I fear that evil you pronounce, that I should rather chuse with all the Visigoths to be deceiv'd, than to understand it with certainty, so long as I may have some reason to doubt.

Ab Madam (replyed Virginia) can this be a misfortune so strange as you figure it, when you shall yet once more see the poor Constance? It will be so great for me (replyed the Queen) that scarce all I have yet prov'd can be comparable to it; for in sum, my dear Virginia, though the name of Constance be yet dear to my memory, and that I do tenderly preserve the remembrance of a man I lov'd, for so long as it was permitted me, I maintain'd my affection; but since Heaven hath bound me to a Duty, whose Rules are so strong and so nice, that the least thought of my first love is not supportable, nor can I preserve it without rendring me worthy of those evils I suffer, and all those which Fortune yet can prepare for me. For this reason, Virginia, and for the fear I have of the life of Constance, which without doubt will be in danger, if he should be known in this Country, 'twill be convenient to prevent those mischiefs that may arrive, if your suspicions be true; by obliging Constance, if it be truly be, to retire without seeing me, and not hazard for a good of so little importance, things of so great consequence, as the honour of Placidia, and the safety of Constance.

They had enlarg'd this discourse, if they had not heard some noise at the door of the Closet; and the Queen not being willing to be surpris'd in this discourse, rose from the place where she was seated, and advanc'd towards the door, just as it was open'd; she hence went to find the King and all the company in the chamber where they had left them: but there arose such a distraction in her mind, as permitted her to take little pleasure in that nights divertisements.

The end of the Third Book.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

IN the mean time the desolate Constance had posted his horse with so much swiftness, that having in a little time travers'd many streets, and by the Gate most distant from the Palace pass'd out of the City, on that side where the flowing of the Sea seems to wash the feet of its lofty Walls: He pursued for some time his course along that fair strand; but stop'd when he saw himself far enough distant, and in some security from them who had a design to pursue him; and marching a gentle pace, gave liberty to his Esquire to overtake him, who with much trouble had follow'd him: his mind was so replete with the Idea of what he had seen, that he was not able to discern any other object: Placidia seem'd still before his eyes, and in such a manner employ'd all his senses, that he could hardly preserve a knowledge for any other thing.

Alas, Sir, what were the thoughts with which his spirit was turmoyl'd? what description can I make, that can in any manner represent to you the doleful estate of his mind? He came from seeing Placidia, that same Placidia whose sight he had so much desir'd; but he had seen her by the side of a happy spouse, who triumph'd through his Fortune, and by a treacherous war, over that his love and services had so well merited; nor could he think of these advantages, which his fortunate Rival had gain'd over him, without feeling the assaults of a violent despair?

Ab Placidia (cried he, when he found himself most vigorously assaulted by these sorrowful thoughts) Ab Placidia, I have seen you by Autalph's side; and that which is yet more cruel to my imagination, you are all day in the Arms of Autalph, Autalph, that same Barbarian, before whom you so solemnly promis'd me the prebeminence in your affection. 'Tis true (added he a little after) that I have seen you by Autalph's side, but if my eyes have not deceiv'd me, I observ'd some marks of sadness in your eyes, and that on a day wholly dedicated to joy; and your condition it may be is unfortunate, and leaves me a larger subject to bewail than accuse you: Let us no longer then accuse our great and perhaps our miserable Princess, but let us lament until death the ill fortune of Placidia, and if it be possible, that of deplorable Constance.

In speaking these words, he cast his eyes on the Bracelet which Placidia had sent him; and though he was not ignorant that this precious favour was given to an unknown Varruisher at a Tilting, and not to the amorous Constance, yet he could not behold it, but as a gift of his adorable Princess, nor oppose that joy he resent'd, but bringing his lips down to it almost as soon as his eyes; Dear Present of my Divine Placidia, (said he, kissing it with an extasie of tender affection) though thou wer't not destin'd to the despairing Constance, yet Fortune hath with some justice return'd thee into his hands, rather than into others, and hath permitted him to receive thee rather as Heavens gift than hers: But since thou art without doubt the last which I shall receive from my Princess, I am oblig'd to look upon thee with all the tenderness of my soul, and to testify by all the marks I can give thee, the consolation which thou bringest to a mind so justly afflicted.

Speaking in this manner, he pursued his way with his mind so intent on his misfortunes, and so fill'd with distraction for all other things, that he took no regard of a Knight follow'd by two Esquires, who accosted him, and having civilly saluted him, prayed him to tell him what news in the Court of Autalph, and what had that day pass'd at Barcelona. He repeated this request several times; but Constance his mind was so swallow'd up in an abyss of perplexing thoughts, that he answer'd him not one word, nor so much as took notice that he spoke to him. This Unknown, although very wise, was incens'd at the incivility of Constance; and as he judg'd with reason, that the Knights of Autalph's Court ought to pay him some respect: If I had not in my spirit (said he; beholding him with a stern Countenance) thoughts more important than that of forcing thee to thy Duty, I should perhaps soon teach thee both to hear me, and answer me. These words pronounc'd with a loud voice, awakened Constance from his melancholy thoughts, and oblig'd him to look upon him who spoke them; and seeing him stand before him in a threatening posture, his grief having depriv'd him of his ordinary moderation, besides that he judg'd every man his enemy whilst he was amongst those men who had robb'd him of all his happincks; his Sword was in his hand, sooner than words in his mouth, to return him an answer; and approaching him with an aspect as terrible as his; And who art thou (said he) thou, who darest so audaciously to threaten me, without having the least knowledge of me?

He neither attended, nor received an answer, but choler being kindled in the breasts of these two Knights, they assaulted each other with an equal anger, and began, upon a quarrel of so small importance, a Combate as furious as if they had been exasperated one against the other, by love, ambition, or all other most violent passions. My Master having lost his Shield in the streets of Barcelona, and his enemy scorning to fight with advantage, refusing to take his own from his Esquire, their blows fell upon their Armour with more effect; and in truth, their Combate must of necessity be more cruel than if they had any thing wherewith to cover them against a tempest equally formidable, though not fear'd by either of them. By the proofs they had made of their forces in many occasions; they soon mutually knew that of their Enemy, and their esteem augmented, as well as their anger.

The Combate was maintained with an equal advantage: and it had been difficult to judge for whom the Victory would declare it self, when my Master having receiv'd a blow on the shoulder, which gave him a sleight wound, he return'd another at the same time upon the Helmet of his Enemy, and his Sword lighting upon those golden nails which fastned his Viser, broke them, and the Viser tumbling down, discover'd to my Master the face of his Enemy, and in that the Countenance of the valiant Prince Wallia his friend, whom he believed far distant from these Countries, and who by his last actions had made his reputation fly through the world. My Master was struck with no small astonishment at this encounter, and at the same time struggled with different thoughts what resolution he had to take, either to hide or discover himself to this Prince; but before he could determine his resolution, he saw the Gotbick Prince coming towards him in a posture that hindred his farther considerations; and not judging it convenient to make himself known to him, he found it less just to pursue a fight against a person to whom he had vow'd a true friendship: he therefore resolv'd by flight to save himself both from the one and the other; and turning the bridle of his Horse, with the greatest swiftness he could, he endeavour'd to get as far as he could both from Wallia and Barcelona.

The Gotbick Prince, who could not suspect his flight to be any defect of courage, was amaz'd at his behaviour, and had been more amaz'd, if a belief had not possess'd him that it might be some Visigoth, who quitted the place out of respect to a Prince of the Blood-royal. But as his valour had begot in him a great estimation, for that he had not known the like among the Goths, he determin'd to satisfy himself farther; and being mounted on a Horse far better, and less weary than my Master, he follow'd him at full speed, and at length overtook him, whatever diligence my Master us'd to prevent it. Constance was discontented to find himself overtaken, but confirm'd himself in his resolution not to make himself known, when Wallia accosting him; I come not (said he) again to fight against you: I am already satisfied with the proof I have made of your valour, but since I know well that it is not fear that made you fly the Combate, if you be a Visigoth, I come to tell you, that you need not fear any ill effect from a rencounter which hath given me an infinite esteem for you; and if you be a stranger, it is not just that I should not acknowledge in you a consideration for me, to which I have never oblig'd you, and of the cause of which I must needs be ignorant.

Constance was highly pleas'd as well with this noble deportment of the Prince, as with his love for his person; but judging that he could not make himself known, without forcing either his virtue or his friendship to too dangerous a proof, he persever'd in his design to hide himself from him; and knowing well that his Helmet chang'd the sound of his voyce, in such sort as it could difficultly be known, and particularly to a man who could not have the least suspicion of the truth; Though I am no Visigoth (said he) I will not fight against you, having done so much already for a man who neither can, nor will ever be your enemy. If it be possible, I shall in few dayes tell you more at Barcelona: In the mean time, I demand of you as a recompence to what you think due to the consideration I have for you, that you will no farther pursue, nor desire to know a miserable person, to whom death would be more agreeable than the company of men.

Finishing these words, he again spur'd on his Horse to a full speed; and the Prince Wallia not willing to displease him, or obstinately endeavour to know him against his intention, permitted him to depart without farther pursuing him, or informing himself of him by his Esquire, who with difficulty follow'd him. And he being thus deliver'd from the fear of making himself known, pursu'd for some time the same Road; but when he saw darkness ready to chase away the day, he took another way, by which he return'd to a quarter of the City, which was most remote from the Gate he pass'd out at, and from the Inn he had formerly lodg'd at, and in which he had left me; whither he would not return, for fear to be too well known by his Equipage, and the stay he had made there. So having found a conveniency at the utmost extent of the City, and in the least frequented, and most obscure place possible, he sent to seek me by the Esquire which had follow'd him.

So soon as he saw me, receiving me with an Aspect in which all his passions were represented; And well Valerius (said he) I have seen Placidia, I have gain'd the honour of the Courses, and have likewise receiv'd a Bracelet from Placidia's Arm: Are not these great happinesses in one day? But alas, they are light ones, in comparison of the evils I have seen in their full career; little have I been comforted in the sight of Placidia, since I saw her only to see my misfortunes, and the happiness of a Husband to which our unpitiable destiny is fastned with indissoluble chains.

After these words, and many others little different, the length of which hinders me from relating them to you, he had the goodness to recite to me all that I have now recounted to you; and he touch'd me so much with the impression of his affectionate grievances, that himself could scarce be more. In the end, he began to deliberate, and long time he deliberated in vain the means to see Placidia, finding none but what he judg'd too dangerous for the Princess; for as for what danger might threaten himself, he consider'd it not at all. He believ'd that among all the Ladies that were come out of Italy with the Queen, there was none that would betray him; and he was likewise confident that among those Roman Officers which she had, there were few but would hazard their lives for his service, and particularly Tiburtius, whom he had some years before plac'd with her, and who was a man of Courage, Fidelity and Merit, and one of the most considerable in the House of Placidia, and whom had he rencountred, he had made no difficulty to confide in: but in short, those things that might regard the honour and repose of Placidia, bore such weight with him, that he had none but Virginia whom he might be confident of, and by whose means alone he might attempt the sight of the Princess.

Not but that upon any other occasion he could have laid a great foundation upon the Prince Wallia, (of whose Arrival I understood the News with joy, believing that by his presence and authority among the Goths, he might divert a great part of those dangers which might threaten the life of my Master, should he happen to be known) but in this he had no inclination to employ a person so bound to the Interest of Autalph, as he was both by Blood and Allegiance.

'Twas then to Virginia, he resolv'd to address himself not doubting her still so much his Friend, as to procure him all satisfaction that was possible: and because my Countenance was in much less danger to be known than his, as having been less observ'd in the World, and particularly by the Goths, with whom I had never had any converse, he resolv'd to remain conceal'd whilst I sought an occasion to speak to Virginia, and inform her of his being at Barcelona. Things being thus determin'd, I employ'd all my credit to make him take a light repast, and some little repose, to which with some trouble I engag'd him.

In the mean time Prince Wallia had been receiv'd by the King of the Goths, and by all the Court, in which after Sigerie (one degree nearer to the Crown) he held the first Rank, but was besides what was due to his Birth, more especially ador'd for his great virtues, and courted with all the marks of esteem and respect he could desire; and that Night having saluted the King and Queen at their return from Hilderie's, both the one and the other testifi'd by their reception of him, the great affection they bore him. He entertained them a long time with the subject which had led him back to Barcelona after so long an absence, giving them an account of his Adventures, the recital of which would perhaps be no less agreeable than those I am now recounting, and which without doubt your Majesty hath heard, heard, since they are of too great importance not to have attain'd to your knowledge.

The next Morning so soon as the Queen was ready, being in her Chamber with some Ladies, amongst whom was Virginia, who notwithstanding her marriage attended her as early as ordinarily; he was admitted in, as well by the privilege of his Birth, as the particular consideration the Queen had for him: For in short, during all the misfortunes of her Captivity, and all that had happen'd to her till her Marriage, she had receiv'd so much assistance, and good offices from this Prince, that there was scarce any person in the World to whom she believed her self more oblig'd, and in whom she had more confidence: And as all the thoughts she had for Constance, were full of Innocence and Vertue, she had open'd her mind to him upon that subject, and that so much the rather, because she had not preserved the least thought in her bosome which might injure the duty she ought to the King her Husband.

She therefore now received him in the best manner in the World; and after having made some farther enquiry into his Adventures, in which she claim'd a becoming interest, and that he had acquainted her with the estate of his life without any other witnesses than Virginia, the other Ladies keeping a distance out of respect, they fell into discourse of the Marriage of Virginia, and those things which had fallen out the day before in the great place of Barcelona. Wallia had already heard speak of the confusion was made among the Goths by an Unknown Knight, and as well of his fair Courses, as of his discourse, and how he behaved himself toward Hilderic, and those who would have stopp'd him by Command of the King; and after having from Virginia inform'd himself of this Unknown, and was informed better than before of his carriage, and the fashion of his Arms, on an instant making a reflection which he had not thought of before, and comparing what they had told him, to what he had preserv'd in his memory; I am very much deceiv'd, Madam, (said he to the Queen) If I encountred not this Unknown Knight, and if this encounter hath not something in it of extraordinary, and worthy your attention. At these words he related particularly to the Queen all that had happen'd between him and my Master, as well upon the ground of their quarrel, which he no longer attributed to incivility, but to the distraction and profound sadness of the Unknown Knight; the particulars of their combat, the consideration the Stranger had for him so soon as he saw his Face, the words they had had together, after he had overtaken him, and fixing particularly upon the last, which had extremely touch'd him, and by which he pray'd him not to endeavour to know a miserable person, to whom death would be more agreeable than the company of men.

Whilst Wallia made this Discourse, the Countenance of the Queen several times chang'd colour; and having beheld Virginia, with a deep sigh, she fix'd her eyes on the Ground, and remain'd like a person wholly amaz'd and stupified. Virginia's Actions seconded the Queens, neither of them endeavouring to dissemble their thoughts before a man of whom they had not the least distrust: and the Prince observing them, was no less surpriz'd than they, till addressling himself to the Queen; I know not, Madam, (said he) if it be the discourse I have made to your Majesty, which hath caused this change I have mark'd in your Countenance; and I am more ignorant whether the respect that I owe you, will permit me to inform my self. Placidia remained yet some time silent without answering him; but at length, lifting up her eyes from the Ground where she had fix'd them; 'Tis your discourse, without doubt (said she to the Prince) which hath confirm'd me in those suspicions which made this last the most cruel night of my whole life: and since in an innocence like mine, I can confide all things to your vertue, without fearing any thing from those whom this discourse may interest; Virginia may relate to you all that she would perswade me to, and of which I remain almost convinc'd by the confirmation you give me, which makes me fear (ended she with a sigh) I am come to the very last of my misfortunes.

Wallia hearkn'd to these words with an intention which made him begin already to enter into some knowledg of the truth: but desiring to learn more of Virginia, she declared to him the suspicion they had, that this valiant Unknown person, who had made himself so much spoken of in Barcelona, and who without doubt was the same against whom he fought, was the great and unfortunate Constance; which they judg'd not only by his carriage and actions, all parallel to those of that great man, but by the mournful colour of his Arms, his sorrowful Impress, which denoted the loss of his Hopes; the words which were written upon his Shield, in which he had not so much as conceal'd his name, though to abuse the Visigoths, he appli'd it to an other sence; the esteem he testified for Virginia, for whom Constance had alwayes a great respect; the Magnificent present he made to Hilderic, which could not come but from a great Prince, and from a man liberal like Constance; the value he had testified for himself, to whom he was alwayes a particular Friend; and the he words he had spoke at their parting, all agreeing and conformable to the rest.

Whilst Virginia was speaking in this manner, Placidia perhaps touch'd with the last words of Constance, which she spoke over again, let fall some tears which might be seen trickle down her Rosie Cheek; and after liting up her eyes to Heaven in a languishing posture; O God (said she) Protector of the innocent and miserable, can it be that you reserve me yet to this desperate misfortune, if our suspicions be true? Or can you give Fortune so much Empire over the Daughter of the great Theodosius? Wallia was so much touch'd with the words and tears of Placidia, that he easily entred into the same suspicions; and both by the discourse of Virginia, and the reflection which himself made upon the Action, and the person of him against whom he fought, he doubted not at all but it was certainly the great Constance. This thought, against which he strove a little to defend himself, plung'd him into a deep sadness, as well for the pity he took upon the misfortunes of so great a man, as for the grief he had not to be able upon such an occasion as this, which had brought him into those Countries, to give him those assistances which in all others he might expect from his Friendship. These considerations, which began infinitely to disquiet him, silenc'd him for a long time. But in the end forcing himself to dissemble that Astonishment, which might augment the Queens, and increase her discontents, in stead of giving her consolation, endeavouring to cloath his Countenance with a more serene Aspect:

Madam, (said he to the Queen) I am much perswaded by the reasons there are in your suspicions; and in all the appearances of this Unknown Knight, I find the Courage, the Valour, the Carriage, and the Fortune of Constance: The knowledge I have of his misfortunes, doth sensibly augment mine, and it is upon this occasion, that I find my self truly unhappy, that I cannot offer to so Illustrious a Friend the Services which I would endeavour to render him, were I neither Goth, nor of the Blood of the King your Spouse; But however engag'd as I am to the Interests of Autalph, both by Blood and Allegiance, there are good offices which I can render Constance without offending him; and by offering him what I can, he will know how to discern by his virtue, that which mine permits me to do, from that it defends me from. I dare my self assure you, that your Honour is in security as to his pretensions; and that love which without doubt makes him seek occasions to see you, cannot inspire a thought into him, by which your duty may be offended.

I am of the same belief with you (answered the Queen, interrupting him) for I have known so much virtue in all the Actions of Constance, that I cannot believe any passion whatsoever can taint it: but though our thoughts are not criminal, in the condition I am, I can have no innocent comierce with Constance, nor see him, nor think of him, without wounding that Duty I owe to the King my Spouse, and my own Honour. However, in those misfortunes which his arrival may make me fear, I receive you as a great comfort, and as a succour sent me from Heaven in my afflictions; not only because you can justify my proceeding, which shall be entirely known to you: but because by the friendship between you and Constance, which notwithstanding the Interests of your House, you generously preserve, you may oblige him to retire himself without seeing me, from a Country where his stay cannot but be ruinous to my reputation: and in demanding of him this proof of the consideration he hath for you, and of that which he may yet have for me, you may take care, if you please, to deliver him from those dangers which may threaten his life, if he should be known in these Territories: Behold now, Prince, what I hope from the friendship you profess both to him and to me; and behold the office I conjure you to render to the unfortunate, to whom it is not permitted to receive or desire any thing more from a Friend generous and just as you are.

In speaking these last words, the fair Queen could not refrain from letting fall some tears; and the Gothick Prince, notwithstanding the resentments he had of his own unhappiness, which perhaps at another time was so great as might justly demand the entire thoughts of his mind, was touch'd in such sort, that there wanted but little to make him accompany his own tears with hers: but endeavouring to force that grief he felt for the Fortune of two such Illustrious Personages, with some pain, endeavouring to reply to the Queen:

Madam, (said he) I will faithfully perform one part of what you ordain me; and though you had not commanded me to seek Constance, it had been difficult for me to know that he is near us, and not use my utmost power to find him, and offer him that service may be permitted me to render him. I shall see him, without doubt, if I have yet so much happiness as to meet him, and shall endeavour as much as possible to comfort his misfortunes, and to divert with the peril of my own life those dangers that may threaten his: but to make known your intentions never to see him more, I beseech you to employ, if you please, some person less sensible than my self of misfortunes of this nature; and if you judge I may upon this occasion procure the satisfaction of an unfortunate Friend, he pleas'd also to think it fit, that I should not add to his miseries.
procure

The Queen was about to return an Answer to the Prince, when they heard a noise at the Chamber-door, and immediatly after they perceiv'd the King to enter, follow'd by Sigeric, Hilderic, and some others, who us'd to have the principal access to him. The Queen was surpriz'd at the Arrival of the King; and so much the more, because she fear'd lest he should perceive in her Face the marks of their sad converse; to conceal which, she cover'd her eyes with a handkerchiff she had in her hand, feigning to be troubl'd with the head-ach; and Wallia, to favour her in that design, approaching the King, began to entertain him in some Affair, and in a short time after, under some pretence led him out of the Chamber.

So soon as they were departed, the Queen, to pass away her sadness with more liberty, entred, only accompanied with Virginia, into her Closet, the windows of which answer'd to the Palace-Garden; and it was at the same time that I being departed from our Lodging by the commandment of my Master, to seek some occasions to speak to Virginia, was come into the Garden (where I understood she often walked) and was now in an Alley not far distant from the Windows of the Closet; so that the Queen had no sooner open'd them, but casting her eyes upon the Garden, after she had for some moments look'd about, she retir'd with a pale countenance, and let her self fall into a chair, with a violent disturbance of mind easily observ'd by Virginia.

Virginia approach'd the Queen, strangely astonish'd, and earnestly demanding the cause of that last trouble which appeared in her countenance and whole person. Look Virginia (said she, with a gesture craving compassion) and you will possibly as well as I see within the Garden that same Valerius, whom we all so well know, and whom we have so often seen attend on Constance. Virginia, without returning her Answer, cast her eyes into the Garden, where, as well as the Queen, she saw and easily knew me; nor was it difficult for her to do so, the distance not being great; and I being there to make my self seen by her, had my entire Visage fixed upon the window: so soon as I saw that she had marked me, I made her a very submissive reverence; and notwithstanding the trouble the sight of me caused in her, she return'd my salutation by bowing down her head, which let me know she had not mistaken me.

The Queen had observ'd her, and having call'd her to her; And well, Virginia (said she) is not that Valerius? and am not I (continued she, seeing Virginia did not answer her) the most unfortunate person in the World, to be reduc'd to fear more than death, where all the offence I can do to my duty, is but the sight of a man once dear to me, and to whom I seem'd to be desir'd by Heaven, by the Emperour my Brother, and my own Inclinations? However may it please God (added she some minutes after) that I resolve well what course I have to take, and that the reluctance which I have to flee the sight of Constance, make me not forget what I ought to prefer before all things; go, my dear Virginia, (said she, embracing her) go, find Valerius, who without doubt seeks the occasion to speak with you; and as all the secrets of my heart are known to you, tell him all I think, and all that I can, and all that I am oblig'd to do. Tell him that in all my miseries and in my change of condition, I have never forgot what I owe to the affection and virtue of his Master: but this remembrance, which does but render me more miserable, cannot with reason make me forget what I owe to my reputation, which if it had been dear to him, he had not come into this Country to seek occasions to ruin it. That both his person and the love he bears me, are known to the King my Husband, and the greatest part of the Goths; and that he cannot expose himself to the danger to be known, without exposing to the same hazard his life and the honour of Placidia. That I conjure him by all the affection he ever bore me, and by all that ever I had for him so long as it was permitted me, to give me this sole proof I can demand, to retire without seeing me, out of this Country, where he cannot see me without losing me, and where he cannot make any stay without casting me into those unquiet cares, which will be far more cruel than death. You may add to this all you can judge sufficient to persuade him: and thus will you do me an office I absolutely desire of you, and which is the best that you can possibly do me considering my present fortunes.

Virginia would have return'd an Answer to the Queen; and perhaps have excus'd her self from the commission she gave her, and in which as well as Wallia she found her self little capable to serve her; but the Queen stopp'd her mouth so soon as she began to discourse, and press'd her in such sort not to lose the opportunity to speak to me, that having made me a sign from the window, she was constrain'd to descend a little pair of stairs, which came from the Queen's Apartment, and by which she often us'd to walk down with her into the Garden. So soon as she was entred with only one Maid that attend readed her, I observ'd, that not to speak to me in a place too much expos'd to view, she sought the shady Alleys, and after having taken notice what way she took, I follow'd her, and met her in the least frequented part of the Garden.

So soon as she saw her self at liberty to speak to me, she waited for me; and receiving me with a Countenance full of all marks of tenderness and grief; "Valerius (said she) "Where is Constance? He is at Barcelona (answered I) and you saw him yesterday bear a successful part in the solemnities of your marriage. Yes, Valerius, I saw him (replied she) and the Queen saw him too, and we suspected well that by his carriage a person so extraordinary could be no other than Constance. Alas (continued she with a sigh) with what joy should I understand his arrival amongst us, and with what joy should I hope to see him, if in that interview there were not more to be fear'd than hop'd; and if in brief, we were not unfortunate for those reasons too well known to you? 'Tis true (replied I) my Master is certainly the most miserable of all men; but he is not yet so much as he will be, if you are no longer his friend: and I am charg'd before all things to inform my self, if you have still preserv'd that amity for him which he hath so often had experience of. Yes without doubt (said Virginia) I have preserv'd it for him, and will preserve it to my Tomb: but this friendship is little profitable at this time, since I cannot perform for him any service, though I desire it more than ever.

After these first words, we walk'd in a very retir'd Alley, and had a long discourse, in which I related to her succinctly the miseries which had happen'd to my Master after our parting, and learnt of her all those other things which I have but now recounted to your Majesty, especially the discourses between the Queen and Prince Wallia: but when in the end of our discourse, she told me the last resolution the Queen had taken never to see Constance, and the order she had given her to entreat him to retire without seeing her, with which she would charge me, though she testified the great repugnance she had to do it, I was, and the seem'd touch'd with a grief little different from that which Constance himself could have felt; and interrupting her in the discourse which she made with a visible trouble;

Why Madam (said I) is it not enough that Constance dies, but that I must be the person destin'd to pronounce his death? Ah Madam, pronounce it your self, if you have so much courage; for I declare my self unable to serve you in this rigid employment. I sued as much to the Queen (replied Virginia) and I vow to you, that I never had such a force upon my spirits as to acquit my self of this commission concerning Constance. If you be still his friend, (replied I) or if you have a true pity of his miseries, you will testify it upon this occasion: 'Tis to you only I have order to, address my self to obtain some means to see the Queen: you ought not to refuse this succour to a friend, who hopes it from no other but your self; and you will infallibly give him a death, if you consent not. Ah! Valerius (replied Virginia) you are too cruel to speak to me in this manner: for you judge ill of my intentions, if you do not believe that nothing can be more dear to me than to serve the afflicted Constance; but alas, I have not the power to do it, and Fortune is aversly contrary to us.

Finishing these words, pity brought tears to her eyes, and I observing she was truly touch'd, pressed her in such sort, that in the end I brought her to seek some means for my Master to see and to speak to the Queen, though she should run a hazard to displease her: but because this could not be done without deceiving the Queen, who would never consent to such an interview, she sought with a great deal of difficulty the best way; and in the end propos'd one she believ'd the least dangerous, and most likely.

There is a very little way distant from the City of Barcelona, a house of Religious men, consecrated to the service of that God which we adore, and which, after the Goths became Masters of that Country, was maintain'd by the authority of the Queen. Not that the Goths do not know and serve the same Divinity, and that under the Empire of Valens they quitted your Religion to embrace that of the Romans; but that after some time they received into their belief those errors which one Arius introduc'd, and which makes a considerable difference between theirs and ours. But Placidia having preserv'd the purity of hers, to which the King her Husband had given her liberty; and finding comfort in the conversation of these men wholly dedicated to God, she visited them often; and when her sadness made her seek a solitude, after she had offer'd up her Prayers in the Temple, she us'd to walk for some time in a wood near their house, in which there are both Alleys and Arbours, which make it a curious retirement; and when she was in this place, all the Goths and the King himself had that respect not to trouble her retirements. Some days were pass'd, since she went last, and this made Virginia believe that it was in that place better than any other, that Constance might see her without her having any suspicion that she had contributed; contributed: she told me at the same time, the hours at which she was accustomed to go, promising to do what she could to oblige her to go on the morrow.

After having made me this promise, and vowed me with a thousand assurances her friendship for my Master, she left me; and immediately after I quitted the Garden and went to find Constance. He ran to me without patience, and without giving me leave to answer, he ask'd me a hundred questions in an instant. I resolv'd to conceal from him one part of the truth, believing that if I should tell him the firm resolution the Queen had never to see him more, I should cast him into a grief which might prove too fatal: and therefore dissembling that to him, sweetning those things which I believ'd necessary, and telling him that Placidia had still reserv'd for him an infinite tenderness and resentment of his miseries I endeavour'd to abate the trouble I fear'd; yet I let him understand, that she was fearful of occasions to see him, as well for the scruples her Duty inspir'd her with, as for fear of the danger would threaten him; should he be known.

He hearkned patiently to this discourse, being well prepar'd with the knowledge he had of her severe virtue, to receive a part of what I told him: but when he observed me with difficulty endeavour to sweeten what might seem most cruel in the intentions of the Queen; sib Valerius (said he) you flatter me: I know well by your discourse, and by the trouble you have to dissemble the truth, that Placidia will see me no more. Yes, she would see you, my Lord, (replyed I) but she fears by seeing you to expose your life and her reputation to unavoidable danger; and therefore it was with a great deal of reason that Virginia hath advis'd that we ought to seek an opportunity without advertising her, lest her fear should deter her from taking such a resolution. In sum, having told him the proposition Virginia had made me, to go to the house of those Religious persons, and the hopes she had given me, that he might have a sight of the Queen in that place, with more convenience and assurance than in all others, I see well (said he) that it is to Virginia only that I owe that comfort my hopes can give me; but 'tis not for me, unfortunate as I am, to chuse neither the favours nor the persons from whom I am to receive them: but be it by whose assistance soever I gain it, the sight of Placidia will still be more dear to me than my life.

We now only attended the nights black mantle to conceal us out of the City; my Master believing he could not in the day-time pass the streets, without putting himself in danger of being known, not having any pretence to pass armed as the day before. In short, having spent the rest of the day, and a good part of the night, ere the morning again appear'd, we departed from our lodging and from the City, going to seek this house of Religious persons, with design to lodge, if possible, in some place not far distant from it. But here we had an encounter which we did not expect; for after we had by the light of the rising Sun, seen and known the House, the Temple, and the Wood, of which Virginia spoke; and that Constance, whose excellent virtues have still been accompanied with a great piety towards Heaven, was entred the Temple, and had remained some time at his Prayers; one of the persons who in this house had devoted himself to Divinity, having passed twice or thrice by him, and withly looking upon him, knew him; and standing before him with the usual marks of great astonishment, he gave him the opportunity to note more particularly his Countenance, and to know him, notwithstanding the change which so extraordinary a habit might cause in a person who had spent a good part of his life in his service, and whom he had singularly affected amongst his Domesticks, and whom for his good qualities, and the confidence he had in him, he had given to Placidia, when he parted from Rome to go to the Gallick War.

Tiburtius, for so he was called, had accompanied the Princess in her captivity, and had stayed in her service, until the time of her Marriage; but either inspired by Heaven, or weary of the miseries of the world, he had abandon'd it, and retired himself amongst those persons who liv'd in this House, where he was considerable, both for his virtues, and the great esteem which the Queen still preserv'd for him.

His discretion moderated the transportation of his thoughts at the view of Constance; and though he found himself strongly affected with the kindness he had for him, yet judging well that he could not be in that Country with any design to make himself known; before he approach'd him, he carefully look'd about him, lest there should be any person in the Temple to be a witness of his actions: and then addressing himself to him; Ab my Lord (said he) is it possible that my eyes see you without delusion? By these words, and by the found of his voice, Constance could not doubt but this man was truly Tiburtius; and finding some comfort in the presence of a person, who notwithstanding his long abode among the Goths, was not at all suspected by him: Yes Tiburtius (said he with his natural sweetness) you see the miserable Constance, and you see him in an estate where his meet- ing with your self cannot but yield him some comfort. Would to God (replied Tiburtius) that you could find it in a place where I have found my refuge and entire repose; and that in this happy retreat, there do but rest a means for me to testify, that in renouncing all things in the world, the affection I bear to so great a Master is the only thing I have not renounc'd.

After these words, Constance having made known to him that he was oblig'd to stay for some days near this house with the greatest secrecy imaginable, and that he should receive from him a considerable piece of service, if he would instruct him in the means how to compass it: Tiburtius after having some few minutes silently considered; My Lord (said he) I have so much knowledge of your virtue, that I cannot judge ill of your intentions, whatever passion may make you act; and therefore without fear to offend the God I serve, or my profession, I dare offer you that little service you desire of me, and a retreat as secret as you can wish. In short, he told him that if he would send away his equipage, as he might easily do, he might pass that time he desir'd in his Chamber, with all security imaginable, and command with an absolute power all those things which in the condition of life he had chosen, lay in his power to serve him in.

Constance having thank'd him with great marks of gratitude, gave me his orders; and whilst he continu'd in discourse with Tiburtius, I went to the place where we had left our horses and the two Esquires, and commanded him who had follow'd him the day before, and who was a person both faithful and courageous, to retire himself with the horses into some private place, and to come and find me alone at an hour appointed at the Temple Gate, to inform me where they were, and receive the orders of Constance according as there should be occasion.

Having perform'd this injunction, I return'd to my Master, and following him to the Chamber of Tiburtius, where his orders were that I should stay with him, and where Tiburtius caus'd him to be serv'd with all necessaries, if not with magnificence, yet at least with decency, not fearing his companions, who besides the little curiosity they had for the things of this world, much lov'd and consider'd him:

'Twas here that my Master more largely discover'd to him his intentions, the innocency of which he endeavour'd to justify with more diligence than he had done; had he spoken them to a person of any other profession, and principally to him, to whom besides my self they had at other times been more clearly made known, than to any other of his Domesticks; and Tiburtius having attentively hearkned to him; Would to God, my Lord (said he, when he perceiv'd him silent) that the change you prove in your Fortune, may make you seriously take notice of the truth, and weakness of humane condition, and not endeavour to search among men a true consolation, which you will only find at the feet of that Divinity we serve; and afterwards regard with pity those, which you see exposed to those calamities which perpetually trouble this miserable life. But since it will be difficult to reduce you presently to these considerations, and that it will be perhaps somewhat of injustice, to deprive the Empire and the true Religion of so great a stay, and so generous a defender; I will not with too feeble Arms combat your intentions; and I will resist them so much the less, because I find them not so criminal as to be condemned by those to whom affection leaves the least indulgence. For your satisfaction, Virginia hath told the truth, in telling to Valerius, that in this place rather than any other, you may see the Queen, who here passes her hours of retreat and solitude: and since it is only the sight of her you desire, and that I believe I shall not offend in serving you in this design, I have hopes I may do it, by causing you to enter into the Wood by a small door, which we have on our side, whilst the Queen enters at the great Portal to walk with Virginia, who ordinarily is the only person that accompanies her: But remember, my Lord, that you demand only to see the Queen, and that you ought not to abuse the Ministry of a person consecrated to the service of God, in any thing which might offend him, and which will incense without doubt the Queen, if she should have any cognizance of it.

Constance return'd thanks to Tiburtius for the offer he made him, and remov'd those scruples by new protestations: but a little after, beholding him with eyes that express'd the feeling he had of his miseries; Oh Tiburtius (said he) what consolation had you to accompany Placidia in her captivity, and in her misfortunes? But alas! (added he with a sigh) how have you permitted her to be unfaithful to me? Oh my Lord (replied he) accuse not Placidia of being unfaithful to you; lament her evils, rather than reproach them, which you cannot do without injustice. I should lament for her without doubt (replied Constance) if I believ'd her unhappy, but what unhappiness can you find in the condition of a woman, who passes her life in the arms of a husband whom she loves, and for whose sake she hath forgot all others who might have claim'd a share in her remembrance? I believe without doubt (added Tiburtius) that the Queen loves the King, as she is oblig'd to do both by her duty and virtue;

but you know well, my Lord, her inclinations were never for him; and it was not without much difficulty she forc'd her inclination to yield to this violence.

“ You have understood, without doubt, what she did, and what she suffer'd in the siege, and at the sack of Rome; and you ought to understand that in all those miseries that afterwards afflicted her, she preserv'd as long as it was possible, the desire she had to give her self to none but you. During the time the Goths stay'd at Rome, Alaric caus'd her to be serv'd with all that respect due to her Dignity; but she was continually expos'd to the persecutions of Autalph, who never stirr'd from her, and was constantly troubled with his continual protestations of love, no less odious to her than her Captivity it self, though she receiv'd him with the same aversion that she testified before the change of her condition.

“ But as she knew Alaric to be a Prince of great courage, and endow'd with more virtue than is ordinary in a Barbarian King; by her sweetness she endeavour'd to rely upon him, judging well that his Authority was necessary to defend her from the violencies she might fear from Autalph; and in this, her hopes deceiv'd her not: for Alaric had been but few days with her, but he conceiv'd a marvellous esteem for her virtue, nor respect'd he her less for that consideration, than that of her birth, opposing himself to the violent affections of his Brother, and making him observe that respect he ought not to a Captive, but to the Daughter of the great Theodosius.

“ 'Tis true, that the interposition of Prince Wallis did very much conduce to the confirming of Alaric in these thoughts, for he employ'd himself with infinite Generosity for the service of the Princess; and Alaric considering him both for his merit, and those great things he had done, more highly than for the nearness of blood, yielded much to his intreaties and intercession. But a while after there happen'd some things which caus'd a change in his affection for him, and Placidia was constrain'd to flee for refuge to the reputation of the Princess Theodolinda, of whom Alaric was become extremely passionate, and who had a powerful predominancy over his spirit.

“ Theodolinda employ'd her self for her with a sincere affection; and the consideration of the service which she might render the Princess, made her suffer from Alaric those testimonies of affection, to which she had an infinite opposition. Soon after she was forc'd to follow the Conquerour; and this unfortunate Princess turning her eyes swelling with tears, towards the desolate City, spoke those things which mov'd the very Barbarians to compassion, and which without doubt had oblig'd Alaric to have given her liberty, if Autalph had not been continually at his heels to hinder it, protesting that he could not but with his life lose the hopes of possessing Placidia.

“ Alaric, who had a real value for him, employ'd his daily intreaties to the Princess; but when he desir'd him to do farther, he told him that he could not resolve to force the Daughter of the Great Theodosius; in the mean time she was led away captive with the other Princesses, and a great number of Ladies of Illustrious birth, companions of her captivity and misfortunes: Yet she suffer'd all with an admirable constancy, nor was there any thing she suffer'd not more patiently than the love of Autalph: sometimes he would treat her with sufficient respect; and as he was by nature extremely fierce, so his nature carried him sometimes to a misbecoming violence, making her know by his words the change of her condition: but whether it were through the greatness of her courage, or the confidence she had in the protection of Alaric, she manifested to him an invincible constancy, making him often judge that the taking of Rome had render'd his condition little happier than before.

“ It was in one of the Cities of Lucania where we made some stay whilst the Gothick Troops ravag'd the whole Province that he fiercely assaulted her; and after he had unprofitably with prayers endeavour'd to bend her, finding her still firm in her resolution not to give her self to him, his anger overcame the respect he had for her; and beholding her with eyes, which express'd both his choler and his love; I see, Madam (said he) that the ways which I take, do not at all advance my hopes, and that I must in spite of my self, have recourse to those which the rights of war permit me to follow: I am unwilling to fall into extremes, and shall with a great deal of trouble violate that respect I bear you; but you may remember, if you please, that a despairing patience turns into fury, and that you ought not to reduce to those terms a man who could do all things, if his love to you, were not greater than his power over you.

“ Placidia listen'd to this discourse with an infinite disdain; and looking upon Autalph as a person whom the change of her condition could only make her fear; The power that you have over me (said she) comes by Fortune, and not by a legitimate right;

“and though by the success of an unjust War I am brought under your power, you cannot be ignorant that I am Daughter and Sister both to the Eastern and Western Emperours. This ought possibly to hold you in remembrance of what you owe me: but when you shall forget it, I hope I shall not be forsaken by Heaven, though I find no success among men. Those from whom you ought to receive it (replied Autalpb) are very slow to give it you; and without speaking of your Brother the Emperour, who seems to approve my design, since he doth not endeavour to hinder it, that happy Constance to whom you destine this Fortune, which with so much obstinacy you deny to me, is either very negligent of his duty, or perhaps employed in a War which in my judgement may be of less importance, than your defence, and his Countries.

“These words made the very heart of the Princess tremble; and being yet ignorant of the estate wherein you were, which she understood few days after, she felt a mortal grief for the reproaches cast upon you; however she endeavour'd to dissemble it, and was about to return an answer to Autalpb which might equalize his fierceness, when Alaric entering the Chamber, she complain'd to him of his Brothers threats; and the Gothick King blaming him in her presence, commanded him to preserve the respect due to so great a Princess.

“In the mean time, as I was he of her Domesticks who had the most entire knowledge of the affection she had for you, and in this regard, he in whom she had the most confidence, as to what concern'd you; she often complain'd her self to me of you, but still with an infinite sweetness, and in such a manner, which made me well judge of the difficulty she had to accuse you: But when the Messenger return'd which she had sent, and she by him had understood the deplorable condition in which you were, she not only excus'd you, but seem'd far more sensible of your misfortune, than she had been either for that of her Country, or her own; and gave her self up to a grief so immoderate for a person of her humour, that without the help of Heaven, to which she had daily recourse, with an admirable Piety, she could not have liv'd so long as to fall into the hands of Autalpb.

“My Lord, I shall not recount to you all the Discourses she made in deploring your misfortunes, and her own. Sometimes perhaps she attributed it to the goodness of Heaven, which to deliver you from so many mischiefs, as her misfortunes might cause you to suffer, took you out of the world. Nor will I recite to you all that she daily endur'd through the persecution of Autalpb, who did every day in the same manner afflict her, as his passion instructed him. All her comfort and stay against his Power, was in the succour she receiv'd from Prince Wallia, and the Princess Theodolinda, who to be in a capacity to serve her, admitted more willingly Alaric's love, than for any other consideration. But in Campania, where we made some stop, she lost the assistance of Wallia that Generous Prince, having some controversies with Alaric known to the whole world, which constrain'd him to banish himself from him, after he had manifested upon this occasion an admirable Grandeur of courage.

“After the departure of Wallia, which begot in her an infinite discontent, she yet made use of the Authority of Alaric against the enterprises of his Brother: and certainly that King, though a Barbarian, had a brave and generous soul, nor would ever have suffer'd that Autalpb should have acted any violence against her, but Fortune would have it so, that being arriv'd at Consense, he was surpris'd with a malady, against which all remedies proved vain, and by the which he in few days lost a life made glorious among men.

“Though Placidia had no great reason to afflict her self for the loss of a man who had been the ruine of her Country, and had reduc'd her to a deplorable Captivity, yet she had some particular reasons which made her receive it with a particular grief, shedding some tears at his decease. The cause of which were well known to us, and soon after to all the Goths. Autalpb succeeded to his Brother by rights of his birth, and was crown'd soon after his death. No sooner did he see himself seated in his Sovereign Authority, but he made the unfortunate Placidia sensible of his power, declaring to her his design to espouse her in despite of all obstacles whatsoever.

“Placidia sigh'd and griev'd at this deplorable effect of her helpless condition; she lamented, she wept, she invoc'd the Heavens, as she was accusom'd, and tryed all ways possible, either by sweetness or resolution to divert the intention of the King of the Goths; and indeed, she manifested at that time a constancy and resolution admirable, making her Lover, yet her persecutor, oftentimes know, that death would be much more sweet to her than the Marriage he propos'd; or the Crown he offer'd: But Autalpb did neither menace her life, nor was she of a Religion which might permit her to seek her “end

“end by violent means; yet whilst she had nothing else to fear, she remain'd unshaken in her design, never to be others than yours.

“But when Autalph by the knowledge he had that the change of his condition nothing better'd his Fortunes, grew more and more enrag'd, and lost all the respect he had for her, treating her like a Captive, and making her know that his intentions were more cruel against her than he had yet shewn; and that he pretended by the power he had over her, to what she refus'd by Marriage, she trembled with horrour, and in an instant lost all her courage.

“In effect, my Lord, she was so much frighted with the threats of the Barbarian King, and fear'd in such sort the disgrace to which she saw her self expos'd, that as well perswaded by this fear, as by the counsels of all persons that were near her, she was constrain'd to accept of the least of those two evils which he propos'd: and it is certain, my Lord, that her most faithful servants counsell'd her rather to consent to espouse Autalph, than attend those utmost extremities he prepar'd for her, and that disgraceful condition into which he would throw her. I was my self of the number of those that sollicit'd her, though I was not without doubt the person to whom your interests were least considerable; and I assure you, my Lord, you would have sollicit'd her your self, rather than have seen her expos'd to that infamy with which she was threaten'd.

“In short, Heaven and Fortune would have it, and since of force I must pass lightly over this rugged way, I'll only tell you that she espoused Autalph; but I must tell you with the same truth, that she went to the Temple as one may go to his Tomb; and that she enter'd into this condition, as one may enter into the most cruel Prison, or into the most deplorable miseries. If she espous'd Autalph without loving him, she was a great while his wife without being able to perswade her self to love him, though by her admirable virtue she us'd all her power to do it, and dayly demanded from Heaven that change in her heart which she believ'd her self oblig'd to by her duty. But some time after their Marriage, she did a thing which touch'd him very nearly, and which more than all the rest, reduced her to those kind thoughts she hath for him; which are without doubt such as she thought owing to her virtue, and to the respect she had for Heaven.

“The news being brought that Attalus was chas'd from Italy, that Artabure had discomitted in several incounters those Goths which Alaric had left there, and that Honorius prepar'd to return to Rome, and settle all things in their first estate: he presently resolv'd, as well for the natural inclination he had for war, as to revenge himself of the injury he pretended to have receiv'd; and more than for these reasons, by the sollicitation of the Goths more covetous than ever of the pillage, of which they had tasted the sweetness, to turn once more his Arms against the unfortunate Italy, and finish the ruine of that deplorable City, which the cruelty of his hand had already lay'd desolate.

“So soon as he resolv'd, he began to put his design in execution; all things prepar'd themselves for the war more than ever; the dispersed Troops were rallied from all parts, and in few days he saw himself at the head of a multitude of armed Soldiers destin'd to the ruine of her Country. The first sweetness of his Marriage could not divert him from his resolution, and he prepar'd himself to march more vigorously than ever to the destruction of Italy, when he observ'd in the Countenance, in the discourse, and in all the actions of the Queen, far greater grief than he had ever seen in the greatest miseries of her Captivity. In short, she was so smitten with this last blow of her evil fortune, and believ'd her self so little oblig'd to dissemble the grief she felt, that she gave her self up wholly to it, and demonstrated all the marks which could be expected from the most sensible miseries. At whatever hour the King her spouse came to visit her, he found her cheeks overflowed with tears, and heard nothing but plaints issue from her lips, and sighs from her breast; his infinite love made him tenderly sensible of her grief, and having earnestly press'd her to know the cause, why she mourn'd so much at that time when she had born her past miseries with such a constancy;

Why, my Lord, (said she, beholding him with eyes swollen with tears) how can you expect that my courage should serve me at this time, as it hath perhaps assisted me in the first misfortunes of my life? or do you not consider that between those and this last, with which I am threated, there is a difference which renders me more cruelly unfortunate? while before your Arms attack'd Italy, when you brought fire and sword into all parts, and I beheld the desolation of my native Country, and my self Captive of the Goths, I saw nothing within my miseries, in which there was not to be found some example; looking upon your Soldiers as the enemies of my Country; I suffer'd the change of my Fortune, as a misery to which humane condition is expos'd: but now my misfortune is both without comparison and without example, and Fortune hath now put on a more terrible countenance: For in brief, my Lord, they were at other times our Enemies, which march'd to the ruine of the places of our Nativity: 'Twas Alaric, whom I look'd upon as a Barbarian King, who came to assault our Walls; and I had the liberty to make vows, and to invoke Heaven to our assistance against those Enemies, whom it was permitted me to hate; but at this time they are our Subjects, that March against the Subjects of Honorius: 'Tis my Husband that goes to make War against my Brother; and on whatsoever side Fortune declares it self, in stead of the sweetness may be hop'd from Victory, I see for my self only occasion of tears and desolation: Shall I see you again wade in streams of the blood of those Citizens, amongst whom I receiv'd my Birth? and burn again the Houses of persons who were dear to me; and the Palaces of my Progenitors, destroyed by the fury of those people you would give me for Subjects, and by the order of a person, whom Heaven hath given me for a Husband? Or shall I see, if Fortune be contrary to you and us your Subjects, my Spouse perhaps fall under the victorious Arms of my Brother? But when I shall be preserv'd either to the one or the other of these cruel extremities, shall I be expos'd to that hard reproach of being said my self to run to the desolation of my Country? or can I without dying bear it said that Placidia her self brings a fire to enflame and burn down the City of her Birth? Oh, my Lord! if I am destin'd to this last misery, prevent by a blow of pity those mischiefs, the very thoughts of which afflict me, and sacrifice Placidia first to the implacable hatred you bear her Alliance. You may satisfy your self in this sort, without exposing your people, or without exposing your self to any danger; and by delivering me this way from the fear I have for you, and in an Enterprize in which Heaven may be contrary to you, you may deliver your self from those plaints, which I shall make you all my life.

“ The Queen spoke in this manner, and to these words she added so many more so forcible and perswasive, that Autalpb was not able to resist her; and taking one of her hands, which he kiss'd with an infinite respect; Madam, (said he) I submit my self to your will, and I give you your Country, with protestation that it shall not proceed from me, if the Emperour your Brother and my self be not united by an eternal alliance.

“ He said no more than these few words, and from that moment letting fall the designs he had for War, he chang'd all his Orders; and in stead of taking the way to Rome, he order'd his Army to march towards this Country; and few dayes after, he resolv'd to establish himself, (as he hath since done) and to extend his Dominions as well over that part of Spain as upon Aquitane, and the other Provinces which have been assign'd the Goths and the Gauls.

“ This action of Autalpb, which was without doubt very remarkable, being known throughout all Europe, produc'd very different effects; and if the Goths murmured on one side in so much that they came near to a revolt, it sensibly touch'd all the Romans, who were in the service of the Queen; and wrought so great an effect on the spirit of this great Princess, that after that day she gave her self entirely, at least as much as she could to that affection, which she believ'd due to her Husband, who had so much value for her: In brief, she accusom'd her self to live with him, with so much sweetness and complacency, and found from her virtue as great assistance as was necessary upon so great an occasion, to make him believe that he was as happy in his possession, as if he had obtain'd it by ways less constraining than he did.

“ See, my Lord, that which I could and ought succinctly to tell you in justification of the Queen, who perhaps hath done all she could to forget you, since she hath believ'd her self so bound by duty; but who without doubt hath done all things to preserve her self for you, so long as she had nothing more than captivity or death to fear.

Thus spoke Tiburtius, and to this discourse added several particulars upon the questions which Constance made him concerning those things, in which she took most delight, as well concerning the Adventures of the Princess Theodolinda, Cleomira and Virginia, as more particularly upon those of Prince Wallia, of whom Tiburtius told him all he knew, and things without doubt worthy your attention; but of which I shall not speak, because they are not at all concern'd in the life of my Master. Tiburtius had sufficient leisure to give him this account, because that day the Princess came not to visit the Religious House, as Virginia had made me hope; at which Constance was so much afflicted, that we could scarce comfort him, imagining that Placidia had been advertis'd of the design; and that the knowledge she had had of it, had hindred her from coming; and this fear made him but ill pass that Night.

But the next Morning, much earlier than we hoped for, Tiburtius came to advise him that the Queen was entred into the Temple, where she assist'd at Divine-service, and from whence

whence he did not doubt but she would take a walk in the Wood, as she had been accustomed: that only Virginia and some of her Ladies in whom she had the greatest confidence, accompani'd her. Constance was affail'd at this discourse with the motion of divers different passions; and after having remain'd some time to resolve himself, he caus'd Tiburtius to conduct him to the little Gate of the Wood, where I enter'd along with him, not to expose Tiburtius to the reproach he might fear from the Queen, by contributing as he now did to the satisfaction of Constance.

'Twas not without reason that Placidia went often to walk in this place: for when the love of solitude did not invite her, the beauty of it was sufficient to allure her; for though it was not adorn'd with all those Embellishments which Art could give it, yet it was not too much neglected; and those good persons had with a great deal of diligence endeavour'd to add perfection to what nature had made most fair. The Wood is encompassed with a high Wall round about, except only that part which looks towards the Sea, where it is no higher than to lean upon; and from this side, as from a fair Terrace, one may with liberty extend his view to the Sea, and over all the strand of Barcelona. At the two ends of the Terrace, there are two very fair Arbours of interlaced Branches; and because the Wood is square, there are two others in the other corners; and the passage from one to the other, is by Alleys square after the manner of the Wood; from these, many others strike into the middle of the Wood, where there is a fair Fountain, great and large, that casts the Water almost as high as the Trees, and which may be seen at the entrance into all the Alleys.

'Twas in this place that the passionate Constance walked some time, with trouble upon his spirit, which left him little liberty to observe other objects, how agreeable soever they might be; and in the mean time in one of the Alleys which burted against the great Gate, I waited to give him notice when he enter'd. Long had not I attended, nor scarce had he visited one part of the Wood, when I saw her enter, accompani'd only with Virginia, and two or three Roman Ladies, having left all the men of her Train at the Gate, either as she was accusom'd, or as it had been now order'd by Virginia: she lean'd upon Virginia's Arm, and the Ladies follow'd some paces behind, but coming near the Fountain they stay'd, and the Queen pass'd only with Virginia, into the Terrace-walk; where having walk'd a little while, they retire into one of the Arbours, and there seated themselves upon those Benches, which are most conveniently plac'd.

Nothing could be more favourable to the design of Constance, who beheld them from among the Trees, with those commotions of spirit, which it will be difficult to represent; and fearing in such sort, that he who had never known fear in so many perillous hazards, where his life had been expos'd, now arm'd with all his courage, could scarce resolve to approach a Woman that he lov'd, and by whom he was perhaps as dearly belov'd; he dispers'd, in the end, those difficulties which hindr'd him; and tremblingly discovering himself from among the Trees, he came to the entrance of the Arbour, and presented himself to the sight of Placidia. She was just ris'n from her seat, either to depart from the Arbour, or perhaps because she saw a man contrary to her ordinary usance appear in her retirements: but so soon as she had cast her eyes upon the countenance of Constance, if that sight did not surprize her so much as she had without doubt been, if she had been ignorant of his Arrival in that Country; yet she was troubl'd in such a manner, that she scarce remained apprehensive of any knowledge; and after she had only utter'd, Ah Constance! She tumb'd back into her seat, and let her self fall into the Arms of Virginia, who made haste to sustain her.

From thence, slowly lifting up her eyes upon the Countenance of her unfortunate Lover, who not having power to approach her, had rested himself against the Branches which fastn'd the Arbour, she beheld him with a languishing tenderness, and with behaviour which seem'd to speak more eloquently than she could do by her discourses: her tears soon after accompani'd her looks, and her eyes overflow'd in such a manner, that in a little time she water'd her fair breasts; yet in this condition she seem'd to the deplorable Constance more beautiful than ordinary, and Maugre all his constancy, and the Grandeur of his courage, he could not refrain to give marks of a grief almost as violent as that which possessed her. In this posture they a long time kept silence; but in the end, Placidia, who had less passion than Constance, or more command over what yet rested in her breast, broke it first, and drawing away (that she might yet again look upon him) the handkerchiff she had put before her eyes to dry them; Constance (said she) what come you to seek in these unfortunate Countries, and amongst those cruel men who have deprived you of Placidia? I come to seek a death (replied the afflicted Constance) and you may well judge that I can seek nothing less than death, after having lost Placidia. The Gods which we adore (answer'd the fair Queen) permit us not to seek our own death; for if it had been permitted to flee to that in our misfortunes, I had perhaps in the Arms of Death found a release to so many miseries, which may render mine as well as your life odious; but if Heaven defend you from seeking your death, your virtue should no less defend you from seeking Placidia, especially in a time wherein she cannot see you without offending her Duty, nor you present your self to her, without troubling that little repose which Fortune hath left her, and putting her reputation, into an apparent danger.

These words seem'd too cruel to the disconsolate Constance; and regarding the Queen with eyes which seem'd to express somewhat of a just sorrow; Ab Queen of the Goths, (said he) though you are Wife to Autilph, yet you are still the Sister of Honorius, and Daughter of Theodolius: And in sum, that Placidia whom in requital of my services, by the promise of the Emperour, and by your own, ought rather and more justly to have been mine than the King of the Goths. Is this the consolation you give to the miserable Constance, after having so cruelly forsaken him? Injust Constance (replied the Queen, with a behaviour wholly passionate) do you accuse me to have forsaken you? Me whom you have first abandon'd to the fury of the Barbarians? Why did you not then defend against them, that which was due to your services, both by Honorius his word and mine? Or why did you let them take away that which so legally belonged to you? Ab Madam, (return'd Constance, overwhelm'd with new grief at these words) can you with justice thus revile me? Or are you ignorant how I pass'd my life, whilst Heaven and Earth refused you their succours? No, Constance (added the Queen) I am not ignorant, and I know I cannot complain of you with reason; but you know likewise that you cannot accuse me; and whilst, if Heaven and Earth have refused me their succours, you were in no condition to give it, nothing hath defended me against my ill Fortune, but by the will of angry Heaven I have been captivated to that violence, which deprived you of Placidia. I know well (replid Constance) that it was violence put you in the power of our Enemies, and that it was not willingly that you were made the Captive of Autilph, but if the miserable Constance could have merited, that for the love of him you had defended your self a little longer from this fatal Marriage, by which he hath utterly lost you, there was yet perhaps time enough to divert it, and to have put a stop to the Fortune of the Goths, that they should not have been able to do you any farther violence. You may have understood (replid Placidia) what resistance I made to this Marriage, and the miseries which made me consent to it; they were without doubt strong enough to merit the approbation of Constance, as well as that of other men: but it is neither permitted me to recount, nor so much as remember those things which may but for some moments alter that affection, which I ought to preserve pure and entire to my Tomb; and the plaint which I have at other times been permitted to make is become criminal, by the change of my condition. In sum, Constance, whether guilty or only unhappy, yet I am the Wife of Autilph, and that may inform you that you see me in an estate which permits me not to see you, nor so much as think you: from the sight of you I hope to deliver my self by the assistance of Heaven, and by the care your self ought to have to preserve my reputation and repose, and for the remembrance of you, I have not perhaps so well defended my self, that it hath not hitherto contributed more than any thing else to the greatest misfortunes of my life, and opposed it self to that tranquillity, which my Duty would have establish'd in my mind: but I hope by the aids of Heaven, and those of my virtue, to reduce it to those terms it ought to be in, to permit me to live in an innocent estate: and it is for this reason, Constance, that I conjure you by all that you know most holy and most sacred, that you would contribute as much as you ought, if you truly love me, to my future quiet. You know, without my representing it to you, what I owe to another, and what I can do for you; and I dare well believe that you so well know my heart, as not to hope any thing beyond my Duty; and I believe as certainly that you desire it not, at least if our ill fortune hath not chang'd your inclinations: but this is not enough, Constance, for the honour and repose of Placidia; and since these are the appearances that will ruine it, we must not make the appearances more criminal than the intentions: Heaven is my witness, that it is with a violence no less intolerable than all others I have suffered, that I demand these marks of your affection; for you know that Honorius his word was the least that engag'd me to you, if my fortune had permitted me to follow my inclinations, as they were conformable to reason, I abandon'd my self to them with all cheerfulness: and as you were truly he of all men whom I have known most worthy of my affection and my esteem; 'twould have been with too much joy, that I should have prefer'd you before all men, and before the Empire of the whole World, if Heaven had permitted me the liberty; but in the end, Constance, I have it no more; and since it hath pleas'd Heaven to make me the Wife of Autilph, his you ought to let me be without combating the will of Heaven which gave me to him, or disputing with him a heart which he ought entirely to possess, without assaulting a virtue which I cannot offend without rendring my self unworthy of your esteem, or troubling with your presence, and that interview which cannot but produce dire effects, a repose which ought still truly to be dear to you, if you have ever truly loved me.

Whilst Placidia spoke in this manner, the desolate Constance beheld and hearkned to her, with a demeanour wholly passionate; but when he understood her last words, he found in them something so cruel, that he could not refrain from interrupting her; and casting on her a look full of all the marks both of grief and love: How, Madam! (said he) do you ordain me not to see you any more? Now that of all my hopes, there remains only the sight of you to me, and after having given that to another, which perhaps was only due to me, will you likewise deprive me of that which you give to all the World? But Madam, will you never see me more? No, Constance (replied the Queen) I will never see you more; and when this resolution shall cost me my life, I will rather resolve to lose it, than to see you again, I will yet permit you to believe (continued she, letting fall some tears that she could not refrain) at least, if this belief can give you any consolation, that I do not enjoyn this without feeling a grief perhaps little different from yours: But in short, when that grief shall guide me to my Tomb, I will employ willingly the rest of my life, such as it is, to maintain me in a duty, which ought not to be less dear than that, though it were as happy as I could desire it. Ah Madam, (said Constance, o'er-power'd with a mortal grief) *'tis not your life that my misfortune can mend; 'tis only to Constance, that the misfortunes of Constance can prove fatal: 'tis by this way certainly (for others seem too difficult) that you will be deliver'd from my sight for ever: and those orders of Heaven, cruel ones to me at this present, which permit me not to employ my own hand to give my self a death, cannot defend the receiving it from my grief: That without doubt will be sufficient without the succour of my Arm; and 'tis from my sorrow only I shall receive that, than which all humane power cannot give me more, after the loss of Placidia.*

The Queen was sensibly touch'd at these words of Constance, nor was she able to reply for some time, which she dedicated to a flood of tears, which stream'd freely down her fair checks. Constance beheld her in this estate, with the countenance of a despairing man; not knowing in the marks of her grief how he could find any consolation for his; but at length, in this incertitude, abandoning himself to those thoughts; Alas (cried he, on a sudden) all that I see then is for the happy Autalph, and death only rests to the miserable Constance. Death (said the Queen, forcing her self to speak) *is a debt all men must pay: but among men, who like you, know Heaven and the true Religion, 'tis in the hand of God, and not in their own disposition: I know well that it is little formidable to those, who like you daily brave it in perillous Adventures, and that for this reason you would easily receive it, though it should present it self in the most terrible shape: but know, Constance, that you have not the same liberty with other men, to abandon your self to death; and that you owe your life to the Glory of your Country, of which by the great qualities wherewith Heaven hath endow'd you, you remain the sole Defender (considering the weakness of Honorius) against those Barbarians, who ruine and desolate it on all sides: you owe it to the God you adore, and to the true Religion, persecuted by so many Nations, with a horrible cruelty: And (if I may add this last consideration) you owe it to that interest I may yet take in you without offending my virtue, and to that prayer which I make you, by all that affection that you have had for me, to preserve it till Heaven shall dispose of it. As this is the last request I shall make you in my life, so, Constance, I desire it may obtain its entire effect: and in the confidence that I have of it* (continued she, raising her self from her seat) and the knowledge I have of the fault I commit in continuing so long time a conversation which may expose us to great dangers, I bid you adieu, Constance; and I bid you adieu for ever.

Finishing these words, she withdrew her eyes from Constance, whom she could no longer look upon, in that condition her words had left him; and pulling down her vail to conceal that trouble which appear'd in hers, she departed from the Arbour with an ill assured pace, leaning upon the Arm of Virginia, who followed her with much trouble that she had left my Master in that pitiful condition wherewith she saw him.

They were scarce gone forth, when Constance not having the power to follow them, nor the assurance to do an action that might displease Placidia, let himself fall on one of the seats with all the marks of a fatal sorrow in his Face; abandoning himself to a grief so extraordinary, that I feared lest he should have expir'd in the Arbour. I ran thither so soon as I saw the Queen depart; and seeing in his eyes and in all his Actions the visible signs of despair, I was seiz'd with a mortal affright, and approaching to him, I assayed to put him into another humour by all those words which the passion I had for him could make me utter; but in stead of producing any effect, I could not draw one word from him; but he keeping his eyes fix'd on Heaven, guarded a silence which much more afflicted me than the greatest complaints he could have made: it was above an hour that he observ'd this posture, whatever I could say to oblige him to break it; and when he would speak, his sobs scarce left him the liberty to utter some interrupted words. With these and the sighs which maugre his constancy brake forth in multitudes from his breast, the tears stream'd from his eyes in abundance; so that I vow, in all things I ever saw him do, I never saw so much the courage of the invincible Constance overcome.

So soon as he could open his mouth, beholding me with a dying eye; Ab Valerius, (said he) I shall never see Placidia more; she hath pronounc'd me the cruel arrest, and she hath told me in express terms, that she will prefer death before any occasions to see me again. In sum, the sight of Constance is less supportable to her than that of death it self; and whilst she gives her self entirely to Autalph, she prizes death before the view of the miserable Constance. Just Heavens, (cry'd he a little alter, lifting up his eyes towards Heaven) will you defend me from dying in this extremity? Must the respect I owe to your holy places, and to the orders of Placidia, force me to the cruel necessity of leading so deplorable a life?

He stay'd a good while with this consideration, seeking the means to dispense with the orders of Heaven, and the will of Placidia; and as he had those commotions wherein his grief complacent to his desire seem'd to find what he demanded, yet he had others with which by his piety and the great respect he had for the Queen, he oppos'd all the hopes he could conceive. This thought sensibly redoubled his grief; and suffering himself to be transported to all it could inspire him with; Neither Heaven nor Placidia (said he) will that I should die; but in defending me from dying, they deprive me of the means to live: and Placidia her self hath too much inhumanity, to refuse her sight to uphold that life she hath ordain'd me to preserve. Ab Placidia (added he) if in the terms to which you have reduc'd me, you desire obedience from me, order me things possible; or rather, if you love the life of Autalph, as without doubt you do, force not the despairing Constance to preserve his. You know not what this despair may produce in a soul though naturally flexible and moderate; nor can Constance himself resolve you, whether the life of Autalph be secure from his despair: I know that all it can inspire me with in this extremity, will not render my condition more happy than it is; and I know you too well, to hope the return of my fortune by this means: but do you believe, that in the estate in which you have thrown me, my reason can predominate over all my resolutions, or that in the last violence of my grief I can preserve moderation and wisdom?

Thus he tormented himself; when Tiburtius, who entred into the Arbour a little time after the Queen was departed, endeavour'd with me by perswasions to cause him recal his spirit, when we were confirm'd in this design, by a person whom we did not expect; for when we least thought it, we might perceive Prince Wallia enter into the Arbour. We were surpriz'd at his Arrival; but Constance had been more, if in the extremities wherein we were, he had been capable of all the reflections he had made the day before, and had been still oblig'd to any caution for his interest in a time wherein hope had entirely abandon'd him,

The Gothick Prince, who had understood from Placidia and Virginia the condition wherein they had left my Master, found the confirmation of what they had told him, in his Face, observing in it the marks of so cruel a grief, that his soul could not but tenderly resent it; and so much the more, because he was not ignorant of all the effects, which a passion like that of Constance could produce in a misery like his. The thoughts which this sight inspired him with, hindered him presently from speaking, and he was contented to make himself seen by Constance, by all that he could practise of most civil and obliging, in the rencounter of two real Friends, whose friendship was not at all altered by the accidents of their lives, or by any judgment they could make of each others intentions. Constance returned his Caresses not only with those marks of true apprehension, which he had scarce testifi'd for any other thing, but with a vehemency which made the Prince know, that for a Friend less considerable he could less easily have acted that violence on himself.

In the end Wallia endeavour'd to testify the sense he had of his interests, when Constance preventing him; Wherefore, Prince (said he) do you come to seek an unfortunate Friend, whom all the World ought to flee, and who flees himself from you, not to concern you in the fortune of one so miserable? Is it possible that in the injuries I have receiv'd from yours, you can preserve your amity? Or do you regard me as a Friend, whose misfortunes deserve pity? Or as a person who for his hatred of Autalph, is unworthy of your friendship? Would to God, that without being accus'd to have merited it by his actions, he could find in it thoughts more agreeable to your actions, than to your particular nature; or that you came less to comfort me in my misery, misery, than to assure Aulalph, by the death of a despairing lover, against all those thoughts his despair might inspire him with against me.

These words increased the compassion that the Gothick Prince had for the infortunes of my Matter; and after he had manifested those marks in his countenance, which could not let us doubt it; I know not (said he) in what manner you will look upon the diligence I have taken to search for you, after I understood you were in Barcelona, nor what judgment you can make of the share I have taken in the misfortunes of your Country, and in your own particular: but I shall be extremely unhappy, if you can believe that any consideration hath wrought the least change, or the least alteration in a friendship, in which I judge to consist a good part of my fortune, and in which I desire to maintain my self in prejudice of any other interest, besides that of my honour and my duty. I know well that they cannot be offended with the intentions I have maintain'd for you; and though I doubt not but the desire to see Placidia, led you into this Country, and that I am not ignorant, that it is not permitted me to serve you, in designs which you may have either against the life or honour of Aulalph; I am so much perswaded of your virtue, that it is impossible for me to have any suspicion of it; and I believe that nothing can hinder me from serving you in those enterprises, which I may be permitted to dive into, or to lament with you those in which you will not employ me.

Alas, (replied the miserable Constance) your friendship is rather cruel than favourable to me; it would be more advantageous for me to find an enemy, who would by his officious cruelty pierce this unfortunate breast, than a generous and pitiful friend, whose assistances are as unprofitable to me, as his friendship is dear. In short, great Prince, you see me in a condition, which perhaps you would condemn, if you had never been sensible of that passion which causes all my misfortunes: and as I shall be most worthy of your compassion, and of that part you have preserved me in your friendship, having protested before Heaven, that I seek nothing more in this Country, than the sight of Placidia; so you will know the greatest of my misfortunes, when you shall understand that that innocent good, which only remains for the preservation of my life, is refused me for ever.

I knew it before you, (replied the Prince) and you may perhaps have understood that the Queen having told me her intention, would have obliged me to have declar'd it: God is my witness, I am as sensible of your grief, as I can be of my own; and I could spare a part of my blood to satisfy you in all things which are possible for me: but having protested to you this truth, will it be permitted me to represent to you other things, which you cannot be ignorant of, and to demand if you have not courage enough to support the absence of Placidia, since you must resolve to lose her person for ever? can it be to such a misfortune, and to such a spirit as yours, a consolation so great to see again Placidia, and to see her in the power of another? Or can you be satisfied to surfeit your eyes with a beauty, of which Aulalph is possessor? Or would you buy this light satisfaction at the price of the repose and reputation of Placidia, and possibly at greater danger both to you and her? Ah, Constance, bethink your self of what I say, and consider, the great loss you have had, is in the person, and not in the sight of Placidia; whom a great many reasons ought to hinder you from seeking, though she her self had not forbid it. Consider, generous Constance, who you are, and in what manner you lead your life, in seeking miserable occasions to behold a happiness which is no longer yours: You upon whom the whole world cast their eyes, as upon the greatest man of this age; consider the degree you hold among men, the glory you have purchas'd by so many great Victories, and the necessity which both the Eastern and Western Empires have of such a personage at Constance: you may if your grief oppose not your Fortune, easily mount to the highest Dignity in the world; nor will I lose my hope to see you seated in the Throne of the Cæsars. But, Constance, if you cannot overcome that love which I cannot condemn, at least employ your great courage to moderate your grief. Placidia desires no other consolation, and (it may be, if I may be permitted to say it) the consideration of your misfortune, renders her as equally unfortunate: I demand it therefore of you, for all the affection you bear her; and of the counsel I give you, I may be the less suspected; being exempted no less than you, from the same passion that causes your miseries.

In this manner spake Wallia, and to these words he added a great many others, the most pressing his affection could invent; and easily might he speak to a person, who answer'd him not but by sighs and sobs, and by all his actions made himself adjudged little capable of the comfort which he endeavour'd to give him: In the end, having hearkned as long as he could desire; I see (said he) that you are both very reasonable, and very well intend'd towards me; but I neither am in an estate to yield to reason nor the value I have for you, all that Empire they ought to have over me. However, I will perform one part of what you desire; and if I cannot promise you to comfort my self for a grief, which will without doubt endure so long as my ill fortune; I promise you at least, that it shall not produce any effect which may disspleas Placidia: That I will no more seek occasions to see her, nor cause any trouble to her repose, by any action of my life.

Whilst my Master spoke in this manner, and Prince Wallia found some satisfaction for Placidia in the promise he had made, but found little hopes to compose his spirit, we heard a great noise in the distant Alleys; and Prince Wallia being raised from the seat where he was set near Constance, advanc'd towards the door of the Arbour, and saw appear at the other end of the Alley King Autalph himself, followed by Sigeric, and a great number of persons ordinarily of his train. This sight struck the Prince with a mortal apprehension, not doubting but both the life of Constance and the repose of Placidia were in manifest danger; and if Constance in the despair to which he was reduced, feared not his life, yet he feared for Placidia, and felt a cruel redoublement of his grief for the trouble which this adventure might cause: however, that courage which had always made him invincible in his love, made him take a resolution to defend his liberty at the price of his life, and rather die by a thousand wounds, than fall alive into the hands of Autalph, and give Placidia the sorrow to see him subjected to the mercy of his enemy. He was already determin'd, when Wallia beholding him with an assur'd countenance, and taking him by the hand, I judge (said he) of your design; and if you must perish, I am resolv'd to perish with you: but because there are other ways to try before we come to extremities, permit me to essay them; nor shew your self except there be necessity.

At these words he went forth of the Arbour, and advanc'd towards the King, who came forward, and had already passed more than half the Alley: he had scarce fifty paces to make, when Wallia met him; and approaching to him, with a liberty which his proximity of blood and the Grandeur of his merit had particularly given him; Sir, (said he, very low) your Majesty will surprize me, with persons who will be much troubled, if such a misfortune besal them. And what are those persons (said Autalph) with whom you have so particular a converse? They are two men (replied the Prince) who have brought me news of those affairs, with which I entertained you last night; and having express order to conceal themselves from all persons of your Court, I beseech your Majesty to spare the displeasure I shall receive, if they are seen contrary to the design of those that sent them. The King laughing at this discourse of Wallia's; I am content (said he) to grant your desire, upon this condition, that this night you tell me all the secret: and at these words he turned about; and making a sign to all those that were with him to do the same, he walk'd towards the Fountain.

But the Prince Sigeric, hoping to find in this adventure something to contest with Wallia, of whose great reputation, and the respect the Goths gave him, he was envious; parting from the King, when he was at a little distance farther with two or three men that followed him, he returned towards the Arbour, with design to enter, and know the secret of Wallia; but this Prince re-entring, saw him come, and turning towards him, civilly accosted him, intreating him not to refuse him the same favour the King had granted him. Sigeric is the presumptive heir of the Crown of the Goths; and more advanc'd one degree than Wallia, who for this reason was oblig'd to a considerable respect for him, but Sigeric abusing it, The King (said he) received in earnest that prayer which you made him; and I should do the same, if I believed the occasion so important, to testify the consideration I have for you, but because I am not of that judgment, but perswaded that it is with some Ladies that you hold a particular correspondence, you cannot take it ill, if I endeavour to find out your familiarities: and in speaking these words, he would have advanc'd towards the Arbour; but Wallia stepping before him; When what you believe should be true, (said he) I should have no less interest to guard the secret of this adventure; and you cannot but your self approve that I should hinder you going into a place whither you are not conducted by any other reason, than that of displeasing me. Wallia pronounced these words with a great commotion of spirit. And Sigeric being a haughty and courageous Prince, beholding him with a sutable fierceness; I believe (said he) you do no longer remember what you owe me? I know that you are my Cousin. (replied Wallia) but I shall without doubt forget it, if you force me. You! (said Sigeric, taking hold of the guard of his Sword.) Yes, my self (replied Wallia, doing the same) and you know me sufficiently to believe me capable of a greater enterprize. He had scarce ended these words, but he saw Sigeric with his Sword in hand, and thereupon drawing his, he put himself in a posture to make him repent his curiosity.

But of the three men which followed Sigeric, one run to advertise the King, so soon as he saw the Princes begin to grow angry; and the other two, though they were of Sigeric's train, knowing the respect they ought to the birth and merit of Wallia, were contented to cast themselves between the two Princes to part them; yet they had had some difficulty difficulty to withhold them, they beginning to charge each other with a surpassing violence, when they heard the voice of the King, and saw him at the same time advance towards them at a great pace: his sight made them both retire and put up their swords, appearing before him not a little astonish'd. Autalpb blam'd them, and fiercely threaten'd them, for having lost the respect they ought him, by drawing their swords so near his person: but when he had heard the reasons of Wallia, he condemn'd the behaviour of Sigeric, and having sharply reprehended him, he commanded the two Princes to embrace; and having expressly order'd them to forget the remembrance of such petty differences, he bid Sigeric follow him, and leave Wallia to the liberty of preserving his secret.

Your Majesty may judge what trouble my Master was in, whilst these things pass'd, and with what impatience he suffer'd that Wallia should draw his Sword in his defence against a Prince of his blood, and a Prince that might be one day his King; he was ready several times to step forth, and himself decide the controversy with Sigeric, to divert his generous friend from an occasion which might prove prejudicial to him: and many times in this thought he advanced to the door of the Arbour, to throw himself into the Alley; but as many times the consideration of Placidia, whom Tiburtius and my self still minded him of, staid him; we representing to him, that he could not shew himself without losing her in the affection of the King her Husband and all the Goths, and putting Prince Wallia into greater danger than he could run by the encounter of Sigeric: and this made him moderate, though with a great deal of vexation, the heat which transported him to a design to hazard all things to assist Wallia, should he see him in any danger.

He thanked Heaven for the good success of this adventure, when he saw him return to us: and so soon as he was enter'd into the Arbour, embracing him with great marks of acknowledgments; Your generous behaviour doth not astonish, (said he) but confound me; and though I ought not to hope less from a soul noble like yours, yet I ought not to suffer that for my interest you should come to such terms, as you now did with a Prince of your own blood; and you may well judge that I had not suffered it without running a great part of the danger, if the fear to expose you to a greater, and making you suspected of an intelligence which Autalpb would difficultly have pardon'd, had not withheld me. The danger to which I exposed myself (replied the Prince) is not at all considerable, and though Sigeric may be my King, I hope before he comes to that dignity, he will have forgot this small difference. However, should he remember it, the fear I have of his disgust, shall never make me repent what I have done: and to tell you the truth, I am not at all sorry for an adventure, which may justify in your spirit the carriage of the Queen towards you, and make you understand that the occasions of seeing her cannot but be dangerous, in a Court where your countenance is known to all. Would to God (replied Constance) that it was only for my own sake, and that the desire I have to see Placidia, had nothing to combat with, but the love I have for my life; you should see which of the two should have most power over my spirit: but since that Placidia must bear a part in the mischiefs which I ought to fear, and that this adventure hath truly made me tremble for her, innocent as she is of my intentions, I will depart as she hath desired, and I will depart from a place where I leave all my joy, and where I leave my soul with Placidia. This is my resolution, since it must be so, and the Sun-rise shall not find me within the verge of Barcelona.

Though the Prince Wallia could not without a great deal of grief leave so soon a person for whom he had so great esteem and affection, yet he could not counsel him to make a longer stay in a Country which could not but be fatal to him, should he be known; he therefore dissimul'd not, telling him that he should be still in fear, both for him and for Placidia, so long as he stay'd at Barcelona.

They retir'd themselves soon after, for greater security, to the chamber of Tiburtius, where they pass'd the rest of the day, which Constance in part employ'd in listening to the adventures of Wallia, with the best attention his grief would permit; and in part, in recommending to him Placidia, and demanding for her the continuation of that faithful friendship which he had ever testified. Wallia protest'd he would serve her in prejudice of all other interests: and for him, if he could hear news of him at a time when the engagement of his soul would leave him at liberty, he would go about the world to seek him, and demand the continuation of his friendship. The night was not able to separate them; and Wallia would have pass'd it away with him in Tiburtius his chamber: but Constance, who feared to render him suspected to Autalpb, if he should chance one day to come to the knowledge of the journey he had made to Barcelona, would that he should go that night, and relate to him the discourse he had made to conceal the truth. Wallia made him the most obliging offers in the world, and would himself have accompanied him out of the Lands, under the obedience of the Goths, and farther, if he would consent: but Con- stance would not suffer him; and in fine, they bid each other adieu, with all the demonstration of a tender amity.

That night I caused the horses to come from Barcelona: and to shorten the discourse, an hour before day we parted from the Religious House; but in bidding adieu to Tiburtius, with great marks of acknowledgements and affection, (for he refused, for the poverty he had embraced, all the presents which my Master would have made him) he charged him with a Letter to the Queen, which he promised him to give to Virginia, and of which the words were these, or little different.

The Infortunate Constance, to the Queen Placidia.

Since it is no more permitted me to see you, nor so much as to desire it, for fear of exposing you to those displeasures, of which I shall be more sensible than of my present misfortunes: I depart, Madam, as you have desired; and to tell you all my misery at once, I part never to see you more. Receive then, if you please, this last adieu without reluctance, not of a heart that can ever abandon you, but of the vain and unfortunate shadow of the miserable Constance, which I go to wander with about the world, till the last hour of my life. This remaining with you, cannot at all trouble your repose, nor the Fortune of Autalph; for as you have been still more dear to him than himself, he cannot complain of his condition, so long as yours is happy. Would to God I could contribute to your felicity by something of greater value than the life you leave me, and that with all those miseries which must needs accompany me to my end, I might likewise support all those which might trouble the happiness of yours. Adieu, Madam, since Heaven will have it so, to yours and my ill fortune. If the remembrance of the unhappy Constance return sometimes into your mind, suffer it without resistance, if it be possible, or at least remember, that if he hath adored you as long as he hop'd, he was no less faithful after the loss of his hopes.

Thus we left Barcelona; but my Master could not refrain from turning his eyes again towards it, by a thousand sighs testifying the sorrow he had to depart thence. I will not become tedious, by giving you a particular recital of his griefs during our journey, since besides that a good part of my discourse is filled with them, it will be hard for me to remember them. I believ'd at first that we should have taken the way to Rome; and had some hope, that by meeting with his friends, the mind of Constance might be compos'd, and he lose in time and by his reason a part of that grief which was become the entire Mistress of his heart; but I perceiv'd in few days that all my hopes were in vain, nor was I ever so astonish'd as I was when my Master told me his design never to return either to his Country, or the society of men, commanding me to return to Rome with those great advantages which he offer'd me for an honourable departure, and testifying to me the sorrow he had for the sad time I had spent in his service. You may well judge, Mighty Sir, that I accepted not his offers, nor shewed any disposition to obey this cruel command; but having bewail'd his rigorous misfortunes, I easily resolv'd to accompany him to his end.

We wandred then without any other design than to weary a misery still alive, and a grief, which instead of being sweetned by time, gained every day new force; we visited the greatest part of the Provinces of Spain, where my Master understood without pretending any interest, that Gunderic had made himself Master of Hissania Bethica; not that he felt not some confusion at the disorders of the Empire, but all was cancelled when he thought of the loss of Placidia. Being arrived at the Metropolis of Lustrania, he would carry upon the Seas that passion which had so cruelly turmoyl'd him a shore; and being embark'd, we were tossed several months upon the Ocean without any accident in our whole Voyage; but the passing away of our time was still equally unfortunate; we saw Great Britain, once named Albion, and Ireland an adjacent Island; and having passed the Straits which separate it from Gallia Belgica, we sail'd into the German Ocean, where my Master finding himself as much tired with the Sea, as he had been on the Land, we went ashore in the Country of the Danes, which we visited, with many other Provinces, of which I shall make no mention, not judging it necessary in the conclusion of my Discourse.

'Twas in our approach to this place that we met with the Prince Varanes; nor will I recount the particularities of this rencounter, because you will understand it with more pleasant stories in the adventures of that Prince, which *Mitrane*s is engag'd to relate to you so soon as you desire it. There passed somewhat between them very extraordinary; and and by the knowledge they mutually had of each others merit, they link'd themselves in inviolable amity, and pass'd several days together with greater satisfaction than either the one or the other did for some time past hope for. There was some appearance that they would not soon have parted; but if the Prince of the Persians was called from hence by some design to me unknown, my Master hath stay'd here much less invited by his wounds, than by the charms of your person, and by the complacence he thought due to your civility, and the good treatment you have made him.

See here, Mighty Sir, the Relation which I had order to make you of the life of Constance! Just to his last years, Fortune was favourable to him, without failing him in any occasion; but by one only effect of her inconstancy, she reversed all his happiness; though she could not despoil him of that glory which will endure till the last Ages: so that it may be still said, this is the same Constance who hath vanquish'd so many Kings, and so many Nations; but that crown'd with Laurels, and in the midst of his Trophies, is become the most unfortunate of all men, by a passion which renders unprofitable all those advantages in which perhaps another would find his Consolations.

In this manner Valerius finish'd his Discourse of the life of Constance; and Pharamond, who had hearkn'd to the first events with admiration, and the last with compassion, was in the end touch'd in such a nature for the misfortunes of so great a man, that he could not refrain from shewing all the signs that might testify it: and having remained some time without speaking;

In truth (said he to Valerius) you have recounted me great things, and too much concern'd me in the Fortunes of the great Constance, by the knowledge you have given me of his excellent virtues, to leave me now in that trouble of mind into which you have thrown me by the recital of his last adventures: I shall esteem my self too happy, if so considerable a person should find any consolation among us; nor would I spare my blood to seek the means to afford it. Valerius thank'd Pharamond on the behalf of his Master, for the share he took in his Interests; and the Prince, having sent to know news of him, and understanding that he no longer slept, resolv'd himself to go into his Chamber there to testify to himself how much he was enamour'd of his Virtues, and sensible of his misfortunes.

The end of the First Part of

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

The Second Part.

BOOK I.

PHARAMOND could not receive these particulars of the Life of the Heroick Constance, without being induced to a greater esteem of him than that Fame which was blaz'd about the World of his great Actions could make him conceive; nor understand the deplorable estate into which he was now reduced, without rendering him that resentment of his Misfortunes which a soul noble like his, could not refuse to unfortunate virtue. He could not refrain, so soon as he saw him, from testifying his thoughts, his admiration of those things he had heard, and his grief for the sad conclusion of his Adventures: And he did both the one and the other with so good a grace, that the Illustrious Roman, who was equally modest and obliging, was constrained to receive those praises he gave him, against his natural inclination to reject them, being so much touch'd with the interest he saw him claim in his misery, that he seem'd to forget the first: the better to shew himself sensible of these marks of his Generosity, he labour'd to testify his acknowledgments with all those words which so great obligations could instruct him with; when the valiant King of the Franks, interrupting him with a behaviour full of sweetness: Cease, Noble Sir (said he) to pay me Thanks for that which all the World owes you, and which no man would refuse to render you, if they understood as well as I the miracles of your life. Your self in the recital which you desire of the sad Chances of mine, will have as great occasion to lend me what I now pay to you, as to the subject of compassion, though not of admiration: for I cannot be induc'd to believe, that the mean actions of a Prince born and educated among those people, whom you it may be, with justice term Barbarians, can enter into any consideration with a man in whom the fortune of the Empire, and that of the whole World, hath and ought still to repose. This I dare averr, that the misfortunes of my life have something in them so strange, and so much above all examples in the ordinary course of humane things, that there are not perhaps any miseries in the World that may compare with mine, or better deserve astonishment and compassion together. "Permit me "to tell you (replid Constance) that you are it may be equally unjust in both parts of your

"Discourse: for as I am not so ignorant of those of your actions which have shone with "much splendour through the World, as to believe what I have done can merit the half of "those praises that you are pleas'd to give them; so I will believe, and believe with satisf-

"faction to the interest I take, that your misfortunes, though they may possibly have

"something of more strange than mine, and more different from the common Adventures

"of the World, yet are without doubt, less great than mine, since they are not accompa"nied with despair, nor you despoyl'd like me of the last good which waits on miserable

"persons to the end. For in brief, though it be very ordinary to lose what we love, either

"by death, or a fatal Wedlock; 'tis certain however, that in the most prodigious events,

"there can be nothing more cruel; and therefore though your Fortunes may have some"thing more uncouth than mine, yet they can have nothing more deplorable.

Pharamond was about to reply, and they had perhaps discoursed longer of this matter, if the Princes Sumon, Ibere, Merouée and Genebaud (whose wounds could not oblige him longer to keep his bed) had not entred the Chamber, upon knowledge given them that they might visit Constance without any disturbance. The King of the Franks, and the four Princes, din'd with him; and immediately after the repast, Charamont, Cleomer, Antenor, Adelard, Dagobert, and many other considerable Officers of the Army, came to visit him. Constance receiv'd them all with a sweetness and civility most natural to himself, and which his discontents could not alter; but seeing with them the person whom Pharamond had charg'd to recite to him his Adventures, and whom Antenor presented to him; that cruel grief which tormented him could not defend him against the desire he had to instruct himself in a Fortune in which he was so highly concern'd; besides that he found this employment more conformable to the estate of his mind, than a conversation with a number of great Personages, especially in a time when he was not in a condition to discourse any thing grateful to their attention. To this effect, addressing himself to Cleomer, whom he had receiv'd in a particular obliging manner; I know not (said he) if a person that is not at all known by you, may abuse that liberty you are pleas'd to indulge; but since it is from you, I must learn the Adventures of the King of the Franks, you are in danger to be solicited by one who perhaps would have had less impatience in other things. "My Lord (replied Cleomer) with an excellent grace, I shall acquit my self of the Order which the King hath given me, when ever you shall please to command me; and as there are few persons in the World that have more knowledge of the things which you seem willing to understand, so there is none that with a more ready diligence will give you the satisfaction you desire. Constance returned him thanks in terms full of civility, having both been inform'd by Antenor, and knowing by several marks, that he was of no common Rank.

Pharamond, who perceiv'd his desires, was willing, out of complacency to them, to define the rest of that day to other Affairs, and leave him the liberty to satiate himself; and after having told him that what he was about to understand from the mouth of Cleomer, though very strange and hard to be believ'd, yet were little considerable in comparison of those which Valerius had recounted to him, he departed out of the Chamber, all the rest following him save only Cleomer. 'Twas not without reason that Constance had taken Cleomer to be a man worthy consideration; for besides his being of one of the most Illustrious Houses of Franconia, and Son of Diocles, who was one of the chiefest and greatest Personages in the Realm; and had one of the highest employments in the Army of Pharamond; he was a man of excellent feature and noble spirit, and in whom both mind and body were accompani'd with an infinite strength and courage, and many other excellent virtues, which with a great deal of reason made him merit the particular confidence of his Prince. Constance knew in a little time a part of these Truths, and by the observation which he made of him, augmenting his estimation of him, made many excuses for the trouble to which he had engag'd him. Cleomer heard his Discourse with a becoming respect, and not being ignorant in any of that knowledge which the practice of the World must give to a person Nobly born, and diligently educated, he return'd an Answer to the Generous behaviour of Constance, with all the marks of a low submission; and being seated near his bed, after he had some few minutes bethought himself of the Discourse which he was to make, he soon after began the following Relation.

The History of PHARAMOND.

Those who have known Fortune either by the general opinion, or by the proper experiences, or contentions which they have had with her, do all as it were agree with one consent, that she is the enemy of Virtue; and that if by the effects or her ordinary inconstancy, she hath sometimes ill treated men of little valour or consideration, she hath alwayes assaulted, and with a particular obstinacy persecuted virtuous Personages: not that virtue hath not sometimes triumph'd over her, or hath not (if one may so say) defeated her in those things, where the success hath not been absolutely dependent upon her Empire, but that in all those where she could act with all her ordinary power, she hath oppos'd her with her most grievous and most weighty Tyranny; and though she could not ruine her, yet she arm'd all her Forces against her, and has eternally combated her. Certainly if she were a Goddess, whom great and Heroick qualities could render favourable to merit, or whom miseries could make sensible of pity, either the deserts of Pharamond would gain her, or his misfortunes bend her: but it is upon him, more than upon the rest of men, that she hath thrown the most dire effects of her cruelty. Ah, my Lord, to what enterprize enterprize have you engag'd me, both by the obedience which I owe to my Prince, and by the purpose I have to satisfy your desires ! How shall I instruct you, in those grand events I am to recount to you, though I have assist'd in them all ! How will it be possible for me to represent to you the tender thoughts of a soul, against whom the most violent passions have cruelly made War, and which cannot be declar'd by any other tongue, than by that to which the heart thatresents them, furnishes words capable to express them ! Yet I shall, my Lord, do as much as my ability and the sad concernment I take in my Masters misfortunes will permit me, and acquit my self at least of the charge he hath given me, with the greatest exactness and truth possible.

Before I speak to you of the Birth and Actions of my Prince, I am oblig'd, Great Sir, to tell you somewhat of his Original : as well to let you know those Truths; which the Errour of many people hath rendred doubtful to many Nations, as to justify to you the right which our Princes have o'er the Gauls, and make you see that it was not only desire of Glory, or that of aggrandizing their Dominions, which made them with their Arms in their hands encounter that puissance, which was Mistress of the World. Those who would draw our Original from Germany, and persuade the people that it is from Franconia, that the Francks, Francons or French-men took their name, are not at all instructed in the truth: for it is certain, that we are not only descended from the Gauls, but that the Family of our Kings is the same that for sixteen Ages govern'd the fairest part of Gallia. Those who are the most understanding in Genealogies, fetch their Original from the blood of the gods; and before the time of Hercules, find the Gauls among those that descended from Drius, the Samthes, and the first Kings whose names have been known to men. But however that be, 'tis a general belief establish'd among us, that Franconus Son of Heñor, saved by his Uncle Helenus at the Destruction of Troy, and conducted by Fortune among the Gauls, espoused the Daughter of King Rhemus: yet this opinion is contested against by many Nations, who affirm that the Sons of Heñor perish'd in the ruins of that City: but besides many other proofs we have, most certain it is, that the Trojan names have been preserved in this Royal Family almost without any discontinuance, and that a great part of our Princes have born the names of Priamus, Helenus, Antenor, and many others, which have not been known, but in the Family of the Ancient Trojan Kings.

In sum, whether Franconus came from Troy, or whether he was born among the Gauls, 'tis certain that from him and from the Daughter of Rhemus issued that long Race of Kings, which have commanded over the Gauls, over the Sicambres, and over the Franks: They had Reign'd many years among the Gauls, when the people not finding convenience to live in their own Country, by reason of the strange multitudes of people which inhabited it, seeking new Dwellings in many parts of the World, under their Princes Sigovese, Belivese, Brennus, and Belgius, made all Europe and a great part of Asia tremble. You have understood that which Brennus did at Rome; nor are I believe ignorant of the passage of the other Brennus into Asia, and of his being lost with his whole Army, near the Temple of Delphos. Others more fortunate seated themselves near the Palus Maotis, and from thence passed some time after into Germany, where they possessed themselves of a vast extent of Land, which from the name of one of their Princes, and from a City which they built, they called Sicambria, and made the name of the Sicambres known and feared by all Neighbouring Nations.

After a long time Reign'd over these Provinces, one of their Kings, named Marcomie, and whose name without doubt hath been more known than any of his Predecessor's, spurred forward by his great courage, and encouraged by the Oracles, and by a Vision of which the whole World hath talk'd, promising to his Posterity the rule over a great part of the World, raised a most powerful Army; and passing the Rhine with those Forces which nothing could stop, re-seated himself in the Heritage of his Fathers, and made himself Master of Gallia-Belgica, and of a good part of the Celtica. 'Twas within the Belgica that he establish'd the Seat of his Monarchy; and after his Death his Successours Reign'd without discontinuance, until Franconus the Son of Anthere, one of his Successours, who Reign'd four Ages after him, in the time that Tiberius rul'd the Roman Empire. 'Twas this second Franconus who so well instructed his people in Discipline and Military Vertues, and repair'd by his Valour those Losses which his Country had suffered by the power of the Romans, who some years before under the conduct of Julius Caesar, had made themselves Masters of the greatest part of Gallia: he armed himself, and fought valiantly for Liberty; and after many memorable Victories, which he gain'd with infinite Glory, broke the yoke which they had impos'd upon his Nation, and chased away all his Enemies with a success, which established him a glorious and potent Monarchy. His great and Heroick Actions made him considerable throughout the whole World and his name was so dear to his people, that they caused it to pass among them and their Posterity, and quitted the name of Sicambres, to take that of Franks. 'Twas then from the name of Francus, that they were called after that time; joyning with the name of their King, whom they had in so great veneration, that of Liberty, which had given them the name of Frank, or Franchise, and bore the same signification among them, as Freedom and Liberty did among the Romans,

After the death of Francus, his Son Clodius Reign'd over the Franks; and after Clodius, Sumon, Herimer, Antenor, and a great number of others, who succeeded from Father to Son, until Clodomire the Third of that name, who Reign'd in Gallia Belgica, sometime before the Reign of the Great Constantine. 'Twas to this Clodomire, that the Turingiens, oppressed by their Neighbours, sent to demand assistance; offering to put themselves under his Government, if he would deliver them from the oppression of their Enemies. Clodomire, either to succour his Allies, or to make his own advantage of the offer they made him, sent the Prince Genebaud his Brother, whom he caused to pass the Rhine with an Army of forty thousand men, with which he not only deliver'd the Turingiens from the cruel War they had with their Neighbours, but having in many Battles overcome their Enemies, he entered their Lands, and easily made himself Master of them: And seeing that not only the Turingiens were content to become his Subjects, but that many other people submitted willingly to his Empire, he resolv'd to establish himself in those large Champain Countries which are encompassed by the Rhine, the Elbe and the Ocean; and lay the foundation of a Monarchy, which from his Franks he called Franconia, and which in respect to the other, many have called the Oriental France.

The manner how the Franks establish'd themselves in that part of Germany, which is the same where we at present are, was admirable. And King Clodomire having sent them their Wives and Children, and all things necessary for persons going to inhabit a strange Country; they built Cities, tilled the Earth, and lived with as much ease and freedom, as if they had been born among those people. And some time after, Genebaud, either by the gentle treating of his Subjects, or by the terrour of his Arms, having rendred himself Master of the Countries of the Cauches, of the Bruçieres, the Tençieres, the Marfes, the Angrivariens, and many other Provinces, he left to his Successors a Kingdom little inferiour to that of his Brother. Dagobert his Son succeeded him; to Dagobert, Clodion; and to Clodion; Marcomire, the Father of our Prince Pharamond; under whom, as well as under his Predecessors, the limits of Franconia were extended from the Rhine to the Ocean, to the Sueves, and to the Marcomans: so that he possessed a Country composed of a great number of Provinces, and which without doubt is not the least considerable of Europe.

Such is the Birth of Pharamond, to whom without doubt few can compare, either for Antiquity or Nobleness of Blood, since without going to seek his Original from Samobes, nor yet from the Son of Hector, most certain it is, that from the first Marcomire which passed the Rhine with the Sicambres, he is the four and fortieth King descended from Father to Son, from his Illustrious House. Most true it is, that Prince Genebaud and his Successors, until the time of Marcomire, Father of my Prince, left the Title of King to their Cousin, who reigned in Gallia Belgica, contenting themselves with that of Princes or Dukes of Franconia. But after the Reign of Rithimer, Son of Clodomire, and that of Theodomin, Clodion and Marcomire, who reigned successively in the Occidental France, that Royal House being extinct many years before the Birth of Pharamond, in the person of Marcomire the last of his Kindred, the Royal Dignity descended to Marcomire, Duke of Franconia: Though after the death of that Marcomire, who was oppressed by the Emperour Valentinian, those Territories which he and his Ancestors had possessed among the Gauls, were now reduc'd under the Dominions of the Romans. You are not ignorant, without doubt, how that whilst the two Marcomires reign'd, the one in Gallia Belgica, the other in Franconia, the Emperour Valentinian (to whom the power of these two Princes (who did not at all acknowledge his Empire, as the others who were seated amongst the Gauls and Germans did) was much less tolerable than that of the other Monarchs of Europe) having received several losses in the enterprizes made against them, finding in the end the means to embroil Marcomire, the Father of Pharamond, in a War against his Neighbours, seeing him in such a condition, that he could not assist his Cousin, he invaded Gallia-Belgica with the whole force of the Empire, and defeated Marcomire in a great Battle; in which himself with his whole Army was cut off, and by his death, his Country left a prey to his Enemies, though he left the right of Succession to the other Marcomire and to his Son Pharamond, who is the Legitimate Heir, and hath no less right in the Occidental France, which the Romans have usurp'd, than

In the Oriental, of which he is at present possessed. So that you see that even at his birth, honour put Arms in his hands, both to revenge the loss of his Cousins, and to recover the Kingdom of his Ancestors: and I doubt not but the Romans will put a notable difference between their just pretensions, and the intentions of so many barbarous people, which have overflowed the Lands of the Empire, for so many years past.

By the death of Marcomire, King of the Occidental France, and the loss of his Territories, Marcomire Prince of Franconia, descended from his blood, and his legitimate Heir, look'd upon himself equally oblig'd to the revenge of his friends, and to the recovery of a Crown which appertain'd to him: He therefore immediately took upon him the title of King of the Franks; and having in several battles maintain'd the War against his Neighbours, and found the means to make with them an advantageous peace, he turn'd all his thoughts against the Romans, and prepar'd himself to pass the Rhine, and enter the Territories of the Gauls with considerable Forces: But his ill Fortune so order'd it that he found to oppose him the great Theodosius, who succeeded to Valentinian, and who endeavour'd to hinder his design with so much valour, and with a Force so much above that of Marcomire, that it was not only impossible for him to pass the Rhine, but to sustain the War which this great Emperour brought on all sides into his Country; and after many Combats wherein Fortune was various, but by the which he was extremely weaken'd, he was constrain'd to make peace with the Emperour, and confine himself within the limits of Franconia, which he left free to him, and with which his small power made him rest contented, though he incessantly aspired at the recovering of his lost Kingdom; and attending only a fairer occasion to renew the War, still bore the name of the King of the Franks. He had then been but a small time married; but some years after, the gods gave him part of that consolation which was necessary for him, by the birth of Pharamond.

'Twas then of the great Marcomire, a Prince of glorious memory amongst us, and considerable to all Europe for his Royal Virtues, that Prince Pharamond was born in Peapolis a fair City seated upon the Banks of the Meine, and Metropolis of Franconia: and in the same place, successively after him, were born the Princes Marcomire and Sumnon his Brothers; and after them, the Princess Polixena his Sister, a Princess in whom all Virtues are accompanied with an admirable beauty, A little time after her Birth, her Mother yielded to Fate, and this Noble Offspring was left under the conduct of their Father, who employed for their Education all the diligence which could be expected from his affection, and their virtuous inclinations. 'Tis most true, that he found them such as he could desire; and possibly for advantages both of body and mind, there never issued so many excellent persons from one Family: you have seen what the three Princes are; and had you seen the Princess, you would perhaps agree with me, that few persons in the world can with justice be compar'd to her.

For the education of such children, Marcomire disdain'd those of our own Nation, and therefore he call'd from amongst the Romans, and from amongst the Greeks, persons that were the most capable, as well for the Sciences, and the knowledge of Languages, as for the exercises of the body: And he saw at the very beginning so fair effects of his diligence, that he conceiv'd the most noble hopes that his affections could flatter him with, particularly in the person of Pharamond, in whom he believed to behold an abridgement of all that could be conceiv'd most great, and most amiable.

He was scarce yet eight years old, when an extraordinary woman, and of whom wonders have been published, pass'd through Franconia to go into Gallia, where she is reported to be since retir'd: She was vulgarly called Altornua, but others have nam'd her Melusina; and because with the knowledge of all Sciences she had likewise the gift to foretel things to come, as she had prov'd by many experiences, all the world ran to consult with her, and receiv'd her answers as infallible Oracles. Our Prince, whose paternal love employed as 'twere all his thoughts, though little infected with any sort of Superstition, yet would see this marvellous woman, and hear from her the destiny of his children. Altornua saw the King, and the three little Princes which he led with him, in a solitary house, where she pass'd some days; but though she possibly beheld in each of them somewhat to fix her thoughts, she address'd her self only to Pharamond; and after having a while beheld him more heedfully than she us'd to behold other persons; Oh Infant! dear to Heaven (she cry'd) how Noble is thy Destiny? And how much more happy would be thy Fate, if thy heart were insensible? What glory will crown thy days? And what miseries shall persecute thy fair life? She stopp'd at these words, to behold him more earnestly than before; and a short time after breaking silence, with a behaviour somewhat transported, Go, young Lion (continued she) go combat the Eagle which usurps thy Royalties; Pass the Rhine, Re- venge the blood of thine, and re-enter into the inheritance of thy Fathers, the Earth shall tremble under the feet of thy Soldiers; Glory and Victory shall every where accompany thee, and thy posterity shall reign even to the last Ages over the fairest part of the world. What Posterity (added she soon after, with a tone somewhat extraordinary) what Kings, what Princes shall there be among thy Nephews, and among thy Successors? What glory to the Country of my birth? What glory to the Rivers of Seine, the Loire and Garonne? And what glory to the Ocean it self, which from the Banks of the Rhine to its very bosom, shall see all the people submit themselves to thy Empire? Ending these words, she seem'd as if she would have spoken more, if she had not been hindred by some unknown power which tyed her tongue. In short, she said no more at least in publick, though many persons believ'd that she told many particulars in secret to the King, which never yet came to our knowledge. Few days after, she quitted our Country, and retir'd, as was reported, among the Gauls: but her words made such an impressiion in the spirit of Marcomire, that all his pretensions for the recovery of the Crown, lost by his Family, were strongly rekindled in his breast; and he sigh'd for grief that he was not at present in a condition to execute his generous purpose, at least he doubted not but that glory was reserv'd for a Son, to whom so great things were promis'd: and these thoughts made him regard him with more esteem than before, and with greater hopes than he had ere that conceiv'd. And this young Prince himself, near whom I had the honour to be educated, and who was pleas'd to prefer me in his affection before any youth of my degree or age, had his spirit naturally carried to great things, and found those motions in his heart which did incline him to actions above what he could hitherto propose himself: and as he was not so young, but that he had heard speak of the pretensions of his Father, and had understood a great part of it, he began to bethink himself beyond what his age would permit, what he ought to do to answer worthily those expectations which were had of him.

Marcomire's hopes were extremely fortified after the death of the great Theodosius, seeing the Empire in the hands of his children, who were much inferiour to him in all things; and the Government of the Empire in the power of Ruffinus in the East, and of Stilicon in the West. He believ'd that either through the instances of the Emperours, or the ambition of their Governours, the affairs of the Empire would be reduc'd into such a condition as would give him liberty to enterprize any thing; and with these thoughts expecting a fair opportunity, he resolv'd to attend the years of Pharamond, upon which he grounded his entire hopes: he therefore educated him in such sort, that it might be judg'd by all appearances his chief aim was to make him a most Heroick personage: and to second those marvellous advantages which he had receiv'd from nature, with all those helps education could give him; he began with great transportation of spirit, to observe the admirable effects of an excellent nurture in an excellent nature. But though he had delight at the beginning, he enjoyed not what he propos'd to himself would follow; for in the fairest of his hopes, a cruel sickness, against which all remedies prov'd in vain, took him from among men, before Pharamond arriv'd at sixteen years of age: His youth did not at all hinder him from being sensible of the loss of such a Father; but in that age he demonstrated by the marks of his grief the Idea of his good Inclinations.

Marcomire before his death, left the administration of State affairs to the care of Dagobert and Genebaud, Princes of his Illustrious Blood; and the conduct of young Pharamond to the famous Basogastus, whose rare virtues had purchas'd him a great reputation amongst men: Marcomire and Sunnon were committed to the care of my Father Dioeles, who was appointed their Governour; and the Princess Polixena to that of the virtuous Theodomira, wife to Prism, a Prince of the Blood-royal, nearest to the Crown after Dagobert and Genebaud, and Father to the valiant Genebaud who shared with Marcomire the honour of combating you and your Illustrious Companion.

The sage Basogaste, who had the super-intendency over the young King, placed several virtuous persons near him; and amongst the most remarkable, Charamont, who both for his birth and merit, worthily held the chief degree. Nor did this Illustrious Governour forget any thing that might conduce to so important an education. But not to hold you over-long in the recital of things of small consequence, his design so well prosper'd, that he did not only render the young Prince such as Marcomire could have desir'd him, but much beyond what either he could hope, or any that had an interest in him could expect. I shall speak nothing of the person of Pharamond: you have seen him enough already to observe, that for a noble aspect, excellency of carriage, and Royal Majesty, perhaps no man in the world surpasses him. You may have likewise observ'd in that conversation you have had with him, that he is truly and wholly charming, as well for the vivacity and
delicateness

delicateness of his spirit, accompanied with a perfect knowledge of all Sciences, as for a sweetness which is wholly particular to him, and a complacency, which without having any thing of baseness or flattery, gives those that discourse with him that satisfaction which they could not find in any but his converse. The same sweetness accompanies him in all the actions of his life; though perhaps where fierceness is necessary, you have never seen a man more fierce than he. All his inclinations are in such manner fix'd upon virtue, that no consideration nor passion can disturb him; and in those extremities into which his ill fortune hath cast him, he hath never let pass any occasion to do good, though embrac'd at the peril of his life, and all that he could think most precious. His clemency, whether towards Enemies he had vanquish'd, or towards those from whom he had receiv'd any particular injury, can never be parallel'd: and one may truly in some manner speak of him, that he never tasted that pleasure, which so many other persons propose to themselves in revenge. His liberality is beyond what I can speak: so magnificent is he, and so excessive in his presents, that if his friends, and those that live near him, had not had more care to maintain his Grandeur and Dignity, he had often thrown himself into extreme poverty to enrich them. His word is inviolable, as well in the least things, as in those of greatest importance; and some have affirm'd that it was not without a mystery, that at his birth they impos'd him a name, which in the German tongue signifies the Mouth of Truth. His modesty will not suffer the most lawful praises: and he is adorn'd with an equity so exact in all things, that he cannot suffer the least effect of injustice. Neither prosperities heighten him, nor misfortunes abase him: And as there is nothing more modest, nor moderate than he in good success, so we may affirm that his spirit never seems greater than in the greatest misfortunes. 'Tis then that his courage is admirable; and I would say he were invincible, could he better have resisted love, and its dire effects, which hath caus'd all the miseries of his life, and embroyl'd the fair course of it, with those horrible disasters into which it hath precipitated them. He is naturally very jovial, but without excess or any transportation of mind, except his ill fortunes have chang'd his humour: yet in this melancholy, which for some time past hath possess'd him, those who converse with him find something more charming, and more agreeable, than in the conversation of the most esteem'd persons. To those excellent qualities of his soul, which I know not well how to describe to you, is joyn'd an unparallel'd strength of body, a force almost more than natural, which is in him so much the more wonderful, because both his colour, and the whole composure of his person, would make him rather judg'd of a delicate, than strong complexion. But in short, few men suffer all sorts of travel better than he; and scarce is there any can better endure the first shock in a combat. At all exercises of the body, all the most expert Masters will confess their ignorance in respect to him: And as there is none manages a Horse with more address than he, passes a Carriere with so much vigour, or breaks a Lance with so much grace; so there are none at all that combate on foot, or so dexterously handles all sorts of Arms as he; nor who (if I may be permitted to speak of Exercises of Peace, after having made mention of those of War) dances more becomingly than he, plays better on all sorts of instruments practis'd both amongst the Greeks and Romans; or accompanies better all these graces, by the advantages he hath in Painting and Musick. His actions have so sufficiently blazon'd forth the knowledge he hath in the mystery of war, that I need not mention it to you: but perhaps you will find enough in the Discourse which I have to make you, to judge him not inferior to the most ancient Captains. In sum, I shall end, by saying (for it may be I have already said too much for your patience, though not too much of truth) that my Prince had been the most accomplish'd personage, and perhaps the most admired of men, if he had better defended himself against love; and if with his other great qualities, he had been less sensible of this cruel passion, which renders him the most unfortunate of men.

Pharamond became what I have endeavour'd to describe you, by the diligence of Basilagus, and the Princes his Brothers, in whose persons Nature had plac'd most noble advantages of Nature, made no less progress under the conduct of my Father; so that the whole world judg'd they would prove worthy Brothers of so transcendent a Prince. So long as the Kingdom was govern'd by Dagobert and Genebaud, who having joyn'd to the interest of that Blood from whence they were descended, the confidence the dead King had plac'd in them, acquitted gloriously their trust, maintaining Peace and Justice in the Provinces with an infinite prudence, and defending themselves from the enterprizes of their neighbours with no less valour. The knowledge they had of the Intentions of the King Meremire to invade the Gauls, and the observations they every day took of the ardent desire of the young Prince to labour the revenge of his Friends, and recovery of his

Crown, made them endeavour to gain Friends to assist him in this design, when he should be of age to undertake it: they made secret Alliances with the neighbouring Princes to engage them to his interest, fortified all places of Franconia, with all things necessary to sustain a long war, and had perhaps done more, had not death cut off both the one and the other at the same time that the Prince entered into his seventeenth year. They left each of them one Son: Ibere remained to Dagobert, and Merouée to Geneband, Princes both considerable, not only for their Illustrious Extraction, but for their admirable valour, and a thousand excellent virtues which accompanied it.

After the death of these two Regents, whose memory is famous among the Franks, the young King took the Reigns of his Monarchy into his own hands, and by the counsels of Prizm and Basogastus, began himself to govern; they bias'd his youth by their prudence, and by their advice were all things manag'd. 'Twas now they perceiv'd better than before, and beheld with admiration those fair qualities, of which I have made mention to you; so that the Franks conceiv'd an immoderate joy to be govern'd by a Prince so great, and so amiable. There were few persons which did not feel the effects of his liberality, and inclinations to do good; so that he so much gain'd the hearts both of the great ones, and people, that he had all their love, and all their prayers. His carriage towards his Peers, was the most Noble and Generous in the world, and particularly towards Marcomire, whom he lov'd with a most tender affection, knowing in him those qualities which would make him admir'd by the whole earth, if they were not a little darkned by those of his King: yet this particular esteem which he had for him, did not at all lessen the affection which he owed to Prince Sumon, who in valour, spirit, and all sorts of noble qualities, is little inferior to the most accomplish'd persons; nor that he always bare to the Princess Polixena his Sister, of whose admirable beauties and divine perfections, I should be oblig'd to make you a particular description, if it were necessary to my recital, or if I were not oblig'd to pass to more important things.

Pharamond had scarce begun to reign, but he bethought how to execute that design which he had in his mind from his infancy, and in which he had been confirm'd by the instructions of the King his Father, and the eager thirst he had after Honour. As his courage was great, his thoughts became vast, and the limits of Franconia seem'd too narrow to confine his mind; he design'd nothing else but to pass the Rhine to revenge the injuries done to his friends, and recover that Crown which of right appertained to him. And besides that his ambition and warlike inclinations inspir'd him, the words of Altornua were daily in his memory; and finding himself pleasingly flatter'd by the promises which she made him, he burn'd with impatience for opportunities to signalize himself, and open a way to that glory which she had foretold him. And to testify the remembrance of those words, the first Arms that he carried, on the Ridge of his Helmet he wore a Lion fighting with an Eagle. He declar'd his intention to Prince Priam, Basogastus, Charamont, and others, in whose prudence he had sufficient confidence: And though these great men found an infinite boldness in the design, and perhaps little appearance that it should prosper, yet they could not condemn it in a Prince like Pharamond; but looking upon him as a miraculous personage, and one destin'd by Heaven to act something extraordinary, they let pass their reason, and made it give place to their better hopes of all things. They only contented themselves to tell him, that his design was truly worthy the Grandeur of his courage; and if any good success could be hop'd for, 'twas without doubt for him that the glory of such an enterprize was reserv'd; but that he ought to manage it with a prudence so much the more great, as he had to do with the most potent strength in the world, and not embark himself in so important a war, without having consider'd all dangers, and divid'd into all his advantages: That to this effect he ought not to be over rash or hasty; but whilst they secretly made necessary preparations, time might produce a favourable opportunity: That there was already great appearance of disorders like to happen in the Empire: That it was generally sam'd, that several Provinces intended to arm themselves, and throw off the yoke which the Romans had for many years impos'd upon them: That they should either allie themselves with one of those parties, and so forming a great body, give more trouble to their enemies; or making use of their opportunity, when the Roman Arms were employed against the other Provinces, make without doubt more progress than they could possibly do, whilst things were more calm.

Pharamond knew there was a great deal of reason in the discourse of his faithful Counsellours; and though he found himself strongly spur'd forward to seek for Honour, he yielded for one year to the advice of those old Politicians, though he then understood that the Goths and Herules were entered into some Provinces of the Empire, under the conduct of Alaric and Radagaise : But afterwards understanding that Radagaise was defeated by Stilicon, and himself and all his whole Army slain in Italy by that success, in which the world gives you, great Sir, the noblest thare : That Stilicon was employ'd against Alaric in a war, which it was believ'd would not easily be determin'd ; and that it was blaz'd through the world, that the Alanes, Gepides, Vandals and Burgundians, were resolv'd to take Arms upon the common quarrel of all people, who had felt the heavy weight of the Roman tyranny : He had no longer power to contain his great courage ; and easily making all his Subjects give consent to his purpose, out of the marvellous opinion they had of him, he began openly to arm and seek the assistance of his Allies, and assemble his Forces from all parts. He in short time levied a puissant force, not only among the Cauches, the Saliens, the Bructeres, the Angrivariens, the Jubantes, the Usipetes, the Marses, and other people, which were his Subjects ; but amongst his Neighbours and Allies, who joyn'd themselves with infinite acclamations to his party : such were the Jubons, the Cattese, the Sedusiens, the Turomens, and the Cherufques.

His Army began to grow numerous, and the Banks of the Mein and Visurgues already in several places return'd their echoes to the cries of the Soldiers, and neighing of the Horses : And to make him yet more strong, there arriv'd an Envoy from the King of the Burgundians, offering an Alliance on the behalf of his Master, and to demand his, with the conjunction of their Forces against the common enemy. The Burgundians are a people descended, as it is believed, from the same original with the Vandals ; and which about an age preceding coming to inhabit in Germany, had possess'd themselves of a good part of it, and rendred themselves terrible to all Europe. Their King Gondioch, though he was not above four or five years more aged than my Master, yet had already blaz'd forth his renown through the world, by divers noble warlike exploits, which made him esteem'd amongst the most valiant living ; and he is fam'd to be no less experienc'd in war, than many of the ancient Captains. He had not only taken Arms against the Romans, but driven them out of those Territories which were subject to them, and the Neighbouring Countries, having fought many great Battels, of which the Victory still remain'd on his side : and to demonstrate the aversion he bore to that slavery which his Predecessors had submitted to, he had taken for his Arms a Cat Argent, with this Motto, LIBERTY. That Beast being reported to be of all others the greatest Lover of Freedom, and impatient of Captivity.

Gondioch had already made known his imprese to all Europe, and was now not only content to have driven the Romans out of their Lands in Germany, but he resolv'd to carry the war into Gallia, making several pretences to the Province of the Senonois. To this purpose he sought the Alliance of my Prince ; and the Agent who brought him the offer, told him on the behalf of his Master, that if it pleas'd him they should joyn their Forces, and carry on the war against the Romans, they would pass the Rhine together, and aid each other mutually in their conquests, without disuniting their interest till the end of the war, or till they had an entire satisfaction, or that either the one or other were ruin'd.

Pharamond (who already emulated the fair reputation of Gondioch, but with a noble emulation, and utterly estrang'd from that envy which only possesses baser minds) receiv'd with infinite joy, such a companion in his enterprize and first tryal of his Fortunes, hoping in a small time to oblige renown to treat him no less favourably, and advance himself by his valour to such a degree of glory, as might make him justly behold without envy all that Gondioch had gain'd. And therefore having favourably treated his Envoy, and having made him many magnificent presents, he charg'd him to assure his Master of all that he could desire from him, and protest to him, that he could not conceive a greater joy, than to have the fair opportunity to learn so great a mystery under so famous and experienc'd a Warriour.

Their Alliance was thus concluded, and the young King of the Franks endeavour'd with all diligence to put his Troops in order to meet Gondioch, on the Banks of Visurgues, whither he intended with all speed to march with his. But things could not be brought to pass at present, as they had propos'd them : for the rumour of our Princes Arming being already spread about the world, Aurelian and Maximus, who commanded the Roman Legions in Germany, and who had in many places considerable Forces, assembled them with all diligence, and put themselves in a condition which made them not only hope to frustrate their design, but to ruine them in the enterprize. The first thing they aim'd at, was to hinder the conjunction of Pharamond and Gondioch, which it was eatie for them to do, and which they effected with a marvellous diligence.

Besides the Roman Troops, which they in few dayes drew together, they had the greatest part of Germany for their Allies; and though it was fear rather, than affection that held them so, yet they ceased not to caufe them take Arms in all Provinces which were yet at their devotion. And by this means they had in a small time assembl'd two Armies much more puissant than those of Pharamond or Gondioch: Towards the Danube, the Carithinians, the Latobriges and the Turingiens raised Forces for them; and towards Visurgues, and the Mountains of Millebec, the Dandutes, the Nerterians and the Sueves, who for a long time had been Enemies to Franconia, did the like; but the Romans received the greatest assistance from the King of Cimbria and Bohemia, who being a mortal Enemy to Gondioch, embrac'd with joy this opportunity to testify the hatred which he bore him. With the Forces of all these Nations and their own; Aurelian and Maximus believ'd (and that with a great deal of probability) themselves in a condition to destroy their Enemies, and having parted their Forces into two Armies almost equal, Aurelian march'd towards Gondioch, and Maximus came to find out Pharamond, towards the Borders of Franconia.

The young Prince was advertis'd of his advance, but not at all daunted at it, for he testified more courage in these his first beginnings, than possibly many more assured Warriors could have done after many years practice of warlike Affairs. He disdain'd to stay expecting him in his own Country, but advanc'd to seek him in the best order in the World. They happen'd to come near upon the same time into the Country of the Marcomans; and in the end, their Armies approach'd so near, that nothing but the River Meine separated them. I know not, Mighty Sir, whether you can give an entire credit to what I tell you of these my Master's first Acts: but most certain it is, that at that Age whercin he might very probably be ignorant in what is unknown to any but old and experienc'd Captains, he gave cause of admiration to Priam, Bisogastus, and all those whom long practice had made Masters of the warlike Science. Not that his youth and great courage did not carry him sometimes farther than was necessary; but he gave so good reasons for all his enterprizes, that the most Sage could not tell how to condemn them: And when he perceiv'd that by too much forwardness he had too far engag'd his Troops, he knew how to retire them with such an admirable conduct, and preserv'd his judgment so entire in the midst of the greatest dangers, that all those that were near him, were astonish'd as at things most prodigious: He acted with this prudence for the preservation of his men, but for his own safety he us'd not the same: and had it not been for Priam, Bisogastus and Charamont, who would almost offer him violence at such times, he would have every day hazarded his Person more dangerously than the meanest Souldier of his Army.

The two Armies had for some time remained facing each other, on the two Banks of the Meine; and our old Captains advis'd that we should suffer Maximus to pass over, not doubting but he that should pass first, would in his passage give sufficient Advantages to his Enemy. But Pharamond could not with patience attend so long: and after having represented unto them, that he could not in honour suffer his Enemy to ruine and destroy the Country of his Allies, in which they were lodg'd, nor permit them to war in our own Country, whilst we might carry it in to theirs; he discamped one Night (contrary to the expectation of his Enemies, who did not at all suspect he would take his March that way he did) and by a great circuit reach'd the City of Devona, where over a fair and large Bridge cross the Meine, he pass'd his whole Army before that Maximus perceiv'd his design.

This hardiness of Pharamond astonish'd him, who could not believe that with forces fewer in number than his, he should have the assurance to pass the River, and come to him: and in stead of having before disdain'd him as a young man little experienc'd in War, and whom the first dangers would affright; this effect of his courage made him begin to fear, and to doubt more than before of the success of that War to which he had march'd with an assured confidence of Victory: so that he made no farther shew of desiring a Battel, or at least he deferred it so long as it was possible: not that he was not in condition to give it, being stronger than we by more than ten thousand men; but he had advice of the march of the Sueves, who came to joyn with him, and he was in hopes to oppress us without danger, with that great power, when it should be all united together. One party of those he expected, might have arriv'd, had we given him the leisure to attend that great reinforcement; but our Prince having been advertis'd of the Levies of the Sueves, and knowing them to be Allies of the Romans, doubting not at all but that they were to march against us, judg'd well, and his judgment was approv'd by all his own, that without giving further time to our Enemies to fortifie themselves, we ought to give them battel.

To this purpose he approach'd towards them, endeavouring to draw them to fight by all means means possible; but it had been difficult for him to have perform'd his design, if Maximus, who was young and courageous, had not judg'd it disgraceful to the Roman name, to avoid the Combat with Forces much surpassing his Enemies; or had not believ'd himself assur'd of Victory without attending the Arrival of the Sueves, who were scarce march'd out of their Country. Wherefore without farther deliberation he prepared for Battel, and drew his Troops from the places in which they were encamp'd, to range them in a great Plain, which is between the River Meine, and the Country of the Hermundures. Pharamond had no sooner knowledge of it, but joy and courage were seen equally glittering in his eyes; and we might easily observe something more than humane in his Person, and in all the Actions which he did to prepare himself against this fortunate day.

You have already, Great Sir, too largely heard the success, to have the patience to hear me recount all the particulars: I shall therefore pass them over, and only tell you, because there are some things you may be ignorant of, That my Prince having rang'd his Troops with an admirable order, and following the counsel of the old Captains, to whom he hearkned with a wonderful quickness of apprehension, he plac'd himself at the head of the right Wing, and gave the left to be commanded by the famous Priam; Ibere and Merouée, young Princes of his Blood, and of his Age, commanded the Cavalry. Prince Marcomire his Brother he kept with him, to fight without any charge, together with Prince Genebaud, Son of Priam. Bisgathus, Charamont, and others the most considerable, who would not consent to be distant from his person, in a time of so much danger. The Prince Sumnon was not yet able to bear Arms, having hardly pass'd fifteen years; but though Marcomire was but in the seventeenth, they could not oblige him to be dispens'd with. Never did the Countenance of the fairest Amazon appear in Armour so beautiful as his: and had he carried it naked in the fight, there could have been no Enemy so barbarous as to offend it. But our young King seem'd such to us in his fair Arms, there appearing somewhat so great, so Majestick and so Divine (if I may be permitted to speak it) in his Carriage, in his Eyes, and in all his Actions, that he became the Admiration of those that beheld him, and put into the most timorous souls the assur'd hopes of Victory: But if all the Grace of his person could charm us, those who could hear his Discourse, when he encourag'd the Souldiers, were no less surpris'd with his eloquence: and besides the force his becoming Deportment gave to his words, a fire was to be discern'd to issue from his Eyes, which enflam'd with a Martial vigour the most faint hearted spirits. The Arms which he that day carried, were no less fair than you saw him wear yesterday; the Gold and precious Stones glittered throughout them, and behind the Lyon combating against the Eagle, which was erected upon his Helmet, in remembrance of the words of Altornua, he wore confusedly a great number of fair Plumes, which yielding to their own weight, seem'd almost to cover his Shoulders. He was mounted on a Horse most proper for the employment of that day, and carried his Lance with such a grace that he seem'd compos'd by the Graces themselves. But all that appeared of fierce and terrible in his Eyes, could not blot out that character of sweetness, which is depainted in his Countenance, and which in what condition soever he be, reigns in all his Actions: so that whatever may be discerned in him to make him appear warlike, he seems by nature inclined rather to make himself belov'd than fear'd.

As this day was destin'd to be of infinite glory to him, so all things contributed to it: for he was not only fortunate at the first blow he gave, but with the first stroke of a Lance he had ever given in his life, he depriv'd a Sovereign of his, and threw dead before the eyes of Maximus, the Prince of the Latobriges, who for fear rather than affection serv'd the Romans against their Neighbours. The first happy success of their Prince seem'd as a good Augure to the Franks, who made the Heavens echo with their acclamations of joy: but that blow was follow'd by so many others of the same hand, that the remembrance of that was utterly lost, and nothing lookt upon but the confusion and horrour into which he had put this side of the Battel. The young Marcomire signaliz'd himself in this his first essay, with a thousand memorable actions: and the Princes Ibere, Merovee and Genebaud, made both their friends and enemies witnesses of the fairest beginnings in the World. There was never possibly a fight better maintain'd in Germany than this days Combat, both by the valour of the Captains and Souldiers, both of one and the other party; so that the slaughter was so bloody, that the Waters of the Meine were changed for several furlongs to a crimson hew. The left Wing which was conducted by the valiant Priam, seem'd to give way a little before their enemies, who were commanded by Maximus; and possibly had fell into a great extremity, had it not been succour'd by Pharamond, who (having broken the wing of the enemies which he oppos'd; and by the effects of an admirable valour, and a conduct more than extraordinary, in an age like his, atchiev'd a Victory on all sides where he shew'd himself) flew to assist his friends, and by his presence chang'd the face of the Combat.

I shall add little more my Lord, because I know that nothing of importance hath been hid from your knowledge. The wing which Maximus commanded, had the same fortune to be defeated as the other, and he himself dismounted by a blow he received from the Prince Marcomire; and had been taken, had he not been valiantly seconded and remounted by his Followers. He endeavoured by all means possible to rally his scattered Troops; nor could he be accused for this days unfortunate success. But in the end, the Victory remained on our side, and remained so entire, that more than thirty thousand of our Enemies lost their lives, and more than ten thousand were taken prisoners; whom Pharamond's clemency saved from the fury of his Souldiers. Night hindered the Conquerours from a further pursuit; and some dayes after, Maximus, who had escaped in the confusion, rallied the best part of those that remained.

This Victory, though great and renowned in it self, was more dear to us for the Honour which our young Monarch acquir'd, than for all the Advantages we drew from it: his glorious beginings had ravish'd us with so sensible a joy, that we had demonstrated it in some extraordinary manner, would our Prince have consented, and had not been resolv'd to resist as much modestly as we expressed our gladness. He committed the charge of other necessary employments after so great a Victory, to Priam, Charamont, and other great Personages; but himself took entire care of the prisoners: And having separated the Romans from the Germanis, he sent away those of the Provinces, after having taken their Parol to return to their Houses, and not serve any more under the Romans: and soon after, he shew'd the same kindness to the Forces of the Empire.

After he had rested the Army for some few dayes, he march'd after Maximus, not doubting but he was retir'd towards the Sueves, who were coming to joyn with him; which he resolv'd with all his endeavour to prevent, or if possible, carry the War into their Countries, rather than attend it in his own: To this purpose we march'd through the Territories of the Hermundures, taking our March between the Meine, and the Hercinian Mountains; but this Country being either possessed by our Enemies, or their Allyes, we found great difficulties in passing, and were stopp'd at the City of Menofgada, seated upon the Banks of the Meine, and little distant from the Hercinian Mountains.

Pharamond had no intention to lay siege to a City of sufficient strength to retard the course of his designs, and give too long time to his Enemies; he therefore resolv'd to pass his Army on the right hand between the City and the Mountains: but most passages being guarded, he was strongly oppos'd, and constrain'd to force his way through many, which he did with admirable valour and wisdom. His way being thus open'd, he happily pass'd the Straits before the Arrival of Maximus and the Sueves, who had without doubt disputed it with him, and would highly have annoy'd him, had they made themselves Masters of it.

He had scarcely time to enlarge himself on the Plains, when he had Advice of the March of his Enemies, that they were not above a dayes Journey from us; and that Maximus had joyn'd with the Sueves, all that he could save or rally of his discomfited Army. The Sueves were commanded by Vindimer their King's Son, a young Prince of fair hopes, and who in a tender Age had given admirable proofs of his valour: he march'd heighten'd by many great Advantages; but that which made him most proud, was the hope he had to possess the Princess of the Cimbres, that famous Beauty, whose Renown is spread throughout the whole Universe. Some have reported that he was dearly belov'd of her, though this high-minded Princess had seen all the Princes of Germany, and those of many other Nations, in vain fighting at her feet: And it was not at all doubted, but by the will of the two Kings their Fathers, who equally desired the Alliance, this Marriage, cruel to so many Illustrious Lovers, would in a short time have been celebrated. Vindimer was much troubled to be banish'd from her; nor had he without doubt quitted her, if Honour had not call'd him to succour his Allies, or that he had not had hopes to return crown'd with Laurels from the success of a War which he did not doubt would be soon determin'd. He led near forty thousand men; and with those which Maximus had sav'd from the former Battle, the whole Army was compos'd of more than fifty thousand. Out of the respect the Sueves had for the Romans, Vindimer permitted the chief Authority to Maximus; but Maximus unwilling to abuse his civility, treated him when they were together as his Companion and Allie. Our Army was likewise compos'd of above forty thousand men; which though a number inferiour to that of our Enemies, in stead of putting any fear into the mind of Pharamond, seem'd to animate him the more to the Combat.

Before:

Before we came to a Battel, several remarkable passages happen'd, and many Skirmishes pass'd, in which our King signaliz'd himself by many extraordinary actions. But the most famous which happen'd, and of greatest importance, was within the sight of Mensogade, where the Prince of the Sueves going with about three thousand Cavalry to plant some Forces behind us, and stop our retreat, met with the valiant Pharamond, who with a body of Horse little inferiour to his, was gone in person to take notice of several Posts he intended to secure. The two Princes did no sooner discover each other, but they mutually sent to know what they were; and Vindimer had no sooner judg'd by several marks, that Pharamond was in person in that great body of his enemies, but spur'd forward with a generous emulation of the Renown which already began to spread abroad of his Valour, advancing before all his own, whom he made march slowly after him, seeing that we marched towards him on a full trot, before the Troops could joyn he sent a Herald to demand the breaking of a Lance with Pharamond. Our valiant Prince receiv'd Vindimer's defiance with infinite joy; and having commanded us not to move farther, whilst Vindimer did the same to his Troops, he advanc'd towards the Prince of the Sueves, brandishing his Lance with a fierceness wholly Martial. The countenance of Vindimer was no less assur'd than his, and no sooner were they plac'd opposite to each other, but they parted at the same time, and made the beauty of their Course be equally admir'd by both parties. The Lance of Vindimer broke in a thousand pieces upon the Shield of Pharamond; but that of our Prince having found the place where the Helmet is joyn'd to the body of the Cuirass, pass'd between the one and the other without resistance, and piercing the neck of the unfortunate Vindimer, caus'd him to tumble depriv'd of life behind the Crouper of his Horse! Oh! this was the cruellest blow that ever was given by Lance both to him that gave it, and to him that received it: how much blood hath it since cost to repay those tears! which it caus'd to be shed by the fairest eyes of the Universe!

The deplorable Vindimer was scarce fallen, who with his life lost those fair hopes with which he was encourag'd, but his Troops, whom the sight of so sad an accident had inspir'd with fury, in a moment levying a forest of Lances against the Conquerour, intended without doubt by a thousand wounds to revenge the death of their Prince, if we had not spur'd forward so soon as we saw them couch'd, and had not cover'd our King by receiving them in the middle of their Carriere. Never had the like number of men so terrible an encounter, nor ever did so small a Troop fight so valiantly. The despair with which the Sueves fought, made the Victory a long time dubious; and had it not been for the wonderful actions of our Prince, and those valiant men that fought near him, this Combat could not but have been fatal to us; but in the end, the King of the Franks employing all his valour, put fear and flight into the most desperate; and after he had cover'd the Field with the greatest part, he permitted the rest to save themselves: he dismiss'd those which were taken prisoners with the body of their Prince, which he caus'd them to carry to their Camp; nor could he see it taken from amongst the rest of the dead, without testifying by his tears the sorrow he had for his deplorable destiny.

We understood the next morning that Maximus, and the whole Camp, had been sensibly grieved for the loss of Vindimer, and that with the sad news they had sent the body of the Prince to the King his Father. The desire Maximus had of revenge, made him hasten to the Battel; and the Sueves demanded it with so much earnestness, that it was impossible for him to deny it: It was given some few days after (not to detain you with a too tedious recital of things you already know) and it was near to the same place where the last Combate was fought, and with an order as to the embattelling our Troops little different from the former. It was certainly more bloody than the first; and the rage wherewith the Sueves were animated put our Prince oftentimes quite out of hopes of the Victory. So that one may say with truth, that it was not the Franks that vanquish'd the Sueves and the Romans, but Pharamond that vanquish'd Maximus; such prodigious things did he, and sustain'd so often the fortune of his party by the succours he gave them in the greatest extremities, and by the orders he gave and changed according to necessity in the greatest heat of the Combate, that 'twas to him alone, more than to all the rest, that we truly ought the Victory. The desperate fury of the Sueves render'd it more entire than it could have been, had they been less obstinate, for the enemies left forty thousand dead upon the place, after they had slain ten thousand of ours. Maximus again sav'd himself with the miserable remainder, which Pharamond, whom this great effusion of blood mov'd to compassion, would not farther pursue.

After this great Victory, all the adjacent Country which before took part with our Enemies, submitted themselves to his power, and many of the Cities follow'd their example;

ple; others whose confidence in their own strength made them take contrary resolutions, prov'd the effects of his Valour, and the knowledge he had already in beliegging strong Holds. Menofgade held out against us above a month; but in less than two we took five or six others. And Pharamond having made himself Master of all those passages which were before disputed, found himself in a condition to perform the conditions which he had made with Gondioch, and to assist him against Aurelian, who together with the Cimbrians and Bohemians, made war upon the Frontiers of his own Dominions. We understood in few days, that between them Fortune had been variously inclin'd: That Gondioch had had great advantages over Aurelian; and that in a Battel he had gain'd against him, near the Ruces of Guttale, he had kill'd him about twenty thousand men; and that in the end, the King of Cimbria, having joyn'd all his Forces, and those of his Allies with the Romans, they had compos'd so formidable an Army, that they had constrain'd him to retire into his own Country, where they intended to attacque him, with hopes to overcome him rather by number than virtue.

This news made Pharamond hasten to the assistance of his Allie: but he had advanc'd forward but a few days march, when he receiv'd an advice which forc'd him to change his resolution. He understood that Aurelian having heard of the defeat of Maximus and his whole Army, judging that his presence would be more necessary against us, than against the King of the Burgundians, had left the King of the Cimbrians with an Army of about fifty thousand, either to fight or amuse Gondioch, whilst he was obliged to run to the more pressing necessity, and with the rest of the Army went to joyn with those new Troops were levied among the Sueves, and those of the Bohemians; and thence traversing that part which was encompassed by the Forest, and the Hercinian Mountains (which he might the more easily do, it being the Country of his Allies, and where nothing could retard his passage) he came to the Banks of the Danube, and so through the Countries of the Sedusians, Turomans and Marcomans, to fall upon Franconia.

This advice which our Prince received from several parts, made him return to the defence of his own Country, before Aurelian should arrive; and having order'd diligent levies of several Troops to fortifie his Army less numerous yet by half than that of his enemies, he softly march'd towards the Country of the Sedusians, to meet Aurelian in his passage; and attending the reinforcement that was to joyn with him, he encamp'd, and rested some days on the Banks of the Rhine, between the Turomans, and the Marcomans, and in the Country which is opposite to that of the Nemetes and Vagenses. I shall shorten this discourse, as well because all that fell out of importance is known to you; as out of the desire I have to come to the recital of things more worthy your attention, or at least your curiosity. I will therefore tell you with all possible brevity, That Aurelian arriv'd as my Master had suspected: That the two Captains made war two or three months in the Country of the Turomans, where in more than twenty combats they disputed the advantages they fought; and that in the end, the two Armies being ranged near to the Rhine, decided the war by a general Battel. 'Twas much more bloody than all the others, and the victory was disputed with so much courage and resolution, that we lost more than twelve thousand men: but the Army of the Romans was entirely destroyed, together with their General Aurelian, who in the heat of the fight lost his life by the Sword of Prince Marcomire, who this day commanded all the Cavalry, and signaliz'd himself by a multitude of great actions worthy eternal memory. Ibere, Genebaud and Merouée, gave likewise severally noble proofs of their valour, as likewise did the young Prince Summon, who now began to seek his first glory in Arms, and in these his first beginnings shewed himself worthy of that Illustrious blood, from whence he was descended. The renowned Friam and the valiant Charimont, with many others for virtue and extraction considerable, had their shares in the honourable success of this War, and by their noble actions extended their fame through all the Provinces of Germany.

By this great victory, our valiant Prince did not only drive the Romans from the limits of his Territories, but render'd himself Master of the whole Country. The Sedusians, the Caribinens and the Latobriges, renounced voluntarily the Alliance of the Romans; nor were there any of the Provinces which lie upon the Rhine, the Elba, the Ocean, the Sala, and the Danube, which did not submit to his power, or seek his Alliance. Besides the effects of his great renown already spread through the whole world, and the veneration which the charms of his person might cause; the mildness with which he treated the people, as well those whom his Arms reduc'd to obedience, as those that submitted voluntarily, gained in a short time upon the fiercest hearts, and rendred his name as dear to all those who were not arm'd with some interest against him, as it was terrible to his ene-

'Twas now that with joy his valour was attended with the effects of those fair hopes which had been conceiv'd of him: for his Forces encreasing every day, through the confidence the people had of him, and the constant messengers sent by all to desire his protection, that he made no doubt at all to be in a posture to pass the Rhine, and establish amongst the Gauls the ancient Monarchy of his Fathers. And those who formerly would have dissuaded him from this enterprize, by the great difficulties they saw in it, were now the first to solicit him, and to testify the impatience they had to follow him in so noble an expedition. But his great courage needed not these solicitations: for the love of glory being at this time the sole possessor of his mind, he would have looked upon that River which separates us from the Gauls, as too poor an obstacle to stay him, if he had not remembered the league which he had made with the King of the Burgundians, and the obligations which engaged him to succour him in a war which had been brought upon him, partly by their Alliance.

He had understood that after the departure of Aurelian, he had not only defended himself against the Forces of the King of the Cimbrians and Bohemians, whom Aurelian had left to oppose him; but that after a long time having maintained the War, with a rare conduct and admirable valour, he had in the end, in a great Battel not only defeated his enemies, and retaken several Cities, which they had possessed themselves of in his Territories, but that he was upon the point to drive them entirely from thence, and carry the war into their own Countries: when the King of the Cimbrians found means to joyn the King of the Sueves to his quarrel, and to draw to his assistance a most powerful Army, which he had already rais'd, less for interest of the Romans, than to revenge the death of his Son, who lost his life by the Lance of Pharamond.

These two Kings had not only been a long time tied together by an ordinary Alliance, but had bound themselves by more particular and stronger bonds of friendship, and by the design they had to joyn in a more firm union, by the marriage of the unfortunate Vindimir, and the fair Princess of the Cimbrians. The desolate Father had with tears of blood lamented the loss of his Son; but after he had given some time to those unprofitable showers, he comforted himself out of hope of revenge; and to that purpose had sent throughout the world to seek his young Son Viridomar, whom some discontent had caused about two years before to part from his Court, and who in his tender youth had given proofs of an admirable valour, and a courage advanc'd above any thing common. In the mean time he had arm'd all parts of his Dominions, and those of his Neighbours who interest themselves in his grief. The King of the Cimbrians was not wanting to testify the portion he had in it, and which he ought to have for the interest of his Daughter, (who had been sensibly touch'd for the loss of a Prince, whom their Parents and their own inclinations had destin'd for her Spouse) promising him all that he could hope from a Brother, to perfect that vengeance which should be common to both: and since he understood that he was in a condition, and had already resolv'd to march against Pharamond, he represented unto him that they were not to follow the examples of Maximus and Aurelian, who had not perish'd with their whole Armies, had they not so unadvisedly separated them: That he should be ready to follow him, so soon as he had finish'd the War, which he was already engaged in: and that if he would joyn with him against Gondioch, who as well as Pharamond was their common enemy, he would follow him and serve him even to the last of his Subjects, against the murtherer of his Son, and the Spouse which he had destin'd to his Daughter.

The King of the Sueves had found so much of reason in the propositions of the King of Cimbria, that he easily comply'd with his desires; and assured him, that he would directly march to his assistance, now that his affairs were brought into such a condition; and that the King of the Burgundians having driven him out of his Country, was preparing to enter into his. No sooner did Pharamond hear this news but not long debating what resolution to take, he quitted the Banks of the Rhine, and with an Army of forty thousand Foot, and fifteen thousand Horse, marched to the assistance of his Allie. 'Tis true, he was fain to take a long and tedious Circuit, to avoid the Country of the Sueves or their Allies, who without doubt would have disputed his passage, and who had pass'd in the way, the difficulty whereof would have retarded his journey, and hindered his Allie from the hopes of his seasonable assistance: and therefore, entring into the Country of the Marcomans, he strook into Franconia; and following that course to the Territories of the Bruçieres, he there pass'd over the Visurgues; and crossing the Country of the Gamberes, he came to the Banks of the Elba, over which he made a Bridge of Boats; and from thence marching among the Varines and Accorpes, he arrived at the River Guttale: but this march was so long, and he lost so much time by passing over several great streams and Rivers which were not fordable, that before we could arrive to the assistance of Gondioch, the King of the Sueves had not only time to joyn himself with the Cimbrians; but after that conjunction they made a war upon Gondioch, with such a success as surpris'd my Prince when he received the news of it. Not that the King of the Burgundians had not received them with an invincible courage, and that in several Combats with them he had not supplied the default of numbers with a surpassing valour, and such excellent conduct, that his enemies could not vaunt any great or considerable advantage over him; but that it was his misfortune, that being one day engaged farther than so great a Commander ought to have done, in the pursuit of some Cavalry to which he gave chase, he fell into an Ambuscade, and was taken by the Son of the King of the Cimbrians; and being by him presented to his Father, was sent prisoner to one of his Cities.

The taking of Gondioch had entirely ruin'd his affairs, and his Troops having lost their courage by the loss of their Captain, made no resistance, but retir'd into the heart of his Dominions, not daring to abide the enemies that pursued them. Fortune, which was wholly contrary to them, had deprived them of a valiant Defender by the absence of the young Brother of Gondioch, and who in an age little different from that of Marcomire, had already made himself known through all the world, and whom a desire to know the world had caus'd to travel into strange Provinces with Goutran, a Prince of the Blood-royal, who by many great actions had acquir'd a fair Renown. The two Kings making use of their good fortune, though they could not force them to fight, gain'd daily advantages over them. But in the end, seeing they durst not maintain a field against them, they laid siege to one of the principal Cities, with design either to make themselves Masters of the Country by the taking of places, or draw the Burgundians to a Battel if they endeavour'd to relieve them. It was at this Siege that they were busied, when we arriv'd at the Frontiers of the Burgundians; and although they were advertis'd of our march, we had pass'd the Guttale before they could give us any impediment in our passage.

Our valiant King lively afflicted with the misery of his Friend, resolv'd to try all his valour and wisdom in a war for his assistance; and to this purpose, though the Country was unknown to him, and though our enemies had a numerous power, he took his times and his advantages, and managed so well all things to bring his designs about, that maugre all the obstacles of the Cimbrians and Sueves, he joyn'd himself with those Troops of Gondioch his Army which still remained embodied, and encreas'd our Army to more than thirty thousand men.

The Burgundians seeing themselves commanded by so valiant a Captain, regain'd the courage they had lost by the captivity of their King, and became rather more zealous for war than ever, demanding nothing but to come to a Battel, Pharamond, who was well acquainted with their former Valour, though it had been somewhat discourag'd after the taking of Gondioch; and having a marvellous confidence in his Soldiers, and in the valiant men which commanded them, not at all dreading the number of his enemies, though far greater than his own, march'd towards them in a fair order, determining to give them Battel the first opportunity that should present it self.

The two Kings had rais'd the Siege of the place so soon as they understood of our approach; and being both well experienc'd in warlike affairs having with them the Son of the Cimbrian King, a Prince of great Valour, and the Country being much better known to them than us, they gave us some trouble at the beginning of this War, and made it endure for some time with variety of fortune; but so soon as my Prince was a little better instructed in the knowledge of the Country, and the enemies with whom he had to do, he began to put so well in practice that which in so little time he had learned, that the Leaders of our enemies began to distrust their Fortune, and fear the Arms of a young Warriour, whose reputation was already the cause of astonishment to most distant Nations.

The King of the Cimbrians was of opinion not lightly to hazard a Battel, of which the success might be doubtful, and must of necessity be of great consequence to their party: but the heat of the Prince his Son, who desir'd nothing more than the combat, over-rul'd his opinion; and the choler of the Suevish King, who breath'd forth nothing but revenge for his Son, and who believed that the gods had sent him in the person of our Prince, the only victim sufficient to satisfy his indignation, so rashly precipitated all things to a fight, that after many enterprises on both parties, and several Skirmishes, in which the valour of our Princes and Commanders was signaliz'd by a thousand worthy actions, the two Armies came to a general Battel.

I shall not tell you, my Lord, the particulars of this, more than of many others, bearing to make that recital tedious, where I have so many Warlike Acts to recount, should I not pass them over as succinctly as I could. I will only tell you, that Fortune, which, though seldom, had now declared it self for Virtue, accompani'd my Prince this day, as she had done all others; and after a hot dispute which increased the Waters of the Guule with streams of blood, Pharamond vanquished the Kings of the Cimbrians and Sueves, as he had done Aurelian and Maximus, covering the Plain with more than forty thousand of their men: Night saved the rest of their Army, which was composed of more than fifty thousand: but some dayes after, the Victor following them to the Banks of the Vijula, forc'd them to come to a second Battel, wherein the success was yet more advantagious than the first, and in which, after the entire defeat of their Army, the King of the Sueves, and the Prince of the Cimbrians (having fought with an invincible courage) were taken prisoners. The King of Cimbria sav'd himself with some few Horse; and by reason of the little care the Victor took to pursue him, escap'd out of the Territories of the Burgundians into his own Kingdom.

The success of these two great Battels, and the taking of the King of the Sueves, and the Prince of the Cimbrians, were of such consequence, that they might have drawn with them the loss of those two Crowns, if the Conquerour would have pursued his Victory, and made use of his Advantages to ruine his Enemies, while it was possibly not very difficult for him to make himself Master of their Dominions. There wanted not those who counsell'd him to it; but he rejected their Advice, telling them, that it was not for the spoils of Enemies, but for Glory that he fought.

He gave his two Illustrious prisoners a most Royal Entertainment, and comforted the unhappyness of their condition with the pleasing Honour which he did them; but he would not shew himself to the King of the Sueves, judging well that he could not without renewing his grief, let him see the person that had slain his beloved Son; but he daily saw the Cimbrian Prince, who was a personage of a noble mind and great courage, but of a spirit so fierce, that he seem'd but little sensible of my Prince's civilities. Yet he ceased not to heap them upon him; and having made him know by all his proceedings that he had less cause than he believ'd to afflict himself for the disgrace which had unfortunately befallen him, he told him that all the advantage he would draw both from the gain of two Battels, and from the taking of him and the Suevish King, should be only the Liberty of Gondioch; which though he might expect for his alone, or for that of the King of Sueves, yet he would return them both for the King of the Burgundians, so soon as it should please his Father to consent.

Theobaldus (for so was the name of the Prince of the Cimbrians) related the intention of Pharamond to the King of the Sueves, who, so much incens'd as he was against so great an Enemy, could not but with lamenting his own misfortune, esteem the gallantry of my Prince's proceedings; and as he found his own advantages in this proposition of Pharamond, he readily accepted it, and prayed the Prince of the Cimbrians to write with him to the King his Father to send Gondioch for their exchange. The Cimbrian King, whom the captivity of his Son, and of his Allie, had afflicted with a mortal grief, presently consented to so advantagous a proposal: and this Treaty was made in so much hast, that in few dayes the King of the Burgundians departed from the Cimbrians to return into his own Country; and the King of the Sueves, and Prince Theobaldus were sent into theirs with an honourable Convoy, and all those marks of Honour which they could expect from their Friends and Allies.

Pharamond, with some part of his Cavalry, went to meet Gondioch upon the Frontiers of his Country; and this was the first interview of these two Princes, whose reputation had already spread it self through the World. I profess, my Lord, that unless it were my own King, I have not seen a Prince of a nobler mind than Gondioch, in whom all things appear'd so great, that I could not but judge him worthy of his fair Renown: but whatever thoughts my Prince, and all those that accompani'd him, had of him, he shew'd an admiration at the whole person of Pharamond, and look'd upon him with a respect, which till then he thought scarce due to men. The esteem they had mutually conceiv'd one for the other, was confusedly expressed in their first words; but in the end, Gondioch knowing himself bound to Pharamond both for his Liberty and Crown, not being able, nor believing he ought longer to conceal his acknowledgment, beholding him with a countenance which denoted something of confusion; I thought (said he) when I sought your Alliance, to have seen you as my Brother at our first interview; but now looking upon you as a Prince to whom I owe both my Crown and my Liberty, I see my self by misfortune reduc'd to such a condition, that it is not in my power to offer you any thing that is not already justly yours.

Pharamond listned to this Discourse with a grace which the gods have given to few men like him ; and coupling to his words that charming sweetness which accompanies the Majesty of his Locks ; I am more oblig'd to you (said he) for the gift you have made me of your Friendship before I could merit it, than you can be to the happy success of our Arms : the gods, who had less favour'd us in a less just quarrel, were oblig'd without doubt to restore you that Liberty which you lost only through too much Valour ; and the Honour to have contributed to any thing of so great value, finds in it self its own recompence. These first words of the two great Princes were attended with all those other expressions which in such a time the Generosity of two such Personages could inspire them withal ; and the acknowledging Gondioch publish'd the obligation he had to that favourable inspiration which had first made him demand an Alliance that had been so profitable to him. The Generous King of the Franks testified no less satisfaction in those happy opportunities which had given him the means to merit his Friendship. All that pass'd between them was truly great, and truly answerable to their Dignity ; and in this their first familiarity, they did not only confirm the Alliance they had contracted, but accompanied this familiarity with a thousand promises of a Friendship which neither time nor any accident should cancel,

At last, Gondioch casting his eyes upon the fair Troop that accompanied Pharamond, would know the names of those Valiant personages, who had so generously fought for the defence of his Kingdom, and recovery of his Liberty : for though he thought he had fix'd all his Admiration upon the person of Pharamond, yet he found new Objects in that of Marcomire, Sannon, Genebaud, Ibere, Meroveus, and many other Illustrious persons, who were in this noble company, to whom he testified his acknowledgments with all the marks of esteem he could imagine owing to their Birth and Merit.

After he had with an excellent grace thus acquitted himself, he together with Pharamond remounted on Horse-back, and advanc'd towards his Country, whither his return brought as much joy, as his Captivity had caus'd desolation : he receiv'd publick testimonies of it in all the Cities he pass'd through ; but he refus'd the Honour they would have given him, to throw it entirely upon Pharamond, not forgetting any thing which he knew to be due to a person, to whom he confess'd himself oblig'd for all things, and whom he consider'd for many qualities sufficient to cause the same effect in his mind, had he not anticipated it by so many powerful obligations. I will omit telling you the magnificent entrances they made into all the Cities, the divertisements by which the people endeavour'd to solemnize the return of their King, and the great expences which himself was at to honour the Redeemer of his Crown and Liberty.

Some days were spent in these Solemnities ; and they mutually acquainted with the great qualities which each possess'd, still more firmly knit the knot of their Friendship : but scarce by their familiarity had they form'd it into a habit, but that contrary to those publick demonstrations of joy, which the King of the Burgundians seem'd oblig'd to testify, Pharamond perceiv'd him overwhelmed with a dismal sadness, or at least his spirit troubled with some violent passion, which depriv'd him of his rest. He dissabl'd the first knowledge which he receiv'd, not doubting but time or some opportunities might give him more certain Intelligence : but the following dayes he perceiv'd such confirming Symptoms thereof in the countenance and behaviour of his Friend, that whatever violence he us'd to himself, he could not conceal a part of what he felt ; and was so much oppress'd with his evil, that it was no longer possible for him to hide it from those who daily convers'd with him : and in few dayes there might be perceiv'd a change in his visage, which he could not conceal as he might that of his thoughts. In brief, his evil at length got such an head, that neither he that suffer'd it could disguise it ; nor those who perceiv'd the strange effect which it produced, refrain from demanding the cause.

Pharamond, having long waited for an opportunity to satisfy himself, resolv'd at length to learn it of the King himself, not believing that there was any rule of discretion, which could defend him from informing himself of a thing, in which he believ'd himself strongly concern'd, by reason of the friendship he had contracted with Gondioch. To this purpose he went one day to seek him in a little by Alley of a Garden, where he often sought a retirement, and where he still withdrew, when the civility he ought to Pharamond would permit him ; and having command'd his Attendants to wait at a distance, that he might more freely discourse him, he found him in an Alley, where he walk'd with so profound a Melancholy, that he perceiv'd not the Arrival of Pharamond, till he was within six paces of him : he endeavour'd at sight of him, to have cloth'd his countenance with some kind of alacrity, and was about to make excuses for the business of his thoughts, when my Prince preventing him at the beginning of his Discourse ;

Study not (said he) to justify your Carriage with a Friend, who doth not desire these formalities, nor hath any intention to constrain you: but if it be true that you have for me so great a friendship as you have promised, defer no longer to let me know the true cause of that strange change, which we have observ'd in all your demeanour. I may without doubt complain that you have kept secret from me, those discontents which you cannot dissemble; and might represent to you, that after we are united by an interest against all sorts of Enemies, there is little which should not be common amongst us, and by which we may not demand the proofs of that friendship which we have contracted. But as I judge by many signs that you are not without trouble and vexation, I will not augment them by my complaints, nor be wanting to offer you upon this occasion, all that you can desire of a Friend, to whom nothing shall be difficult that may contribute to your satisfaction.

Whilst Pharamond spoke in this manner, the King of the Burgundians held his Eyes fixed on the Ground with a behaviour which declar'd the trouble of his mind; and afterwards lifting them up upon the countenance of my Prince, with an Aspect that begg'd for pity: Believe not (said he) that I have any Intention to conceal my Misfortune, whatever it shall be, from him to whom I owe all things, or at least attribute my silence to a design to spare your friendship that portion which it might make you covet in them. 'Tis true, I have deferred the discovery of it to you, so long as I had hopes to overcome it: for it had not been at all necessary to give you the knowledge of what I could have cur'd myself, by the helps of my reason, and by a violence opposing my passion: but since all remedies prove vain, and that of force it must appear contrary to my first resolutions; 'tis to you I truly ought to open my heart, not only to pay a duty to our friendship, but obey that cruel necessity, which hath reduc'd me into a condition to demand repose of the same Friend of whom I hold my Crown and Liberty. Would to God (added he after some minutes silence) that I had lost my life in that fatal Battel, wherein I doubly lost my Liberty; and that some favourable blow had spar'd to my dayes those long and cruel miseries, to which I am condemn'd by my misfortune: I had then did perhaps wish a great deal of Honour, and left nothing to blemish my memory; nor had I been left a prey to a cruel passion, which in a few dayes hath made me suffer more than all the most terrible mischiefs imaginable could do in a thousand years. 'Tis thus I must begin to tell you my misery; and you must know, since 'tis necessary you know it, that I have not been in one prison only among the Cimbrians, having been less a Captive to the Arms of their King, than to the Eyes of their Princess. In sum it will suffice that I tell you, that I have seen that most Divine Rosamond, whom all the Trumpets of Renown have publish'd the most beautiful throughout the Universe: and in telling you this great name, I justify that weakness for which you might reprehend me: I saw her in one of the Cities of the Bohemians, whither I was conducted, and where the Queen her Mother did me those civilities, which she believ'd due to a Royal Captive: and by that cruel Honour she wounded me to death. All that the Language of man can speak of this Beauty, is too much beneath the Truth; and if the force of your imagination supplies not my recital, it will be difficult to make you understand it by my Discourse: No humane eye can behold her, without being dazzl'd; nor any spirit fix one moments thoughts upon her, without giving it self entirely to admiration: and with more truth, No heart among all Mortals is able to resist her divine power. Thus the first moment that I had a sight of her became in truth the last of my Liberty; and I was struck as with a Thunder-bolt, or something more formidable and dreadful. The Beauties of her Mind, are without doubt what one can imagine of most sublime within the whole circuit of the World, and not at all inferiour to those of her Body: and though I saw her in a time when grief had clouded one part of her splendour, or at least obscur'd that which was most transparent; the greatness of her Soul appear'd above all that men have known of High or Noble; when she seem'd touch'd with some apprehensions of grief, and the tears which she shed at the death of Vindimir, if they were not to be attributed to love, yet at least made her accounted capable of all acknowledgment and tenderness. I dare likewise believe her apt to receive another passion: and if I may without cruelty declare this News to my Benefactor, I believe that the death of Vindimir hath created in her a hatred against him that gave it: I have heard her speak of him with tears, in which she seem'd more bright to me than in her ordinary splendor; and her grief mixt with those charms she gave it, was so sufficiently powerful to engage in her interests, that if I could hate him who had fought so generously for mine, I fear I should become his Enemy, who caused those tears to distil from Rosamond's Eyes. I saw her oftentimes by the goodness of the Queen her Mother, who gave me this comfort to my miseries: and my passion augmenting every moment, became in the end so great, that it scarce left me either the knowledge or use of reason: yet I made use of all that which I had left, to conceal an evil which I was not in an estate to make known; or at least, it was only by my regards and by my sighs, that I gave her any cognizance. But Rosamond's thoughts were prevented by others than those I could inspire into her: she regarded not at all the signs, though visible enough, of the evil which she made me suffer; and perhaps for a long time, she did not perceive it; but my passion in the end, grown stronger than all my resolutions, made me open my lips to discover it, and constrain'd me to speak in a time, wherein perhaps I was most oblig'd to be silent. Oh Gods! into what a condition was I thrown by this effect of my imprudent hardiness? What Thunder ever so astonish'd the fearful Hare, like to that which she with a more than Jove-like power darted against my presumption? I tremble at the remembrance of the marks of her dreaded anger; and I doubt not but that she had expressed it with a far greater severity, if I had not been a prisoner to the King her Father. This day was the last that it was permitted me to see her, and though I desir'd the sight of her much more vehemently than the preservation of my life, I durst no more demand it. By this misfortune my imprisonment became a thousand times more cruel than it had been before, scarce leaving me strength to support it, and I believe I could not have suffered it much longer, without my body's being over powered with the afflictions of my soul, if the King of Cimbria had not return'd as soon as the News of his Defeat, and the taking of his Son and the King of the Sueves; and if that few dayes after, by the exchange you made, he had not restor'd my Liberty, in a time wherein my wishes were neither for it, nor the preservation of my Realm.

See, generous Pharamond, the unhappiness of my Condition! I burn with a fire the most violent that ever attack'd any heart; and I suffer a mischief so much the more terrible, by how much I am forsaken by all appearances of hope. The Image of the divine Rosamond, still presents it self to my remembrance, and employs all the thoughts of my life: and though by your sight, and the knowledge of what I owe you, I have endeavour'd to drive away, or at least suspend the violence of my passion, all force against it has prov'd in vain and unprofitable; and it seems that by that force which I would oppose to its power, I have establish'd it a more absolute and tyrannical Empire: Not that in my love I find so much of misfortune as my grief, my countenance and my discourse may represent to you, if some cruel Accidents do not conspire my misery: for in short, neither is the degree I hold in the World inferior to that of the Father of Rosamond, nor my fortune more contemptible than that of the happy Vindimir, who was destin'd to the glory of possessing her, I have Dominions, I have Armies, I have courage, and I have reputation among men: but I am mortally hated of the Father and of the Brother of Rosamond; and besides the little disposition I have found in this Princess to favour my passion, I have understood that the intentions of the King of Cimbria is to unite himself more than ever with the King of the Sueves, and that he expects but the return of a Son, without doubt not much inferior to Vindimir, to give him the same honour of enjoying Rosamond, that was destin'd to his Brother: he hath already caused him be sought for throughout the World, by the Fame of his great Actions, which were every where known: at the same time he is to be wedded to Rosamond, he likewise pretends to give to the Prince of the Cimbrians the Princess Alceinda his Daughter, whose Beauty according to common Fame yields to none but Rosamond's; and by this double Marriage to joyn their Crowns in an eternal Alliance. Not, that by what I know of the spirit of Rosamond, it would be easie to perswade her to new affections, or that I do not believe but that the love she bore Vindimir, proceeding rather from an effect of her obedience than her own inclinations; but as she hath little less Virtue than Beauty, and that in her Soul, the love of glory is greater than that of her private satisfaction, I doubt not but she will sacrifice all things to her duty. However, all these impeachments which my ill fortune opposes to my felicity, can never diminish my love, nor abate my courage: and whatever wayes the misery of my life constrains me to make use of, I must either die or gain Rosamond; without her my life is odious to me, and to purchase her I will put in practice all that love shall inspire me with, or glory permit me to do: I will call to my assistance all that little valour which hath so happily serv'd me at some times: I will cover with Armed men the Countries of the Sueves and Bohemians: I will destroy half their Subjects, and perhaps that happy Successor of Vindimir; and to be invincible in all my enterprizes, I will Arm perhaps in my quarrel a friend, who may give me Rosamond, as he hath given me my Crown and my Liberty.

Whilst the passionate Gondioch spake in this manner, the sparkles seem'd to flie from his eyes, in which his love and choler had kindled an extraordinary flame; and the Prince who hearkned to him, seem'd surprized at his discourse with a trouble of mind which he had never before felt: he seem'd likewise accompani'd with some appearances of a misery, yet unknown to him; and though he knew not if he ought to attribute it wholly to what he felt of his Friend's misfortunes, yet it seem'd he interest'd himself more than he was willing, both in the hatred and grief of Rosamond, whom he knew not but by the Fame of her Beauty, and whom he had innocently incens'd. These thoughts gave him some disturbances, and indeed a melancholy, of which he knew not well the reason: when he believed that that he ought to dispel this cloud, which by spreading it self, began to excite some trouble in his mind, and rent himself into an estate to offer to his friend all that he could expect from his contracted Amity. To this effect recalling the wonted serenity of his countenance, which he had for sometime lost, and taking him by the hand, with a deportment wholly passionate,

I shall be very unhappy (said he) if you judge me willing to leave you at such a time wherein your Friends may be so useful to you: or that I should not desire you to dispose of the Armies, Dominions and life of Pharamond as that of Gondioch. For the heart of Rosamond, I believe you ought to gain it by love and submission, but for the King of the Cimbrians, if prayers cannot overcome him, employ those Arms which he hath no reason to despise, and make him know that the Alliance of the Burgundians would be no less advantageous to him, than that of the Sueves. I shall be ready to follow you so far as you desire it, and I will perhaps appease the choler of Rosamond (continued he with a sigh, of which he knew not the cause) in giving her a lover more worthy of her affections, than him I deprived her of.

These words flatter'd in such sort the thoughts of the enamour'd Gondioch, that in a moment he seem'd transported from grief to joy, and giving visible signs of it by his change of countenance; I apprehend (said he to the King of the Franks) that promise of good Fortune which you declare to me; and I receive it with a joy so much the greater, as the declaring and the giving is equally easie to your valour. I could not at all doubt, that after what I owe you, and the knowledge I have of the glory reserved for you in the world, that it was only from you I should receive my happiness; since besides all others but you, I perhaps had sufficient courage to be engag'd to none but my self: Let us try, since you approve it, the ways of submission with Rosamond till death; and with her Father, till such time as we are reduced by necessity to seek others: I will combat this divine enemy with all those Arms which a love worthy of her can furnish me with; and if her Father be inexorable to my Prayers, I will combat him with those Arms which shall perhaps shake his resolution.

To these words the two Princes added many others, by which the passion of the one and the friendship of the other were equally expressed: And in fine, they stopp'd with a design to send Ambassadors to the King of Cimbria, to demand of him on the behalf of the King of the Burgundians, peace, and the Princess his Daughter; and to offer him at the same time all the most advantageous conditions he could desire, both in the peace and in the marriage, with an eternal union with him, in all sorts of interests, and against all sorts of enemies. What they had propos'd, in a few days after they put in execution; and one of the most considerable amongst the Burgundians, was sent upon this Negotiation, with power to accept all conditions which they propos'd, so that he would promise Rosamond. But as Gondioch expected little from this Embassy, by the knowledge he had of the intention of the two Kings his enemies; instead of disarming and disbanding his Troops, he gave order to make new levies throughout all his Dominions, and prepar'd all things for war more than ever, though his Forces abstain'd from all acts of Hostility, and that our Army was lodg'd in the Quarters assign'd them, and whither by the rigour of the season they had been constrain'd to retire.

In the mean time Pharamond prepar'd himself to this war, in case it should happen, with a reluctancy which he could not overcome: and though he had not at all balanced his resolution, nor made any difficulty to enterprize and hazard all things for the service of his friend, yet he felt something on his heart, which he could not dissipate whatever opposition he made; and that Martial heat which carried him on to actions of glory, languish'd in him, nor could he enliven it, though he did do what possible to stir it up. He could not bear the name of Rosamond pronounc'd, without some trouble, nor Gondioch speaking of the love he bore her, without an alteration, which he could not apprehend. I perceiv'd it often by the change of his countenance, but I understood more by the discourse he made me; and as I was the person, of all his attendants, to whom he open'd most willingly his heart in many things, having one day taken me aside, and beholding me with an aspect which caus'd in me no small disquiet:

Cleomer (said he) I know not what is to befall me, in the pursuit of those affairs we now enterprize; but either I have lost my courage, or I am threatened with some strange misfortune. I know well it is not death menaces me: for the fear of that, were it at present before my eyes, cannot well parallel what I now feel in my heart. It seems to me my self, that my soul lyes under a cloud, which I cannot dispel; and that my reason does not act so freely as it wont. I find my self sad, inquiet, irresolute; and I believe I grow a coward, without knowing what cause there can be of my sadness, disturbance or fear. He told me many other things to this purpose; and as I could not render him any reason where he knew none himself, himself, I endeavour'd only to remove that trouble which might surprife him, by attributing the change of his humour to fome effect of his temper, rather than to any other caufe. In ſhort, as his courage was above all that may be called great, by the force thereof he diſpell'd thoſe miſts which roſe up to ſmother his repoſe, and trouble the calm of his ſpirit; or at leaſt he conceal'd it in ſuch a manner that Gondioch had never the leaſt knowledge of it.

In the mean time, he that had been ſent to the Cimbrian King return'd, and brought back the ſharpeſt answer could be expected from an enemy obſtinate in his hate and anger. This King, rather incens'd, than dreaded by the loſs he ſuffer'd, calling to his aſſiſtance all his Neighbour-Forces, had already covered with men of Arms all the Countries of his obedience, while the King of the Sueves on his ſide, gather'd together an Army much more puiſſant than that he had before loſt; and both together prepar'd to war with a firm reſolution to ſee the entire ruine of their Kingdoms, rather than make peace with Pharamond or Gondioch: ſo that the Ambaſſadour of the Burgundian King could not have arriv'd at a more inconvenient time, nor have been worſe receiv'd than he was; ſcarce had they hearken'd to his propoſals, but the proud King beholding him with diſdain, Tell the King of the Burgundians (ſaid he) that I will neither have him Son-in-law, Friend, nor Allie: And tell him moreover (added the Prince his Son with a fierce aſpect) that I will bring him an answer to his demands at the head of one hundred thouſand men.

This was all the ſatiſfaction that Gondioch receiv'd by his Embaſſie: but ſince he had never expected better, it ſurprised him not, though it highly incens'd him, and ſoon made him have recourſe to his former reſolutions. That which remain'd of the Winter in a Country where it is very ſharp, was employ'd to put thoſe Levies which were made in the Countries of the Burgundians, the Nubions, Sidenes, Rbugians and Rutilians, who were all ſubjects of Gondioch, into a good equipage; and that they might be ready ſo ſoon as the Seafon permitted him to take the Field; our Army quitted their Winter Quarters, and joyning with thoſe of Gondioch, both together they form'd an Army of one hundred thouſand fighting men. The two Kings placing themſelves in the head of them, with the Princes of their Illuſtrious Blood, and many great perſonages which commanded in their Armies, march'd with an aſſurance which preſaged them the victory, towards the Country of the Bohemians, where the King of the Cimbrians at preſent encamp'd; a Country enrich'd with the waters of the Elba, and environ'd, as with a ſtrong Rampart, with the Hercinian Mountains, and the large Hercinian Forreſt.

This Country was at firſt inhabited by the Tutons: afterwards, the Boyens, a people deſcended from the Gauls, made themſelves Maſters of it, and gave it the name of Boyemia, and by corruption Bohemia, which it keeps to this time; notwithstanding that the Cimbrians making uſe of their ſtrength, inhabited it after the great and bloody loſs they receiv'd againſt the Romans under the conduct of Marius; and from the time of the famous Tentobacus, of whom the Father of Rofamond is deſcended, the Cimbrians have peaceably reign'd over the Bohemians.

We entred into this Country by the foot of thoſe vaſt Mountains at which the Elba takes its ſpring, but not without a great deal of difficulty, and indeed a great deal of Bloodſhed; for we found ſeveral Squadrons at the defence of thoſe paſſages, reſolute to be cut in pieces, rather than quit them. Scarce were we entred, but Prince Theobaldus advanc'd towards us with a flying Army, to amuſe and weary us, rather than fight us, not having order nor intention to come to a Battel, but with the Forces of the Sueves and Cimbrians together: but as the Country was known to him, and he Maſter of all places and paſſages, he annoy'd us very much, and gave the two Kings our enemies time to joyn their Forces in the beſt manner they could deſire. The King of the Sueves was entred into the Territories of the Cimbrians, by the way of the Country of the Dandutes; and advancing with an infinite diligence to the Elba, was without any obſtacle come to the place where the Cimbrian King attended him; and having together paſſed that great River, they march'd towards us with above one hundred thouſand men, beſides that body which Theobaldus commanded apart, and which was compos'd of twenty thouſand men. Neither Pharamond nor Gondioch were aſtoniſhed at the approaches of this Puiſſance; but leaving Prince Marcomire with a body of fifteen thouſand men to oppoſe the Prince of the Cimbrians, they advanc'd with the whole Army towards that which the two Kings in perſon conducted.

This War was cruel and bloody; but I ſhould be tedious, without doubt, and extend my Diſcourſe to an exceſſive length in thoſe things which are leaſt neceſſary for you to know if I ſhould tell you all the particulars. It ſuffices that you underſtand that in theſe these, as in all preceding encounters, victory accompanied Pharamond and his party. The young Marcomire, who had oppos'd himself to the Cimbrian Prince, defeated him in five or six engagements, with a considerable loss; and in many combats in several places of the Bohemian Territories, the advantage remain'd almost continually on our side. In fine, the two Kings our enemies were utterly discomfited by Pharamond and Gondioch in two great Battels, the one on the Banks of Elba, the other in the Plains of Casurgis; and in the last so totally ruin'd, that not being longer able to keep the Field, nor having any place so strong as to oppose the Conquerours, they retir'd into Suevia, where they had yet some refuge, and abandon'd the Country of Bohemia to the discretion of their enemies. 'Tis true, that they were deprived of the means to put themselves into Marobuda, the Capital of that Kingdom, we having gain'd the command of all the passages; or yet to get forth thence the Princess Rosamond, whom the King her Father had left with the Queen her Mother, under the conduct of Briomer, him whom of all his Subjects he had most confidence in, and whom from a very mean Fortune he had rais'd to the highest Dignities of his Realm. The Queen dyed during the War, of the grief, as it was believed, which the ill fortune of her house had rais'd in her thoughts; and the disconsolate Rosamond was left in those tears which this last loss made her joyn to those she still dedicated to the memory of Vindimir, without any other consolation than what she received from the charming Princess of the Sueves, whom the King her Father had sent at the beginning of the War to testify the confidence he had in him, and the desire he preserv'd to unite their houses by a double Alliance, according to the propositions they had formerly made.

'Twas not without great grief that the two Kings were constrain'd to abandon their Daughters to the hazards of war, and particularly Rosamond, who was the motive of it; but besides that the impossibility to succour them made them take this resolution; They hoped that Briomer, whose experience and valour they had known in many adventures, might defend the place till such time as Prince Theobaldus, whom they had sent before into Suevia to hasten those succours they expected, were in a posture to relieve it.

It had been easie for Pharamond and Gondioch to annoy them, and perhaps entirely ruine them in their retreat; but they would not; and instead of living like Enemies or Conquerours in the Country of the Bohemians, they commanded that their Troops should act in all things as if they had been in the Country of an Allie: but as all the thoughts of Gondioch tended to no other thing than the possession of Rosamond, 'twas only the conquest of Rosamond that he endeavour'd; and when he had no longer a Field-enemy to make head against him, addressing himself to Pharamond;

Generous Friend (said he) as it is to you I am bound for all, so it is to you that I would owe, and from you that I would demand all things: our Valour hath made us Conquerours, and the Country of the Cimbrians is ours, or rather yours alone, for you are truly Victor; but you know well that it is neither for glory, nor Empire, but for Rosamond that we fight, and that in doing all things for your own honour, you do nothing for me, if you give me not Rosamond: Fortune is more favourable to our intentions than we could desire; she happily offers us her in this City, which her Father and Brother have abandon'd, and nothing can now oppose my felicity if you still favour it.

Though Pharamond hearken'd to this discourse of Gondioch with some apprehension of grief which oppos'd it self to the joy he had to serve him, yet he consult'd not long what answer to return; but banishing by his generous friendship that unknown reluctance which oppress'd him, Let us go, my Friend, (said he) let us go where the occasions of our repose call us; and since the ways which I judge most consonant to love prove vain to us, let us assault that City wherein your fortune is inclosed, and make our enemies see that the strength of their walls is too feeble to oppose the greatness of your love, or that of your courage.

Gondioch embraced a thousand times my Prince, whom he called his Tutelar Angel, and notwithstanding all that he knew truly great and magnanimous in himself, look'd upon him as a miraculous person, or a divine person; and the same day having given necessary Orders, all the Avenues of Marobuda were block'd up; and two days after, the City besieg'd on all sides. This City which carries the name of the King Marobodes, who in the time of Tiberius commanded over the Sueves and Bohemians, and had unfortunately warred against Arminius, in favour of the Romans, whose Allie he was, is seated in a fair and large Plain on the Banks of the River Elba, which on one side washes the foundations of its walls, the other parts are defended by very strong Fortifications; and besides the number of Inhabitants, which is great, in a Town spacious and well peopled, it was strengthned when we besieged it with a very strong Garrison which the King had left, and furnish'd with all things convenient for its defence, so that it cost us no small trouble; and I must confess that Briomer, to whom the King had trusted the guard of it, with that of the Princess his Daughter, acquitted himself like a man valiant and faithful, and that those who served under him did justly acquire reputation: We being absolute Masters of the Field, possess'd our selves of both sides of the River, to hinder the retreat of the besieged that way (over which they had two great Bridges) as well as by that side next the Land.

The impatience of the enamour'd Gondioch, added incessantly to our endeavours, made us advance in few days farther than we could have hop'd; and the understanding which our King had already in Sieges, as in all other Duties of War, put all things in such a condition as made us not doubt of a happy success. The besieged made several sallies so long as their Forces would permit them; but in a little time their hardiness was repress'd, and they reduced to a necessity to defend their walls, without hazarding farther enterprises. In fine, all things were prepar'd to use the last extremities, and to attacque the City by a general assault: but first my Prince would that Gondioch should summon Briomer to surrender the place, and endeavour to bend the will of the Princess to his favour. The King of the Burgundians did as Pharamond desired, and sent one of his Confidants to tell the Princess that he entreated her to consider, that neither by Birth, Fortune, nor possibly by merit of his person, he was less worthy of her Alliance, than the other Princes which were propos'd to be happy in it: That it was for no other desire than that of conquering her, that he had entred into the estates of her Father; and that if she pleased to agree to the design he had to serve her, he would not only remit to her Father all that the Arms of Pharamond and his had gain'd in his Dominions; but having re-established him in a quiet possession, defend him at the price of his blood against all sorts of enemies, with intention to serve him all the days of his life as his Father, and her as his Sovereign Princess.

But this effect of the submission of Gondioch wrought none over the spirit of the Princess; whose will was wholly conformable to that of the King her Father, and whose mind incens'd by the proceedings of Gondioch, could not consider him but as a mortal enemy; so that having receiv'd an answer full of disdain, both from Rosamond and Briomer, the two Kings prepar'd to give the assault on all sides. It was perform'd as was propos'd; but if the City was vigorously assaulted, it was defended with a courage, not at all inferior to that of the Assailants; and in little time the blood was seen to stream on all sides, and numbers of valiant men tumble without life into the Ditches. The two Kings had two different places to assault, at which they assisted in person: but though Gondioch labour'd and fought on his side with an extraordinary valour, their endeavours little avail'd, and the King of the Burgundians began already to fear the success of the day: but the valiant King of the Franks, who was accusom'd to owe to himself the gain of all Battels, incens'd by the resistance he found, and by the fall of so many of his men, and some of his most considerable Officers, whom he beheld thrown off their Ladders into the Ditches, advanc'd in the end (against the loud entreaties of all his friends, who threw themselves before him, to divert him from so dangerous an enterprise) and placing a Ladder to the Wall, he mounted in the midst of those Arrows, Darts and Stones, which from all sides were tumbled down upon him.

His example made hundreds of others follow him; and after him Prince Marcomire, the courageous Ibere, Genebaud, Merozeus, Charamont, and divers other illustrious men mounting towards the Battlements, seconded their Prince with an admirable valour. They were like ostentives to be deserted by those that followed them: But in the end, that Genius of victory which accompanied him through all, was favourable at this present as in all others, and made him be seen on the top of the Walls, before any of his had got the Battlements. I can give a particular testimony of this action, because I had the honour to mount immediately after him upon the Ladder which he had set; the passion I had for so beloved a Master, not permitting me to distance my self from him at such a time, the least I could possible. 'Twas here that he had his left Arm wounded with an Arrow, and that he had been perhaps in danger to lose his life, if Marcomire, Genebaud and many others, had not gained the Wall, and the enemies affrighted, abandoned it. Pharamond continued still to chase them with his sword in his hand; and when by the diligence which his men testified in following him, he had made himself entire Master of this side of the City, he sent a party to the place which Gondioch assaulted, and caused a gate to be opened unto him, upon the point when he despaired of victory.

Gondioch received this succour with some perplexity, but neglected it not: and to abridge my discourse, the two Kings in a little time became Masters in all quarters of the City,

City, still defending it from slaughter and pillage: and Briomer not being longer able to defend the Palace, yielded it into their hands, with the Princess. The inhabitants knowing themselves bound to their Conquerours for their clemency, laid down their Arms, and received no harm either in their goods or persons.

If the heat of the Combat had hindred my Prince from feeling his wound, when it was somewhat cool, he perceived it by the feebleness it begat; and Gondioch whatsoever delight he took to see Rosamond, yet could not behold so great a friend, and a friend to whom he ought all his fortune, wounded in that manner, without dedicating to him his first care, and endeavouring his safety before all other things. Pharamond, who would not see the afflicted Princess, to whose affliction he had contributed, as well by the death of Vindimir, as by all that he had done against hers during the whole War, and against her self, in this last assault, was not at all dissatisfied with this pretext to be dispens'd with; and to excuse himself to Gondioch, in case he should desire it; nor would he have lodg'd in the Palace, lest his so near approach should prove cause of grief to the Princess: but being extremely wounded, and finding his strength begin to fail through loss of blood, he suffer'd himself to be conducted by those who were near him, who took care to get him to rest, and to search his wound. It was found very great, but not believed dangerous by the most able Chyrurgions employed to work his cure. Instead of afflicting himself at this accident, he prais'd the gods, judging well that they deliver'd him from infinite troubles, to which he thought himself expos'd by the reluctancy he had against all which the friendship of Gondioch had made him act against the Princess of the Cimbrians. Yet he repos'd himself in his care, for the government of all things, as far as they concern'd him; and the care of his Army he left entirely to Prizm and Chiramont, who next the Princess of his blood, were the most considerable persons of all his Subjects, since Eusegastus was absent, whom he had left in Franconia to govern the Realm, as the man of the whole world most capable. He gave order likewise that neither the Princess his Brothers, nor any of his followers, whom he believ'd might be most odious to Rosamond, should present themselves to her sight, for fear of augmenting her affliction by their presence; and he entreated Gondioch not to keep men of war in the City, more than were necessary to keep it in subjection, and to let the Army live in the Country of the Bohemians, as if they were in that of the Burgundians, or in Franconia.

In the mean time, Gondioch had seen the Cimbrian and Suevish Princesses: but as it is not his History which I relate, and that I think it unnecessary to recount the particulars of his adventures, in which my Prince was not interess'd; I will not tell you those of this interview; you shall only understand that it was full of submission on Gondioch's part, and of Majestick anger on that of Rosamond: That the King of the Burgundians endeavour'd to justify his proceedings before her, accusing his love for all things which he had been constrain'd to do to conquer her; but that Rosamond preserving her dignity entire in her utmost misfortunes, treated him in a manner much more severe than when she was free, and he the prisoner of the King her Father: she would scarce hearken to the excuses he endeavour'd to make; yet whatever distaste she had against him, it transported her not to any thing indecent, or contrary to her wisdom and moderation; she was only contented to let him see with a behaviour full of coldness, and some appearances of disdain, that the change of her condition was not able to baffle her resolutions; endeavouring to make him know, that the injury to which she was expos'd by the violence of his Arms, had not the least part in those tears which more just occasions made her shed.

Gondioch had no less admiration at the greatness of her courage, than he had at that of her beauty; and whatever aversion she had testified, he parted from her more passionate, and more lost a thousand times than before: he made it but too much known by all his discourses to my Prince, and by them did not lightly increase those disturbances that oppress'd him. In the mean time he rendred to the Princess all that honour which she could expect from the lowest of her Subjects, and made her be serv'd with the most becoming respect and greatest magnificence she could expect from the King her Father: he sought out with great diligence for all that might please or divert her; and because he knew his sight was not pleasing to her, he refrain'd from seeing her, as much as his passion would permit. Liberty was the only good, which of all things that might be pleasant to her, he offer'd her not, nor was he troubled not to see himself reduc'd to the necessity to refuse it her; for the high-minded Princess scorning to pray, at least to pray in vain to an enemy, neither spoke to him, nor ever caus'd him to be spoke to, nor ever demanded of him the least favour either for her self, or any of her Subjects.

Gondioch had in such manner given his orders, that it seem'd that all persons that observ'd her, approach'd her to do her all honour possible, and not to guard her; and in all their carriages towards her, it appear'd that they not only look'd upon her as free, but as their Sovereign: No person approach'd her Apartment, nor that of the Princess of the Sueves, which was very near hers. That of Pharamond (which as I have told you, he had by reason of his wound, made choice of) was so far distant, as well as that of Gondioch that she could scarce have any knowledge that they were lodg'd in the Palace. She kept her Chamber several dayes, nor had she for a longer time come from it, if some indisposition of the Princess Albisinda had not oblig'd her to take the Air; and because Rosamond would not let her go forth without her, they walked often in a Garden belonging to the Palace, to which they had a passage from their own Apartment, and which truly is one of the most pleasant in the World, not only for its fair and spacious Alleys, where the Trees are of an excessive height, but for a great number of pleasant Fountains; a Wood embellish'd with many Arbours, and a magnificent Terrass, which advances it self over the Banks of the Elba, and from whence the Prospect extends not only over the River, but over all the Neighbouring Fields.

In this place, the two fair Princesses used often to consume their sad thoughts: and the Sister of Vundimir had this consolation, to see that the tears she dedicated to the memory of her Brother, were often accompani'd with those of that Divine Prince, whom he adored, whilst he was among men, and to whom her precious remembrance would give more glory in the second life, than he could have had of happiness in the first. At these times, the persons to whom the guard of Rosamond was committed, acquitted themselves with as much civility as it was possible; and contenting themselves to observe the Gates of the Garden, and those places which might give them any suspect, they left to the Princess the liberty of a full retirement.

In the mean time, by the diligence of those persons who had care of my Master's wound, it was brought in few dayes to a good degree of recovery, and in a few more they permitted him to quit his Bed, and walk up and down the Chamber. Gondioch, who concern'd himself much in his safety, came often to visit him; and gave him an account with infinite grief, of the little progress he had made in gaining the affection of the cruel Rosamond; drawing with his sighs those of Pharamond to accompany them, whilst he attributed to compassion that, which my Prince himself could not attribute to any cause known to himself. He comforted the afflicted King with all those words which his friendship could furnish him with; and with making him hope that time would sweeten the spirit of the Princess, he continually prayed him to make use of mildness, where violence would be much more odious than any thing in the World: and in the mean time, as he saw himself with reluctance in the House of a Princess, to whose miseries he had contributed by so many dire effects, and to whose Beauty (though he knew it not but by what fame had spread abroad of it) all the World ow'd a veneration; so he prepar'd himself to depart, and retire himself to the Place where his Troops were quartered, to soon as his health would permit him; he likewise commanded the Princes his Brother's to retire, not keeping about him more than such Officers as were necessary for his service.

In the end, he believed himself able to walk abroad; and seeing that from his Apartment he might enter into the Garden, the Beauties of which he had discovered from his Chamber-window; one day compell'd by his Destiny, and spurred on by that Genius which guided him to his misfortunes; he departed from his Chamber, and commanding me only to follow him, he descended without other company into the Garden. He was walking in one of the Alleys, nearest to the utmost bounds of it, and which as all the rest led to the Terrass; and from that Alley passing up to the Terrass by five or six ascents, he marched gently along by a Balustrade of Marble, which on the side of the River reaches from one end to the other: Casting his eyes sometimes upon the River, and the Fields which are discovered from thence, and sometimes upon the Garden, whose Beauties were sufficient to arrest his sight. 'Twas a long time that he thus walk'd without speaking to me so much as one word, a thing not ordinary with him; and in his words and all his Actions, there appeared to me more reservedness and melancholy than I had ever observ'd: I was much troubled at it, and had, it may be hazarded the liberty he had given me to inform my self of the cause, when he prevented me, and beholding me with a sigh, which seem'd to dissipate part of that cloud hung over his eyes:

Cleomer (said he) you see it may be with some astonishment that I am to day more pensive and more reserved than ordinary; but you will perhaps be more astonish'd, when I shall have told you the cause, which I dare not declare to any other person but your self, for fear to have my folly laugh'd at, in avowing that a Dream can give me so much disturbance, and almost beget a sadness: I should without doubt mock another, whom I should find guilty of the same folly;

ly; and I affirm that the Dream I have had could not be able to move me, had it not been attended with several other apprehensions, which since we first made War against the Bohemians; seemed to foretel me some misfortune: and more it is, that the place where now we are, puts me in mind again of the particulars of my Dream, and figures to me what my imagination did represent. It was then this Morning, at the hour when 'tis said Dreams have the most agreement with truth, that in a place little different from this, I saw an Eagle-Royal descend with an inexpressible Violence from Heaven upon me, and snatch my heart from its place, before I could put my self in a posture to oppose its fury: it seemed likewise that my inclinations, as well as my strength, would have stood me in little stead to oppose it; for the heavenly Bird was so far, that I strove with all my power to follow it, and saw without any regret my bloody heart in its Talons, though I was very sensible of the wound it had given me. I struggled as you know men do in vain in their Dreams, and I lamented that weight which hindered me from raising my self up against it, when it made me understand, not with a cry like to Birds of its kind, but with a voice clear and intelligible, which pronounced distinctly these words:

Thou hast cruelly made War against me, thou hast spilt my blood, and ruin'd my Royal Seat: but I will revenge my self of thy cruelty by a thousand Deaths which I will make thee feel, not being able to revenge so many injuries with one death alone.

Scarce were these words pronounced, but I saw this unfortunate heart torn by the Talons and the Beak of the Bird; and though it was out of its place, I felt every blow which it received throughout all my body, with grief which cannot be expressed, and it is possible less in the truth itself, than in many a Dream.

Whilst my Prince spake to me in this manner, we were descended from the Terrace into the Wood: and he had without doubt continued his discourse, but that approaching to a Fountain which was near that place, we heard some voices very nigh us, and heard them so clearly, that by the sound we might discern them to be Women. The King stopt so soon as he heard them, fearing lest it should be the two Princesses, to whom he had given so great occasion of resentment against him; and as he had resolv'd not to present himself to them, nor to aggravate their grief by his presence, he would presently have returned back, and shunned by his retirement the danger of encountering them. Having a while struggled with his thoughts what course he was to take, he remained firm in his design not to let himself be seen by them; but having heard those wonders published of Rosamond's Beauty, with which the whole World is fill'd, and which have a strong power over the spirit of a young man; or to speak better, he being solicited by his evil Genius, would endeavour to see her without shewing himself to her; and it was the conveniency of the place, as well as any other reason that inspir'd him with this design. The Fountain near which we heard the sound of these voices, is on one side of the Wood, in a place where many little Allies joyn, but somewhat distant from the great ones: encircled it was with many fair Trees, under whose shade was to be seen a very fair Basin supported by a Basis of Marble, in the middle of which was another raised, which received the water spouting up to the height of the neighbouring Trees, and falling down again to the lower by many streams in different pleasing figures: there was a large space to walk about the Fountain, defended from the beams of the Sun, as well by the high branches of the Trees which shade it to the very foot, as by those smaller branches covered with leaves to the very root, which being pruned with a great deal of art, make a kind of Palisadoe, thick and unpassable, which robs the sight of the Fountain from all parts but by those Avenues which lead to it.

'Twas this that made Pharamond enterprize to approach, judging that making through these little branches a small passage for his sight, he might without being perceived content his curiosity; and to this effect, leaving me in a place where I might advertise him, and hinder his being surpris'd in an action, which though innocent in it self, seemed to him somewhat criminal, he advanced with the least noise possible to the utmost of the Trees which form the Circle, and approaching with his eye to the little branches, he gently removed those leaves that oppos'd his sight, and found in the end such a passage for it as he could desire, to discern with facility all that was done about the Fountain: and his ill fortune would that the persons whom he least sought which were the Ladies attending on the two Princesses, were on the farther side of the Fountain, so that he could not but see them imperfectly; but they whose sight was to prove so fatal, were placed directly against him on the benches framed at the foot of the Basis, having their faces turned entirely towards him, without depriving him of the least part of his observation. Albifinda had leaned her head against the Basis of the Fountain, and Rosamond's was rested on her shoulder, in a posture full of languishment and negligence.

'Tis now, my Lord, that I dese all my Forces, to represent to you either what was this fight, or what the effect it produced in my Prince's soul: he only of all the World can possibly make you comprehend either what he saw, or what he felt at this fatal view. 'Tis most certain, that as Nature had never created any thing so fair, as to approach the Divine Beauties of Rosamond, so it was impossible for any humane eye to behold such a sight, and not be struck with astonishment, and surpris'd with admiration: but would to God the astonishment and admiration had been the whole effect, and that this poor Prince had not been utterly lost, as he presently and entirely was at this unfortunate sight.

Not that it had not been too difficult for him to defend himself, or that I did not hope that you would excuse his misery, could I find my self capable to describe to you those Celestial Beauties which cast him into this deplorable estate. All that Nature hath formed of the most lively and most resplendent whiteness, will without doubt lose all its glory, if compar'd with the complexion of Rosamond: and that whiteness which darts a brightness not to be endur'd by the sight, in those places where it ought to be mixed with another colour, is accompanied with those separations which Art seems to have laid; so much is Nature made ruddy with the most lively Carnation in the World, and the most sweet together: that of her lips is the most-excellent, and in the little space which it covers, are compris'd a thousand Beauties most remarkable to the eye, which neither Discourse nor Art can represent: but those of her eyes, have without doubt something in them more puissant, and less proportionable to our imagination; as their colour is like to that of the Heavens, their motion seems Celestial, nor move they by a less than Heaven-like power to the safety or ruine of mankind: if joy for some time graces them with their natural serenity, they display a brightness clearer than the day; if grief makes them languish or shed tears, even in those showres, and in their languor, they have a charm so puissant, that it not only creates like passions in other hearts, but imprints them therein with so much violence, that all the assistance of reason can but in vain defend them; or if they be inflamed with anger (as we have too often proved that anger can inflame them) the flashes and lightnings of Heaven are much less formidable than theirs, and nothing but stupidity can then beget a courage: But whether serene, languishing, or incens'd they appear, they are still equally to be ador'd, and in their ordinary estate they have a fire so piercing, that no humane eye can support it; and in the contrary to their natural fierceness, an insinuating sweetness which troubles the reason, and penetrates the most concealed places of the soul. All the features of her Visage are formed with a most just, delicate and regular proportion; and those hairs which accompany it of the colour of an Olive, much more sweet than the black, much more lively than the fair, and incomparably more excellent than either. Her beauteous Head is planted on a Neck which nothing can parallel, either for excellency of form, or dazzling whiteness, if a perfection more accomplish'd be not found in the beauties of her Breasts and Hands. They who among Ladies envy would employ to seek some default in the Beauties of Rosamond, have only said that she was too great: it is most certain that her stature is as much above that of ordinary Women, as that of Pharamond is above the common sort of men; but few persons have been of their opinion; but in stead of looking upon this excess which they find in the stature of Rosamond as a fault, they have found it necessary to perfect her Beauty, seeing that with its height her person is most straight, most free, and most delicate; her deportment so noble, her walk and all her actions so excellent, that the Majesty of her Face could not be accompani'd with a more suitable Body, nor the delicateness of a Beauty the most regular in the World, meet in the same person with so stately and Royal a Majesty.

This admirable Princess, yet a thousand times more fair than my weak Discourse can describe her, seem'd to the eyes of my Prince that which she truly is, that is to say, much more than I have represented her; and this brightness did strike him like lightning, or something more violent, astonishment possessing all his soul before he could come to feel the other effects of this unhappy sight. All that he had heard of the beauties of Rosamond, could not present her such to his imagination as she now appeared to be in truth; and though he was at present astonished at that divine splendour which seem'd to shine about her visage, the fire that pass'd from the eyes of Rosamond to his, seem'd to open and clear them, the more to make him at once observe all her beauties. And he too readily observ'd, and too soon knew them: for by this fatal knowledge he soon saw himself expos'd to all those miseries which have since till now turnoy'd his deplorable life; yet at first he seem'd to dedicate himself wholly to admiration and not perceiving at all the tract of his wound, he received through his eyes with pleasure that poyson which insensibly infected his heart; but as his wound was not of the nature of those which could remain any long time without out being felt, he found in short time the mortal blow, and observ'd that he did not only admire, but violently and passionately lov'd, before he had any knowledge of his love or passion. Though his misery was with sweetness crept into his bosome, he was with infinite grief soon sensible of it; yet advancing his reason to his assistance, he endeavour'd with all the force of it to combat such an Enemy: he would have fled from the place where he was, to seek in his flight a safety which he could not find in such a Combat; but he in vain essay'd it, and chains more strong than all he could find, stopp'd his body in a place where they had already arrested his noblest part, his soul.

So soon as he found himself vanquish'd, he sigh'd sighs proceeding from love and grief together, and gently lifting up his eyes towards Heaven; O gods (said he to himself) is this then that heavenly Bird which ought to attacke my heart? And is this then that misfortune, with which so many forbodings have threatned me? His eyes were not the only causers of his misery; his ears contributed, by the attention they lent to the entertainment of the two fair Princesses; I say, the two fair Princesses: for most certain it is, that the beauty of Albisinda is such, that it is able to obscure any other beauty but that of Rosamond; and that in any other place but near the Princess of the Cimbrians, there is no person but would admire it, and few but would be forc'd to love it. They entertained themselves with a great deal of liberty, not believing themselves listned to by any person, but with an infinite languor, and marks of a profound sadness. Their countenances and all their actions testifi'd it too visibly; and after that discourse, to which the first amazement of my Prince had not permitted him to lend attention, the fair Princess of the Cimbrians pursuing that which in likelihood she had before begun, with a voyce accompani'd with a charm equal to that of her person:

It is most true (said she to Albisinda) that the first affection I had for your Brother, was only an effect of my Duty; and that the humour which you know in me, had not been easily engaged without the commandment of the King my Father: but in the end, the noble qualities of that poor Prince, and the marks which he gave me of such an affection as I desired in him, made me approve the choice of the King with all my inclinations, and made me feel at his death that grief which we cannot but be sensible of, as at the loss of those persons which have been extremely dear to us. O happy Vindimir (said the Princess of the Sueves with a sigh) to what glorious Fortune wert thou reserv'd, if a cruel hand had not cut the thread of thy blooming dayes? And what happiness art thou yet possessor of, since, though amongst the dead, thou canst merit the tears and the remembrance of Rosamond? But my Sister (for it was by the name of Sister, that by reason of their Friendship, the hope of their future Alliance, and by the commandment of their Fathers, they called each other) admire not at all (added the Princess of the Cimbrians) at the fantastick humour of our destinies, which to render us miserable, will not use ordinary wayes, nor common persons: for in the end, since we ought not to rob our Enemies of that praise is due to them, besides, what may be said with truth of Gondioch, who hath persecuted me with an odious love, and who after having chased my Father from his estates, keeps me captive in the Palace of my Ancestors: besides, I say, that which Fame reports of him to be valiant, generous and truly great in all things, it is no less certain, at least if the report spread through the World be conformable to truth, that this Pharamond, who hath made us all miserable, for greatness of mind, Valour, Courage, Clemency, Liberality, and all other excellent Virtues, is the most accomplished amongst men, and one whom the whole World speaks of as a man miraculous in all things. And yet this Pharamond, adored by the rest of the World, is the same who deprived of life your Brother, who was destined to be my Spouse, who in the Country of the Burgundians defeated the Armies of our Fathers, who dyed the Earth with the blood of so many thousands of our Subjects, who hath chased away our Fathers by so many bloody Victories, who by so many dire effects caused the death of the Queen my Mother, whose affliction would not let her survive the ruine of her House, and who to accomplish these Cruelties, hath himself forced these Walls, and made me a Captive to Gondioch.

The remembrance of these injuries were so sensibly apprehended by the desolate Rosamond, that she could not speak them without letting fall some tears from her eyes; and every one like an Arrow pierced through the heart of my Prince that listen'd to her, and who for those tears of Chrystal which she spilt, shed drops of blood. Alas, with what a sadness was his soul surpris'd, at this reproach which she made him of so many cruel injuries! And with what regret did he make reflection on the fatal occasions which had reduc'd him to this misery! O Fortune void of pity! (said he to himself) was it necessary then that I should act so many outrages against a Princess whom I ought to adore? Or oughtst thou make me adore her, after having committed so many outrages against her?

Whilst he in this manner felt that tempest arising in his breast which was prepar'd to disturb disturb the repose of his life, the afflicted Princess, dryed her tears by the assistance of Albifinda, who gathered them in her handkerchief, though she let those stream down her cheeks, which common interest, or the example of her friend made distil, and answer'd to her discourse with a sweetness which she had naturally wholly charming.

It is true my Sister (said she) that I have often made reflection, as well as you, on this particularity of our misery, and have often accused Fortune for not giving us enemies which we might as well disdain as hate; but, my Sister, whatsoever she can do for the glory of our enemies, or whatever Fame hath publish'd for their advantages, if it be not too much deceitful in what it hath made us understand of my Brother which yet remains, I hope that you will not affirm that all glory and virtue is only compris'd in the person of Pharamond: you have often heard speak of the advantages of his person, and have had some knowledge of his Renown spread through the world, few persons in the Universe have acquir'd the like without any assistance of Fortune; and though alone and unknown in strange Countries, where his disgrace hath made him wander, he hath made himself known by such resplendent actions as have already given him a name great among men, I cannot as his Sister speak more with modesty: but since he hath the happiness to be called by our Fathers to the glory destined to his Brother, and that he ought soon come, and at your feet seek occasions to merit it. ———

Alas! said Pharamond (whom the new trouble he found arising in his mind, permitted not the patience to hearken to the rest of this discourse) can it then be that I am already threatned with the coming of this proud Rival, this happy Brother destin'd to the glory of Viridimir? shall I not have in Gondioch a Rival sufficiently formidable, and a Rival much more to be dreaded for our friendship than any other can be, armed with all the power of Europe?

He had suffer'd himself longer to be transported with these thoughts, if he had not observed Rosamond about to answer to the discourse of Albifinda; and enforcing himself to listen to her, I know well, my Sister (said she) that all the praises you can give to the Prince Viridomar, are legitimately his due; nor am I ignorant of the marvellous reports spread about the world of his Renown: I bear as great a part in them as you, and I should infinitely desire his return, if we were in an estate to hope for any success by it: but, my Sister, if I may with freedom speak to you, I find little in my heart which can dispose me to a second affection, after such misfortunes in my first; and though Viridomar might expect all things from his merit, yet he might travel perhaps in vain, if I did not owe all things to our friendship, or if I were not resolv'd to obey exactly the will of my Father.

Pharamond could have stay'd all the day attentive to the conversation of the two Princesses, and fix'd to the consideration of those fatal beauties which had already bound him with an indissoluble chain; but some time after, they rose from their seats, and having made a turn about the Fountain, took their walk to the other side of the Garden; and in going, Rosamond gave the passionate Prince the liberty to view the beauty of her stature, which he could not entirely behold in the posture she before was in. Pharamond follow'd them not only with his eyes, but he found his heart flee after them, and force his body with an unknown violence to run after what he ador'd. Yet his reason was strong enough to hinder him, and to make him consider that he ought not to buy the joy he had again to see her, with the displeasures his presence might give her; he therefore stopt himself near the Fountain, marking the place where a little before he had seen the Princess seated, and by the effect of a passion which began already to disturb his reason, stooping down his lips, he kiss'd with a transportation of mind, which he could not master, the cold Marble against which Rosamond had lean'd: he at length seated him in the same place, and casting his eyes towards Heaven, with an aspect truly deserving pity, he began to consider the strange change of his condition.

I was now drawn near to him, having seen the Princesses pass on the other side, and I straight marked an alteration in his countenance which astonish'd me; the trouble of his soul was amply denoted in his eyes; and in all his actions there appeared somewhat so much of change, and so extraordinary, that I immediately judg'd some accident was befallen him, and by the same spread abroad of the divine beauties of Rosamond, I guess'd a part of the truth. In the mean time, I heard him sigh in such a manner, and saw such marks in him of violent agitation of spirit, that I could not refrain from demanding the cause, with all those arguments which my faithful affection could furnish me with: but so soon as I was about to open my mouth, stopping me at my first words, Cleomer (said he) I am not, demand no more, but prepare thy self to see signs much more fatal than those thou ever hast observ'd in my countenance.

He accompanied these words with so many sighs, that my heart was sensibly touch'd with with compassion, and I in a moment confirm'd in the suspicion which I had : but a little after, looking on me with a passionate aspect, in the extremest excess; I have seen Rosamond (said he) this is to tell thee all my fortune; the rest is well known to thee, and too well known to my self: would to God I were ignorant of it. I should yet perhaps have sufficient courage to receive the love of Rosamond, as a glorious misery; but I have not enough to remember, without dying, those injuries I have done her; nor so much sickness, as to forget that I am as much the friend of Gondioch, as I am detested by Rosamond.

He had scarce ended these words, but the place shone with a new light; for we might see the two Princesses with their Ladies near us, before we perceived their arrival. They were about at first to have taken another walk; but having teen appear at the end of an Alley, some men whom they took for Gondioch and his train, they were returned back to thun their meeting, and had taken their walk towards this same Fountain which they had before quitted. Pharamond seem'd utterly astonish'd at this second sight of Rosamond; and such was the trouble that seiz'd him, that he could scarce raise himself with all his force, from the place he was seated on, but sustain'd himself against the Basis of the Fountain, with the countenance of a man depriv'd of sense.

But if the return of Rosamond wrought this effect upon my Prince, the whole person of Pharamond was compos'd in such sort, that it was difficult at first sight of him not to be surpris'd. He was not yet arrived to twenty two years of age, nor had his discontents yet wrought any change in his face; so that that aspect in which you have possibly marked something more than extraordinary; That sweet and charming Majesty of a countenance form'd with an admirable proportion; Those comely and long locks that flow'd in great curls upon his shoulders: That stature tall, straight and free: That noble port and carriage, above that of common men, could not at an instant appear before the eyes of Rosamond, without giving her some astonishment and surprize. Moreover, as he was always magnificent in all things, and that his magnificence, though without any affect'dness, extended to his habits; that which he had this day on, shone with gold and precious stones, with which it was enrich'd; and particulary a fair Scarf, which he carried to rest his Arm, yet feeble and weak by reason of the wound he had receiv'd: so that all these things could not present themselves to the eyes of the two Princesses without surprizing them, and begetting in them a consideration for a person of so Heroick an appearance. Their countenances sufficiently testified their surprize; and whatever desires they might have to seek out solitude, the rencounter of a man so extraordinary forc'd them to stop, and to behold him with some attention.

Pharamond with infinite pain supported the looks of Rosamond, either too feeble to withstand her power, or by reason of the reproach he felt in his soul for the miseries he had done her: and if with an ill assur'd countenance he for some time fixed his eyes on her resplendent beauties, he incontinently after let them fall to the ground, with all the marks of fear and confusion. He would have retired from her presence, to give this satisfaction to the resentment she had against him; but his love refus'd to be obedient to his desires, and his body more complacent to the one than the other, could not depart from a place where a violent passion held it so firmly fix'd.

Nor was Rosamond during this time without some trouble: for having let her eyes run over and over a person so extraordinary, and perhaps the only person she had ever found worthy her consideration, she began to lose that patience which had made her so long time behold him, and in a time wherein it rather seem'd that her discontents should stop her eyes to all sorts of objects; so that entring into a kind of choler, that he had not quitted the place, and retired from the Fountain so soon as he saw her approach, and breaking silence in a majestick manner; And what are you? (said she) you that by your presence hinders the repose and solitude of the Captives of Gondioch? She had scarce spoken these words, but she repented them, judging by all demonstrations that a person so extraordinary could be no other than Pharamond, whom her own miseries had so well fixed in her mind, and whom she had heard described for such as he now appeared. His admirable figure, his royal port, the magnificence of his habit, the marks of his wound; and in fine, all things made him be known for what he was: but she was soon confirmed by the countenance of my Prince, who maugre the greatness of his courage, had not the assurance to answer to the demand she made, but keeping a trembling silence, seem'd to seek words to defend himself before a terrible Judge, and to fear more than the most cowardly spirits have feared the most formidable death.

Rosamond for some time beholding his behaviour perhaps with much different motions; but in the end, permitting her choler to succeed to those doubts she had dilipated; Ab

(said she) I doubt no more; I know thee by too many tokens, for the cruel author of our misfortunes: shame perhaps hinders thy confessing it; but whether thou regardest me as the Captive of Gondioch, or thine, thou canst not defend thy self from shame, which the remembrance of thy crimes ought to involve thee in.

Having ended these words, she would have retired, if Albisinda, whose soul was compos'd of sweetness, and who in despite of the hatred she bore the name of Pharamond, could not but find those charms in his person, which blotted out a part of her disgust, had not stay'd her, to make her hear his answer; and it was in a time when Pharamond, subduing with all his courage that fear which had tyed his tongue, found both assurance and words; and lifting his eyes towards those fair eyes which he adored; Divine Princess, (said he) neither the confusion you may mark in my countenance, nor any other reason can dispense with my obedience to you; and whatsoever effect my confession may produce, I am constrain'd to tell you the truth, 'Tis for some time, that I have been Pharamond; but at present, I know not what I am; and changing condition, I have almost forgot my name: hitherto perhaps I might have owned it without shame; but before you, great Princess, I confess that I do with difficulty pronounce it, and begin to be odious to my self, since I began to see you. Would to God that the first blow of this sword which I unfortunately carry by my side, had pierc'd my heart, and that with some honour which it hath given me among men, I had lost this miserable life, before I had fallen into those dire occasions of offending you. I would endeavour to justify my intentions, if I were not too guilty by the effects; and I could say, if it were permitted me, that Vindimir lost his life in assaulting mine; that I was oblig'd by honour and friendship to succour my friend and Allie against his enemies; and that in the last injury you have receiv'd from our Arms, I only had a design to serve a lover which adores you; but not to offend a Princess adored by my friend, and worthy the admirations of the whole world: But in sum, I cannot be innocent, since I have unhappily contributed to your miseries; and I owe at least all my blood to the tears I have made you shed: I would give it with an excess of joy, if by its loss I could appease your anger, but all reparations I can give of those wrongs I have done you, can neither blot them out of your memory, nor merit your pardon.

My Prince spok'e in this manner with a behaviour, which as well as his discourse expressed the internal motions of his soul; and the Princess, who hearkned to him, finding so much reason in his language, and so much grace in the person of him that utter'd it, could scarce preserve all her anger; and possibly she had lost a part of it, had she had the patience to hear him longer: but opposing her self with some violence to those charms that began to seduce her, she recalled in a moment all her grief and all her choler, and regarding the Prince with eyes which seem'd to dart Thunder and Lightning; Neither dost thou descend from the blood of Hector (said she) nor art thou worthy of those advantages, which Heaven and Fortune give thee. Any other but thou, would have been contented to have deprived a Prince of his life, who was destin'd my Spouse: to have slain two hundred thousand of our Subjects, reduc'd me under the power of our enemies, without aggravating my griefs, or augmenting the miseries of my Captivity, by the odious presence of the cruel author of my misfortunes: But since thou art not satisfied with such bloody injuries, finish that thou hast so well begun, and by a blow worthy of thy hand, give the blood of Rafamond to Gondioch since thou canst not give him her heart nor her affection. Go, Barbarian (added she with a voice somewhat more rais'd) trouble no more by thy sight, that little repose thou leavest to thy Captives; and if thou fearest neither the anger of the gods which can revenge, nor that of men, who perhaps will arm themselves in my quarrel, blush at least to death, for shame to have employ'd thy Arms and thy valour, for the persecution and ruine of a Sex, which thou oughtest to respect and defend to death.

Being finish'd these words, she retired with Albisinda and her Ladies, and left the desolate Pharamond in an extremity of grief so terrible and prelling, that there wanted but little, that the violence of it had not made him lose his reason and knowledge; he had not fire enough able to sustain his body, but fell from the basis, against which he would have leaned, upon the Benches underneath, where he remain'd in a condition so deplorable, as if the Heavens had been Brass to him, the Air cover'd with darkness, the whole earth scarce able to uphold him, or as if all things had conspired to cast him into an Abyss of grief, not to be either express'd or apprehended.

I protest (said Constance, interrupting the discourse of Cleomer) that this beginning of the misfortunes of Pharamond hath something in it of most admirable; and I apprehend part of the grief he felt from thence, by what you have let me know by the recital you have made. This is but the beginning, my Lord, (replied Cleomer) but you will see in the pursuit adventures without doubt more worthy of your pity and attention.

The end of the first Book of the second Part.

PHARAMOND:

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

THe words of the incens'd Princess pierc'd so far into the heart of the King of the Franks, that he could scarce with all his courage support the cruel grief they caus'd: he remain'd upon the seats, and leaning against the Basis of the Fountain, in the posture of an amaz'd person, or of a person to whom reason had scarce left any Function free: Sometimes he held his eyes fix'd upon Heaven, with an aspect craving pity; and sometimes he let them fall to the earth, or permitted them gently to wander over the opposite objects: but in all their motions they had something to direct, that I could not see him in that estate without fearing some ill event. He for a long time kept silence, but a silence much more doleful than all the complaints he could have made; for instead of his defective tongue, his heart spoke with those sighs and sobs which issued in multitudes from his breast. But when his grief permitted him to speak, lifting his eyes up towards Heaven;

Alas (cried he) into what an abyss of miseries and borrow am I unfortunately tumbled! And what merciful Deity will lend me a hand to deliver me? Oh! my too true dream: Ah! too kind forewarning. Why hearkned I not to you? And why shunn'd I not, by your inspiration, the most horrible misfortunes into which ever man was precipitated? He stopt some moments at this first thought; but a little after, through the trouble which his new passion caus'd in his soul, speaking to the Princess, as if she had been present; You are not just, (said he) you are not just, Divine Princess, to chase from you this Barbarian, who hath employed all his valour to render you unfortunate: for a man so worthy of your anger, is neither worthy of the light of your fair eyes, nor the light of the day. Happy Vindimir (added he a little after) thy condition is far better than mine; for if both the one and the other have drawn tears from the beauteous Rosamond: those which she hath shed for thee, are glorious to thy memory; but those which I have made her distil, are the disgrace of my days, and the troubles of my repose.

From the remembrance of Rosamond, he pass'd to that of Gondioch; and finding both in the one and the other an equal unhappiness in relation to himself; Oh Gondioch! (said he) is it possible that after having travell'd to make thee fortunate, by those effects which render me miserable, I should become most unhappily thy Rival? A Rival without hope, or without the very desire to be happy to thy prejudice. Oh hatred of Rosamond! Oh friendship of Gondioch! which of you is the most cruel to me? Or by which of you am I become most unfortunate, either by the friendship of Gondioch, or the hatred of Rosamond? I see well (added he) that I owe my life both to the one and the other; and as I ought without doubt rather to lose it than offend the Amity I owe to Gondioch, so I should give it without regret, to repair those injuries I have done Rosamond.

He discours'd in this manner, with thoughts pressing him to the consideration of his misery; and I doubt not at all but that he had so pass'd the rest of the day, if I had not advertis'd him that I saw the King of the Burgundians who sought him, and who with a great number of other persons was coming to the place where we were. Oh! Gondioch, (said he with a sigh, when he heard me pronounce his name) how cruel is thy friendship? Or how happy had I been, if I had lost my life in thy quarrel, rather than fallen into that misery, into which thou hast precipitated me? Finishing these words, he rose from the place where he was seated, and not finding himself in a condition to endure the conversation of Gondioch or any other person, he endeavour'd to avoid it; and retiring by the least frequented Alleys, passing out of the Garden, he entred his own apartment, and shutting himself into his Closet, gave me order to say that he repos'd, and to pray those that came to see him, to give him liberty to dedicate the rest of the day to some indisposition he felt. Gondioch came soon after; but understanding from me what he commanded me should be known of his intention, would not abuse the priviledge, which either his degree or their friendship gave him, but was the first to order others to leave him to the repose he desir'd.

But certainly, instead of finding any repose in this retirement, to which my Prince confin'd himself till the following day, he was rather encounter'd by a cruel War; and all the enemies he had fought in so many great encounters, seem'd little terrible in comparison of the enemy he now combated. In vain did he oppose a passion (which the first day of its birth had all the force which time could give to the most grown and most violent) by all that his reason could present to his assistance: for all the effects of his reason, and all those of his courage, were equally unprofitable; and having tormented himself the rest of the day, and the night following, with such turbulent fancies as permitted him not the least moment of sleep, he drew no other fruit from this torment he had given himself, but a more clear knowledge of that misery he had conceiv'd with confusion: and at the return of the day, he not only found himself more passionately amorous of Rosamond, than he had been at that moment he last ceas'd from seeing her; but he knew well that all the hatred she had for him, and all the friendship he had for Gondioch, could not restrain him from loving her to the last minute of his life: he resolv'd however (by a resolution not easily taken by any other virtue than his) to support constantly that misery into which he was thrown, without seeking to comfort himself by any thought that might reproach his friendship; and remain miserable until death, rather than disturb the fortunes or hopes of his friend: but as he suffer'd not only by his love, and that that passion had joyn'd to his torment, the grief he had to have contributed to the misfortunes of Rosamond, or rather to have entirely caus'd them; he resolv'd to seek some comfort to this grief, without seeking any for his love, and if it were possible to put an end to the miseries of Rosamond, without promising to himself any other advantages, but that of appearing less criminal to her. In this design he prepar'd in the best manner he could possible to act, what he believ'd he ought to do; and driving away by a force worthy of his courage, that which he felt most violent on his soul, he put himself in a condition to see his friends, and to execute a part of what he had resolv'd.

To this purpose he prepar'd to go see Gondioch: at what time he saw him enter into his Chamber, he endeavour'd to receive him after his accusom'd manner; but howsoever he strove to dissemble what he felt, he could not hinder Gondioch from observing some alteration in his countenance. After they had talk'd together for some time in the Chamber, they pass'd into an adjoining Gallery: the persons that attended them, staying at the entrance, to give them the liberty to walk and entertain themselves. So soon as they had walked a turn or two, the King of the Burgundians, whose soul as well as my Master's was fill'd with the Idea of Rosamond, stopping on a sudden, and fixing his eyes upon the countenance of Pharamond, with a passionate behaviour: And well (said he) you have seen Rosamond; and more, she hath seen you, spoke to you, and known you. That which you say is truth (replyed my Prince very coldly) and against my intentions I have seen the Princess Rosamond. I know not (replyed Gondioch with a sigh) if I ought to rejoyce at this adventure: this view was sufficiently dangerous to make me fear some dire effects, both for you and me; but at least I can hope this advantage, that you will excuse, better than you have for the time past, all that my love hath made me suffer, or enterprise for this beauty. I excuse too much (replyed my Prince) the love you bear her, and doubt not but in all other breasts she may kindle a flame as great as she hath in yours: but Gondioch, I cannot excuse that which you have done against her, and the injuries which you have made her sensible of.

My heart is sensible of them (replyed the King of the Burgundians) and I could willingly have spar'd them with the loss of the best part of my blood; but you know too well that I tried all other ways before I attempted those extremities which might displease her; and that it was not but with an irresistible violence that I was reduc'd to this cruel necessity. Ah Gondioch (said Pharamond, with a sigh which he could not hold) we ought to dye rather than offend Rosamond.

He spoke these words with an aspect so passionate, and after a manner so extraordinary, that Gondioch was strangely surpris'd; and instead of replying to him, he fix'd his eyes upon him, and beheld him like a man whose amazement had tyed his Tongue. The King of the Franks easily perceiv'd the effect which his discourse produc'd in the soul of Gondioch; but being resolv'd to pursue his intention, he stopt not at those marks which he saw in his face of the trouble of his soul, but taking advantage at the attention he gave to the discourse he had to make; "I see well (said he) that my proceeding surpris'es you, and that you would expect any thing else from me rather than the counsel I ought to give you, and the Prayers I am constrain'd to make you: but Gondioch, my Brother, my real Friend, if you have thought for the time past that your interests have been considerable to me; in the name of the gods, and by the remembrance of all our friendship, hearken, and receive as you ought to receive the discourse of a friend, who prefers your satisfaction before the whole comfort of his life; You love the Princess of the Cimbrians, and you desire nothing more passionately than to be lov'd by her, and yet you have committed against her the great'st offences she could possibly receive from her most cruel enemies: I doubt not but that you have a lively repentance in your soul; nor should I ever have comfort in my life, if I had done that for my own interest, which I have done for yours. In fine, the Princess you adore is by your Arms, and by you, the most infortunate and disconsolate person on the earth; her Country blushes on all sides with the blood of her people; her Father is driven from his estates, and she is a Captive, she her self, of a man who says, and truly is her Captive. Repair, since it is in your power, repair so many cruel injuries by an action worthy of your virtue, and more worthy of your love than those which we have done; and since you cannot doubt but that it is by you that Rosamond is miserable, do you generously end her miseries by sending back her Father into that Throne from whence you have chas'd him, and restoring to her that precious liberty, for the loss of which she hath shed so many tears. For you cannot be ignorant that those injurious ways must needs be more unprofitable with her than submission and sweetness, and that if you can hope to bend her, it will be rather by shewing marks of your repentance, than by a perseverance in eternal injuries: her high and noble soul, which rigor cannot touch, will be sweetned without doubt by some effects of your love, as much as it is incens'd by oppression and violence; and if that fail, yet you will have at least this satisfaction in your mind, not to be longer guilty towards her, nor to merit her hatred if you cannot obtain her love.

Pharamond had farther pursued his design to persuade Gondioch, but that Prince, who had with impatience hearkned to his discourse, could not longer suffer the continuation of it, but on a sudden interrupting him; Ab Pharamond (said he) is it possible that you can with so much cruelty give me this counsel, after you have with so much generosity given me your assistance? or can you so much repent the good you have done me at the price of your blood, to make me lose the fruit by so hasty a change? for the Realms of the Cimbrian King, I will willingly restore them; and as you know that it was not for this Conquest that we enter'd his Territories, so you ought to believe that possessing Rosamond, if I can be so happy to possess her, I have no design to despoil her Father, or her Brother of a Crown that appertains to them; for if that which I have receiv'd from my Ancestors sufficeth not my ambition, I wear a Sword by my side can give me others, which I should possess more contentedly than that of the Father of Rosamond, for the present, as it is by your valour, and by your Arms much more than mine, that we are become masters of this Crown, I ought not, nor will not dispute with you the disposal of it; you may either restore it to the King of the Cimbrians, or give it to whom of yours you shall judge worthy; but for Rosamond, Ab Pharamond, you have promis'd me her, you have conquer'd her for me, and you your self have given her to me, and cannot but think it just that I should guard her to the last minute of my life.

"Yes, Gondioch (replied the passionate King) I would that you should guard Rosamond till death, nor have I any intention that you should ever yield her to any person; I would yet spend more of my blood to preserve her for you, and to acquire you her affections: but as they are of too great price to merit from your love those effects which it hath hitherto produc'd, and that by Arms and violence you have in vain assai'd her heart; I desire and demand by all our friendship, that you attempt it by submission and services, and that leaving her entire liberty, you treat her as the Mistress, and not the captive of Gondioch: she is so little worthy of this condition, that both you and I ought to dye for sorrow to have reduc'd her to it; and if this reparation suffices not for the injuries we have done her, there is none but we ought to give her at the price of our own lives.

Our King pronounc'd these words with so much passion, and the Burgundian mark'd so much alteration in his eyes, that his thoughts soon discover'd to him the truth; and in an instant making reflection of all that had appear'd in the person of my Master, he doubted no longer but he was become amorous of Rosamond. This thought, like a subtil and violent fire, seiz'd straight on all his spirits; and that new passion which introduc'd it self with the same promptitude, not permitting him to dissemble it, made him instantly thunder it out with violence; Ab Pharamond (said he, casting a look upon my Prince, which expressed the new trouble which had seiz'd his mind) you are amorous of Rosamond

These words so conformable to truth, and a truth so rooted in the soul of my Master, surpris'd him with sufficient confusion and astonishment, to deprive him of the liberty of answering for some time; and the jealous King finding in his countenance the confirmation of his suspicions, and not being able to resist those impetuous motions which agitated his spirit; Ab! I will doubt no longer (said he with a voice somewhat louder) but that all the misery I could fear is befallen me, and this Friend on whom I founded all my hopes is become my Rival. If that misery be happen'd (repl'd the King of the Franks) you ought rather to bemoan me, than accuse me; and this love (if it be true that I am in love) may well render me miserable, but can add nothing to your misfortunes, since I have no design to dispute with you, Rosamond, whom I yield to you without murmuring whatever love I may have for her. I know not (replied the King of the Burgundians) if you can do what you say; but I avow to you, that I have not the same power over my self, and that all that which I owe to our friendship cannot oblige me to yield you Rosamond. I desire not this effect of your friendship (replied Pharamond) nor should you receive it perhaps from mine, if the love, with which you tax me, preceded yours; but since that is not, I will inevitably surrender what I owe to our Amity, in demanding that which I hope from yours: and so that you will give liberty to the Princess of the Cimbrians, I promise you before the gods, and before men, that I will never see her more. You make me this promise (answered Gondioch) with a condition very strange; and you must permit me to tell you, that in the estate you now appear to me, your proposal may well be suspected. I have not forgot that to you I owe all things, and that it is by your valour, and by your assistance, that I hold my Crown, my Liberty, and those advantages we have over our Enemies: but it is with a most sensible grief, that in the person of so great a friend, I see that of so formidable a Rival, and of a Rival who in this quality seems more cruel and more terrible to me by how much he hath been assistant to me in all those Offices with which he may with justice reproach me. I have nothing to tax you with (replied my Prince very fiercely) for all that I have done for you, of what merit soever it be, was due to our friendship; but I shall disdain my self till death for those last actions I have done for your interests, if I cannot repair them in some part by the means which I have propos'd. I have hopes you will not oppose them, when you shall make reflection on them; but that you will know by my proceeding (added he with a sigh) that in a time when I appear to you so terrible a Rival, I give you a proof of my friendship, greater and more difficult than any you have yet receiv'd. I have told you already (replied the Burgundian King) that I owe you all things, and that I have the remembrance of it too well engraven in my heart ever to forget it; but I owe you nothing, if you deprive me of that only fruit I can desire of all you have done for me; and in vain shall I be engag'd to you for a Liberty, and a Crown, which will be little dear to me, if you take from me Rosamond, whom I love a thousand times more than my Liberty, my Crown or my Life. It may be (replied Pharamond) that you owe me no less Rosamond than all other things for which you believe your self oblig'd to me; and without respect to our friendship, I will tell you, that you have no more right than I to dispose of her liberty: but however it be, I have no intention to deprive you of her, though I desire she should be free; but will serve you with all my Forces, and with all my blood, against all those who dare dispute her with you. Few Rivals, since I must appear in that quality, would treat in this manner; nor should I perhaps be the most despicable of all your Competitors, though by my misfortunes I am the most odious, if my intentions were as contrary to you as they are favourable. I know not what are your intentions (fiercely repl'd Gondioch, whose jealousie insensibly troubl'd his reason) and it will be difficult for me to know them, since I cannot know you better than your self: but whatsoever your design may be, mine shall be to defend till death what I cannot abandon but with my life; and to hold all those for my most cruel Enemies, who will design to deprive me of it.

The King of the Franks oppos'd with all his natural sweetness, the resentments which the words of Gondioch were about to raise in his soul; and beholding him with an eye which rather appear'd languishing than incens'd; Ingrateful Friend (said he) renounce not our friendship upon the point when you should begin to be truly bound to it; forget, if you please, services of little importance; to consider, that for your sake, I consent to the most difficult thing in the World. You will better this way find your advantages than by that you seek them; for in the condition wherein you are, Enemies like me are not necessary. I confess I would not be your

your Enemy, though perhaps the repose of my life do require it, and that your friendship will be more fatal to me than the hatred of all men can possibly be.—Renounce it then (said Gondioch, interrupting him) as I renounce yours from this moment; and look upon him no more but as your Enemy, who will be so to his death. You will perhaps yet once more think of it, (answered my Prince, with his ordinary sweetness) nor would I by your example lightly break the bands of a friendship I respect, though I should occasion all the miseries of my life; but in the meantime remember, that whether Friend or Enemy, I desire that Rosamond should be free: for either in the one, or in the other quality, I am oblig'd to give her her liberty. You shall hardly compass your design (replied the Burgundian King, with a furious behaviour) but at the price of an hundred thousand lives; and it may be that either by yours or mine we shall satisfy Rosamond for the injuries we have done her.

Finishing these words, he laid his hand upon the Guard of his Sword; and Pharamond beginning to be inflamed with choler, both for his Discourse and Behaviour, there was no small danger lest they should have come to extremity upon the place, if the persons who from the other end of the Gallery had heard part of their conversation, and principally when they began to grow angry, and passion had made them raise their voices, had not advanc'd with infinite quickness, and cast themselves between the two incensed Kings to divert that misfortune: Gondioch retired from him in a furious manner; and uttered such words as nothing but his passion could excuse. Pharamond more moderate than he, though no less amorous, seem'd a little transported; and I believe he was not at all displeas'd at the behaviour of Gondioch, which dispens'd with him what he believ'd owing to his friendship, permitting him to give place to those thoughts and hopes which he had not till then dared to conceive.

The rest of that day, and the following, the wisest of the Franks, and of the Burgundians foreseeing the miseries which might arrive by the division of their two Kings, us'd all their endeavours to appease them, not forgetting any thing with which prudence might inspire them upon such an occasion: but as Gondioch knowing Pharamond for his Rival, had introduc'd a mortal hatred to succeed that affection he had for him, and Pharamond remain'd firm to his design to give liberty to the Princess of the Cimbrians; all their diligence who endeavour'd to pacine them; prov'd ineffectual, and all things contributed to the begetting of a War between these two Princes, who had been before united in so firm a League: both parties blam'd the ingratitude of Gondioch, who being bound to my Prince for so many great services, ought to have refus'd him nothing for any consideration, and most judg'd that by this disunion, the face of his Fortune would soon find a change.

The same day, spur'd on by that new passion which turmoyle'd him, and scarce left his reason any power over his mind, he went to visit the Princess, who was constrain'd to suffer such visits, though she did it with sufficient reluctance; and accosting her with a countenance on which she might remark the alteration of his soul, if she had not disdain'd to take notice of it; Madam (said he) your Beauty doth every day beget new Miracles, and causeth in minds the same disorder it causeth in Monarchies; it troubles the reason, cancels friendship, and makes infidelity reign in the place of Virtue. I am so little oblig'd by all the effects it hath hitherto produc'd (answered the Princess very fiercely) that I can neither confess nor hope any good from it; or if it be to that, that I ought to attribute all my misfortunes, you may well believe that I look upon it but as my cruel Enemy. If it hath given you any trouble (replied Gondioch) or made you feel any disquiet, it hath without doubt reveng'd you on those who have contributed to it; and for those two persons which are most odious to you, if it hath some time past rendred one most miserable, Fortune hath since yesterday thrown the other into an estate little different. For, in sum, Madam, whatever imprudence I commit by telling you it, Pharamond is become my Rival, and he who kill'd the Spouse who was destin'd to you, would willingly enjoy his place, if he might be so happy as to merit it; that heart which was thought impenetrable by love, and fortifi'd against all such feebleness, could not defend it self one moment against your fair eyes; and only one of your Looks, have rendred him at the same time unfaithful to his Friend, and Slave to Rosamond.

The Princess of the Cimbrians hearkned to this Discourse with a sigh full of disdain; and beholding the Burgundian King in the same manner; If the glory of a Conquest could make me flatter my self (said she) I averr to you I should be sensible of what you tell me: for as among men, there is nothing so great as Pharamond, so there is no person in the World which would not be oblig'd to that beauty which could give her so Royal a Slave: the Renown of his great Actions doth already shyns the whole Earth; and I have found in his person things so conformable to his great reputation, that I could not but admire him so soon as I saw him.

However incens'd the Princess was against my King, yet the greatness of her courage made her render this Testimony to truth, without considering the discontent which Gondioch receiv'd by her discourse: but that Prince could not dissemble it; and discovering it perhaps more than he was willing, by the redness which covered his countenance; O gods (cried he) how strange is my misery? How soon do I receive the punishment of the fault I committed in serving my Rival against my intention! He hath served you so well in yours (replied the Princess) that it will be difficult for you to acquit your self towards him, by whatever service you can do for him: yet I will tell you without other design than that of speaking truth, that the judgment I gave of him, shall not make his condition more happy if his felicity depends on me; and that his being the most accomplish'd of men, renders him to me nothing less odious. Ah, that is too much (repl'd the jealous Prince) for with whatever resolution you arm your self against a man who hath so cruelly offended you, his Fortune is too great by the Idea you have of his merit. He would seem to you less accomplish'd, if he were more odious; and how great soever he may be, if you have entirely prefer'd your hatred, you would believe there might be some among men as great as he. If this which you have spoke of him be true (replied the Princess) he may in time prove what are the thoughts which I have for him; but I am not so happy as to find so fair an opportunity to revenge my self of my Enemies. Ah! Madam, (said the passionate King) permit me to tell you, that it is not perhaps for revenge that you desire this opportunity; and I fear by the success my Rival hath hitherto had in all his Enterprises, least the same Fortune which hath served him in War, should accompany him in his love: not but that I can hope the contrary, if your happiness be govern'd by reason; or that I cannot tell you, that in the injuries which both of us have done you, he is much more guilty than I, not only by the death of the Prince of Sueves, in which I had no part, but by all other actions, to which he was excited by no passion which may render him excusable, while I in all those which I have done to gain you, have been forced by a love for you, and such a violent love as hath neither left my will nor my reason free. I believe with you (replied the Princess) that when Pharamond offended me, he did not love me; and I believe more, that had he lov'd me, he would never have offended me. If his passion had been as powerful as mine (replied Gondioch) he had attempted all ways to gain you; and scarce is it born, but it makes him violate a friendship, which ought to be eternal; and he prepares himself to take you from his friend, and to drive him cruelly from you. He believes himself perhaps oblig'd (answered Rosamond) to restore to me that liberty he hath depriv'd me of, and 'tis that without doubt which causes your division: but I hope the gods or men will restore it me, without the assistance of Pharamond, or your consent. However, you may if you please believe, that though I be a Captive all my life, yours shall not be at all more happy.

The King of the Burgundians was about to reply, when the Princess Albisinda entred the Chamber; and Rosamond rising to meet her, began to caress her in that manner, that Gondioch no longer having that attention given him he desir'd, or not being willing to speak before the Princess of the Sueves, what he had in his heart, departed the Chamber, and retir'd to his own Apartment.

In the mean time, the two Kings did no more see each other: but as Gondioch was animat'd against Pharamond by many violent passions, which made him look upon him as his Enemy: and Pharamond had been advertis'd of the intentions and resentments of Gondioch, they began to distrust each other, and stand on their Guards: Not that Pharamond, though he were not oblig'd to Gondioch, for any good action, did not respect the remains of a friendship he once esteem'd dear, and saw with grief those bands broke, though he gain'd no advantages by them: but when he understood that Gondioch, besides the Guards that he had redoubl'd about his person, and at the City-Gates, had caused a strong one to be placed near the Apartment of the Princess; as if to defend her against any design he might have to deliver her, and had given command to the whole Garrison to take Arms upon the first Order; he began to be excited to some anger, and judging that in the condition he was, he ought to Guard himself, and not give those advantages to his Rival, which might deprive him of the means to act what he had resolv'd. The reluctancy he had to offend Rosamond before he knew her, had caused him to lodge his Troops in the Field under the command of Prince Marcomire, who was retir'd with the other Princes; nor had he kept in the City any other but the Officers of his House, whom he could not spare from him: so that the whole Garrison was Burgundians, and Gondioch absolute Master of the City. The knowledge of which made my Prince resolve to part as soon as he could, from a place where he saw himself at the discretion of a man, who had declar'd himself his Enemy; and for this effect, having advertis'd all his Attendants to be in a readiness to part, he put on his Armour; but before he mounted on Horseback, he writ a short Letter to the Princess, which he put into the hands of one of the principal inhabitants of the City, whom he had oblig'd by several kindneses, and who undertook to give it to Rosamond, maugre the new guard Gondioch had plac'd at her apartment.

He was now ready to mount on Horseback, when advice was given him that Gondioch had design'd to stop him; and that to that effect he had plac'd Guards at the Avenues of the Palace; and particularly in a place which he must of force pass to retire himself: this advice inflam'd him with choler; and turning towards those that were about him, I am much pleas'd (said he) that the ingratitude of Gondioch blots out all the reluctancy I had to become his enemy; but we shall see whether he will be so hardy to execute in person that which he would execute by his Guards. And at these words, judging well that he ought no longer defer his departure, he set forward with a fair troop of valiant men, and march'd in the head of them towards the Gate of one of the Bridges, over which he was to pass to our Troops, which were lodg'd on the other side of the River. The Soldiers which kept guard at the end of the street, and in the place, drew up when they saw him appear, and made some show of betaking themselves to their Arms; but when they saw the face of the King, they had not the assurance, but we pass'd to the Gate without stop or hindrance.

So soon as we came at it, those who guarded it, according to the Orders they had receiv'd, put themselves in a posture to hinder our passage: but the King putting his hand to his Sword, flew in amongst them; and those who knew his admirable valour, and had a respect for him which the difference between him and Gondioch could not disperse with, amazedly retir'd before him, and left him as free a passage over the Bridge as he could desire. Yet by their behaviour he knew the truth of the advice was given him of Gondioch his intention, which inflam'd his anger more and more against him: and when he was out of the Gate, turning towards the Guard, and beholding them with a menacing countenance, You may tell Gondioch (said he) that in the City I yield the place to the strongest, but that we shall meet in the Field, if he hath the assurance to come forth, for since he will have a war with me, I declare it against him from this moment. These words pronounc'd by a man well known to them, put them without doubt in some fear; and as the most prudent among the Burgundians approv'd not of the proceedings of their King, they beheld the departure of ours with infinite grief, foreseeing in part those miseries which would befall them by the divisions of these two Princes.

It is most certain, that Gondioch foreseeing the trouble which Pharamond might give him, if he retir'd to his Camp, had a design to have stopp'd him: but though he was strong enough to have done it, yet he found a great deal of trouble to resolve it, as well for the grief he felt in his soul, to come to such extremities with a Prince to whom he was oblig'd, and from whom he could not refrain a respect, as for the dangerous consequences he foresaw in so great an enterprise: and when he had resolv'd it, Pharamond was on horseback, and in a posture to make those run no small hazard, who should attempt to execute it. Gondioch follow'd by a very great train, came to the Gate a little after we were gone; and having understood what had pass'd and particularly Pharamond's words, of which in a person of his humour, he had no small consideration, he was infinitely discontented either to have ill undertaken or ill executed his design; and judging that he ought to prepare himself for war, and for a war, the event of which he might so much the rather fear, as knowing his enemy the most formidable living, he immediately dispatch'd the messengers to the places where his Soldiers were lodg'd, to advertise their Officers to keep them in readiness, and to forewarn themselves against their enemies: he had the same day gone to head them, not having any design to shut himself up in the City, whilst he had an Army abroad much stronger than ours; but his love, to which he made all things yield, would not permit him to depart without seeing Rosamond, and giving such orders for her guard as might keep his mind in repose whilst he was absent from her.

To this purpose he went to see her, and found her in the chamber of the Princess Albisinda, where they were reading the short Note from my Prince, which had sometime before been given her, and which maugre the resentment she had against him, she had open'd at the solicitations of Albisinda, who represented to Rosamond, that in the estate wherein they were, they ought not to neglect the advice of a Prince incens'd against Gondioch, and who according to the common opinion had design'd to restore them their liberty. Gondioch no sooner approach'd them, but having rendred them the first civilities due; My Rival hath quitted me the place (said he) and I believe you will soon have the pleasure to see a War kindled between those persons whom you love not at all. It seems (answered the Princess of the Cimbrians) that you suspected me yesterday partial for Pharamond;

mond; but you will have more reason to day, seeing that we receive and read his Letters. These words, and the sight of the Note which was open on the Table, made Gondioch twice or thrice change colour; and after he had remain'd some time silent; Is it true (said he in the end) that his felicity is so well advanc'd in so short a time, and that you will scarce grant to a person who hath spent all his days in your service, those favours which you confer on one who is not known to you, but by his offences against you? If you will look on his Letter, (replied the Princess coldly) you will find the difference of his proceeding and yours, and judge perhaps by that the difference of your souls. If you think good that I should see it, (said Gondioch) I will read it willingly, and will explain to you possibly after I have seen it, the differences it puts between us. And judging by the Princess's aspect that she consented, he took it, and read these words.

King Pharamond, to the Princess Rosamond.

TIs not the Guards of Gondioch which defend my access to your person; I should flee through greater difficulties under the conduct of a Divinity which would open to me all passages, if my misery to be with reason odious to you, would permit me once more to appear before your incens'd eyes. I therefore depart, Madam, both to be less criminal towards you, by carrying far distant from you what you detest, and to endeavour to repair one part of what I have acted, by what I have a design to act. but you will permit me to remain upon your Territories, until such time as I have chas'd thence your enemies, and restor'd you that liberty to the loss of which I have unhappily contributed. The sacred Bonds of Amity made me have recourse to prayers, before I would take up Arms against my friend; but the force of his love permitted him not to hearken to what he ought to reason, and possibly to our friendship. Lament his misery, Madam, instead of incensing your self more against him; and judge of the greatness of his passion, by the faults which it hath made that Prince commit against virtue, whose inclinations however are truly virtuous.

The reading of this Note did equally excite choler and shame in the soul of Gondioch: for if he were incens'd that it should declare to the Princess, the design that Pharamond had to restore her to liberty, he was no less ashamed at the diligence he took to excuse himself towards her, and to see him speak in his favour in a time when he might well have dispens'd with it. These two passions made him blush at the same time, while it was not possible to discern, to which of the two it might be attributed; and soon after, laying the Paper again upon the Table; I confess (said he) that Pharamond and my self act differently in this affair, but as I shall have a great deal of trouble to speak in his favour, in the terms we now are, so I should possibly have had more to offend a friendship, which we had so solemnly sworn. He thought without doubt (said the Princess Albisinda) he might desire or demand of you the liberty of Rosamond: and if the love wherewith you accuse him, is not an effect of his will, he might well be struck by so divine a power as Rosamond, without being guilty towards his friend, since you your self in his demand of our liberty, have said that he would see her no more in his life. Pharamond is not happy, Madam, (said the Burgundian King, beholding her with some marks of astonishment) to find in the Sister of Vinidmir a Princess who takes his part against a man who never offended her. You may believe (replied the Princess of the Swedes) that he that took life from my Brother, can never be other than my enemy: but no interest ought to make us speak against reason and truth; nor can you doubt, but that the design of restoring us our liberties is as obliging, as that of keeping us Captives is injurious.

Though Rosamond's disdain made her hold her peace, yet she testified by a sigh, that she approv'd the discourse of Albisinda: and the King of the Burgundians not finding any answer for himself, insensibly chang'd the discourse, and a little after quitted the Chamber.

That which I was oblig'd to tell you of the beauty of Rosamond, in recounting to you in what fashion she appeared to the eyes of my Master, hindered me from extending something upon that of Albisinda: but I may tell you with truth, that if Rosamond were not in the world, perhaps there would be nothing more beautiful than that Princess; and that next to Rosamond, she hath those particular charms, which nothing can withstand: she hath without doubt less splendour and Majesty than the Princess of the Cimbrians, or our Princess Polixena; but she hath an attractive sweetness in her eyes, an extraordinary delicacy in her complexion, and in the features of her visage, accompanied with a free carriage in her person and whole action; her eyes naturally seem to languish, but with a languishment

languishment wholly charming, and which wounds more than the brightness of others, their colour is Azure, the most beautiful in the world; her Hair is much more fair than that of the Cimbrian Princess. The Sweetness of her Spirit is conformable to her countenance; and if any passions seem to trouble its serenity, they are neither terrible nor violent; with this sweetness she enjoys a courage and constancy, a generous goodness, a solid virtue, and all qualities necessary, to form one of the most amiable persons in the world.

The King of the Sueves, in pretending Rosamond for the Prince Viridomar his Son, who ought to supply the place which was destin'd to his Brother, both in his Throne and in the glory to possess Rosamond, had promis'd, as I tell you, the Princess Albifinda to the Prince of the Cimbrians; and Albifinda conform'd her self to his will, as well by the Rules of her Duty, as for the complacency she had for Rosamond, whose Alliance they esteem'd dear: but without these considerations she had had little disposition to it, trusting something excellently rude, and little answerable to her inclinations, in the spirit of Theobaldus.

In the mean time, my Prince was come to his Camp, where he immediately put all things in readiness for war against the King of the Burgundians: he declared to the Princes that assist'd him, the intention he had to drive him out of the Territories of the Cimbrians; and to restore the Princesses he kept in captivity to their liberty: but he pretended only the design of his ill treatment, and discover'd his love to none but Prince Marcomire and Charamont. They all detested the ingratitude of Gondioch, who after obligations like to those of my Prince, ought to have testified his acknowledgments at the price of his Crown or life: and those two to which he spoke of his love, seem'd by the interest which they took in it, to feel a part of that cruel grief which tormented him: for he spoke it to them in terms so bewitching and passionate, that they could hardly refrain from entering into his thoughts, and lamenting that misfortune which stop't the course of the greatest hopes in the world; since it may be with truth affirm'd, that before this obstacle, never any Prince, at the age of ours, was seen in so fair a way to mount to the highest degree of glory; for by his marvellous beginnings, all the world expected from him (and that with reason) not only the conquest of the Gauls, for which he had prepar'd himself, but that of a good part of the world.

Agitated by the cruel passion which left him not a minute of repose, nor busying his thoughts about any thing, but how to appease part of the anger of Rosamond, by the services he should render her; he drew his Troops from the places where they were lodg'd, and put them in a condition to attack those of Gondioch, if their Prince would not give him the satisfaction he demanded. For the injury he would have done him, in striving to detain his person, he was ready to pardon him, so that Rosamond were free, and her Father restor'd to the possession of his Dominions. But though it was no light enterprise to make war against Gondioch, whose reputation yielded to no Prince's in the world, and that he might with reason hope that the King of the Cimbrians, whose quarrel he espous'd, would willingly joyn with him, to recover the Country he had lost; he would not hearken to the proposals that divers of his own made to call for him; and whether it were to have the only glory to render this service to the Princess he adored, or to make it appear that it was only Rosamond, and not the King of the Cimbrians he serv'd against Gondioch, he would not fortifie himself with the assistance of his enemies; but told Marcomire and Charamont; that truly he lov'd Rosamond better than Gondioch: but ingrateful as he was, he lov'd him yet better than the Cimbrians, nor could employ the Forces of those whom he had treated as enemies, to weaken a Prince who had been his friend.

Marcomire who was full of courage and generosity, approv'd the design he had, not to employ the Forces of the Cimbrians against Gondioch; but he had not the same complacency as to the scruples which he saw in him about the amity which had been betwixt them: and as naturally he was less patient than his Brother; It seems to me, Sir, (said he) that Gondioch hath very well dispens'd with all those considerations you can have for him, and that after the treatment he hath made you, it is not only permitted you to seek your advantages in love to his utmost prejudice, but without fear of any reproach, make war against him as the greatest of your enemies. It may farther be alledged, that the obligations are not equal between you, and that Gondioch cannot pretend from you any duty or recognisance, while he is oblig'd to you for all things. "In serving a man to whom I promis'd friendship, (replied the King) I have done no more than my duty; and if I have been more happy than he in the rencounter of occasions favourable to his service, I ought not too much to abuse what fortune might have given him as well as me, nor pretend by it to dispense with what is due to our friendship. The gods are my witnesses, that I have never had any such intention,

“ but that all those thoughts with which my love hath inspir’d me, were still against my “ own repose, but never against that of Gondioch. I have truly contriv’d how to repair “ those faults which made me incur the hatred of Rosamond: but you know, dear Bro“ ther, how unwilling I was to commit them, before I had seen the person I offended;
 “ and I protest to you with truth, that I would do the same things for her service, when “ I had not a passion for her. Many persons will perhaps believe otherwise, but my inno“ cence suffices for my repose; and to give to men that knowledge I ought, and to deliver “ me from those reproaches they may make me, I do declare, and will cause it to be de“ clared again to Gondioch before I pursue the War, that maugre the treatment he hath “ made me, and the love I have for Rosamond, which I ought intallibly to find my death in “ this resolution, I will neither pretend to her affections, nor ever again see her, if he will “ leave her free in the Dominions of her Father, as I have demanded of him. I will yet “ render this Duty to our friendship, and keep my self in these terms so long as it shall “ be possible; but if Gondioch continue to abuse them, and that my reason find not Arms “ strong enough to defend me against my love, I know not whether I may preserve my “ resolutions till death, or oppose my self all my life, to that desire which we have na“ turally to be lov’d, where we truly love.

He spoke these words with many sighs, which he could not restrain; and to make it appear he had spoke nothing but truth, he sent the next morning my Father to the City, to make once more to Gondioch that proposal he had before made him, and to protest to him, that notwithstanding the rigour of his proceedings, and the design he had to detain his person, and possibly to do him some greater injury, yet he would for the respect he bore to his friendship, keep himself to the conditions propos’d, and renounce all sorts of hopes or thoughts for Rosamond, if he would restore her her liberty, with what he possessed of her Fathers Territories. But the King of the Burgundians, whose violent passions had left reason no place in his soul, instead of having any considerations for the patience of a Prince to whom he had given so just a subject to lose all those he had for him, deported himself with violence in the answer he returned my Father, and having remanded him without any fruit of his mediation, save that of taking from my Prince a part of that aversion he had to this war, he caused several of his Troops to pass over the River, which were on the other side the Elba, to joyn with the others, at the places where they were lodged; and having taken the best order possible, both for the Guard of the City, and that of the Cimbrian Princesses, he came to the head of his Army, where he had already caused all things to be prepar’d to prosecute that war on which he was resolv’d.

The same day two men of incomparable valour and great merit, presented themselves to him, returning from a long travel in strange Nations: these were Gondemar his Brother, and Gontran a Prince of his Blood, well known both, and particularly Gondemar, by many actions which gave them a great name among valiant men. Gondioch receiv’d them as he was oblig’d by his Blood, and the consideration of their merit; judging himself no less fortified by the arrival of these two men, than he should have been by that of several great Bands of men: he therefore presently gave them the whole command of his Army; and those who had enjoyed it before their arrival, yielded all things without murmuring, to their Birth and Virtue.

Pharamond seeing that he could no longer shun the war, and that Gondioch himself open’d the way as much as possible, to those hopes against which by the scruples he had for their friendship he had still defended himself, neglected no more any thing necessary against an enemy who would not at all spare him, but began to act against him, as he had done against the Sueves and Romans. Nothing now separated the two Armies, which were both encamped in that great Plain which is below the Elba, that extends it self from that River to the Hercinian Mountains; and as the two Captains were two grand Masters in the art of war, and that each had a good opinion of his enemy, they both sought their advantages, by all the knowledge which their past experience could teach them.

In the mean time, a report flew abroad, that the Kings of the Cimbrians and Sueves did puiffantly arm themselves in Suevia, by the assistance of many Princes, who had embrac’d their quarrel. ’Twas likewise told to Pharamond, that the King of the Sueves threatned Franconia, and prepar’d himself to attacke it, to make a diversion: and Gondioch receiv’d intelligence, that the Cimbrians kept a correspondence, in the Country, and in the City it self. But these two Princes making love their only interest, it was that which stopt their eyes from all others, and made them abandon all things to serve their passion; and that of Gondioch was so violent, that though he knew, and had reason to fear the valour of Pharamond, yet he fear’d not to expose himself to so great a danger, but dar'd to defie my Prince to a particular Combat of body against body, offering in this manner to end their differences, instead of sacrificing the lives of many thousands to their sole controversy. I admir'd at the patience of our King upon such an occasion, though I had experienc'd it in divers others; for though the defiance of Gondioch kindled some anger in his spirit, and assisted (with the other injuries he had receiv'd) to blot out by little and little that friendship he had still preserv'd for him; yet he refus'd the Combat he demanded, and had the advantage to refuse it in the face of the world, without rendring himself suspected of fear or cowardise: You shall tell the King your Master (said he to him whom he had sent) that it is the liberty of Rosamond that I demand, and not the death of Gondioch: that in the war which he constrains me to make, I shall spare his person as much as I can possibly, but that I pray him not too often to try his fortune, and to consider that a man of my age is not always capable of such a moderation.
 expose

Those who were near my Prince, testified an admiration at his proceeding; and particularly the young Princes, whom a boyling blood made eager upon such occasions. But though Gondioch would have drawn an advantage from it, haughtily sounding forth the defiance he had made my Prince; and sending to tell the Princess Rosamond, that that Rival in whom she had created so much love, as to make him enterprize a war against his friend, had not yet so much courage as to dispute against him with his Sword in his hand: However all that he would perswade in disadvantage of Pharamond, return'd not but to his honour, and made the whole world admire his wisdom and generosity.

In the mean time, Pharamond prepar'd for a Battle, knowing that Gondioch desir'd it; and having sufficient knowledge of the valour and conduct of Gondioch, he behav'd himself in this war with more wariness, than he had done against the Romans, and against the Cimbrians. One day marching at the head of five hundred Horse, to visit some posts between our Camp and the City, which he had a design to seize on, he rencountred a party of the enemies, who perhaps were upon the same design; who finding themselves stronger than we in number of men, attack'd us with great fury: he that commanded them, had not perhaps been so hardy, if he had believed our King had been in the head of us; and I believe he repented himself so soon as he perceiv'd it. The Combat remained for some time with a doubtful success: but as the presence of Pharamond carried victory through all, in a few minutes our enemies were no longer able to sustain the effects of his prodigious valour, and in few others turn'd their backs, seeking that safety in their flight they could not find in their Arms. As their hardiness and a slight wound my Prince had received, had incens'd him, he pursued them to the very Banks of the Elba, toward the same place where it washes the walls of Marobuda; and if his anger had lasted, few of them could have sav'd themselves either from the Sword, or the waves of the River; but at such times his anger ordinarily abating, he commanded his men to spare the blood of those who few days before had been their companions.

In the mean time he march'd along the Banks of the River; and because the heat of the fight made him sweat under the weight of his Arms, he lifted up the Visor of his Helmet to refresh himself; and casting his eyes cross the River towards the City, where the goddess he ador'd was inclos'd, by fortune the place where he was, was directly opposite to the Garden of the Palace, and to that proud Terrass where he was walking some days before, and that same day on which he had fatally lost his repose and his liberty: he soon knew the Balister'd Walk, and at the sight of it was assail'd with such vehement motions of spirit, that he could not restrain their violence; but he was assaulted by others more powerful, when he saw a company of Ladies upon the Terrass, and in the midst of the others, who kept a little distance for respect, he knew his divine Rosamond, and the Princess Albisinda.

The breadth of the River, and the height of the Terrass, made not so little a distance as to permit him distinctly to discern the features of their faces; nor was it so great, but that he might observe one part of them; and it seem'd that from that of Rosamond descended a resplendent flame like that of the Celestial Rayes, and which could not permit any distance to rob him of some part of her beauties: he saw her then, by the assistance love gave his sight, as distinctly as if he had been but within four paces of her; and at this sight remain'd wholly surpris'd, troubled and astonish'd. He stopp'd at the Bank of the River, and it seem'd as if with his looks, and sighs which accompanied them, he would have made his heart pass under the waters to the place where it was unfortunately lost.

This sight gave new forces to his love, though they were not necessary to raise to an unquestionable predominancy; and that heart which the force of her beauty, or that of his destiny, had submitted to the Fetters of the cruel Rosamond, at this view was entangled in new snares, from which all the greatness of his courage and reason prov'd vain Allisters or Deliverers. Alas! what were now the thoughts which tormented him! and with how many different passions did he now feel himself forc'd to struggle with! the joy which we naturally have at the sight of what we love, presented it self first to his spirit, and so fill'd him with the Idea of it, that for some small time it rendred him insensible of any other thing: the desire he had to see what he ador'd at a less distance, succeeded it, but the jealousy he resent'd for the fortune of those to whom this happiness was permitted, at the same time began to infest him; and the grief to see himself mortally hated by her that he could only love, most violently perplex'd him.

Ab my eyes (said he with sighs, which parted from his Lips instead of words which he spoke to himself) you from whom I seek my happiness, why have you rendred me miserable? rejoyce in your Fortune if you can; and since it is permitted you to see Rosamond without resenting the effects of her cruelty, behold if you can, this Celestial Object without being dazzl'd, and leave all the pain to this unfortunate heart, against which you have so cruelly brought a War. But, O gods (added he a little after) in this Divinity of my soul which I behold with so much joy, do not I see that incens'd Divinity, to whom for Sacrifices I have offer'd no other than cruel offences and bloody injuries? And a Divinity arm'd with thunder ready to lance it at this miserable person, who hath too much merited it? Ab my eyes, take away your looks; and by the pleasure you receive, expose not to new Arms this unfortunat, who hath already committed to many his presence as odious to his incens'd goddess: and we ought to content our selves to have once drawn her anger by our sight, without falling again into the same fault. But what know we (added he a small time after, oppress'd by some flattering thoughts) but the intention we have to serve her, may have appeas'd part of her displeasure, and that a heart sensible of offences, may not have the same apprehension of the satisfaction we would give her? 'Tis no light reparation of our faults, to take up Arms against our Friend; nor a light service, at the peril of our life to restore her liberty, and the Kingdom of her Father.

It seem'd that this thought gave him some consolation, and some rays of hopes; but it was all destroy'd in a moment after, by those that succeeded: and himself adding his grief to torment him; Ab miserable (said he) flatter not thy self with a happiness which thou canst not justly hope. Thou hast acquitted a part of thy duty, in repairing a part of the evils thou hast done, but thou hast not blotted out that impression of hatred thou hast stamp'd in the heart of Rosamond; and in that odious estate wherein thou art with her, even the greatest services will seem odious.

While he discours'd in this manner, and that his contemplation was fixed upon that heavenly object, he was likewise seen and beheld with a very nice observation by the two Princesses: for they had not only perceiv'd him since he had stop'd at the banks of the River, but from the high place where they stood, they had seen the Combat, and discern'd as distinctly what had pass'd, as the distance would permit: but when Pharamond pursuing those that fled was advanc'd towards the River, they had mark'd him by several things which they discern'd to be more than common. His Armour shone with Gold and precious Stones with which it was enrich'd, and his Helmet was shaded with white Plumes which cover'd his head, and wav'd gently over his shoulders: but than by these exterior Ornaments, he was easier known by that Martial vigour, and that admirable grace he had in all his postures, and especially on Horseback; so that the two Princesses had no sooner cast their eyes upon him at a distance which might permit them distinctly to discern him, but they took him for himself: and by what we afterwards undertood, the Princess of the Cimbrians turning towards Albifinda, My Sister (said she) I am much deceiv'd if that person so remarkable amongst all the rest, be not the same Pharamond, from whom we have received so many injuries; and notwithstanding the resentment I have against him, I find him so little resembling common men, that it is difficult for me to misprize him. The Princess of the Sueves agreed in her judgment with Rosamond: but as at that time they walk'd not without having the Guards of Gondioch near them, Albifinda demanded of him who commanded them, if that person who had pursu'd the vanquish'd Troop to the banks of the River, and whom she shew'd him with her hand, were not Pharamond; and the Burgundian, who had seen him several times in the same posture, and in several bickerings of the same nature, having assur'd her that he was the same, Doubt not at all, my Sister (said she to the Princess) but that is really the King of the Franks; but if I be not much deceiv'd, it is not to do you new injuries that he appears now before you; and if you mark his countenance (added she, just when she saw him stop on the banks of the River in the posture I endeavour to represent to you) you may judge well that he hath nothing of an Enemy, and that your beauty hath produc'd all the effect which Gondioch declar'd. 'Tis perhaps yours (repl'd the Princess) and the jealousy of Gondioch, may have deceiv'd him in the judgment it hath made him make; but when it shall be truly mine, I will tell you as I told Gondioch, that it is so little accusom'd to do me any good offices, that I shall not at all wonder that it hath made me be belov'd by a person, who of all the World, can have the least hopes of my affections. I know not (repl'd the Princess of the Sueves fighting) whether you speak this sincerely or according to reason; and if I were not the Sister of Vindimir, who fell under Pharamond's Lance, and of Viridomar, who pretends to the honour of enjoying you, I should oppose thy discourse with those reasons which these considerations command me not to alledge. That which you could tell me (repl'd Rosamond) would not be perhaps so just as you think; and though notwithstanding my resentment, I know as well as you the person and glory of Pharamond, and that by the design he hath to bring us out of the power of Gondioch, he puts himself in a condition to repair the injuries he hath done us; 'tis enough if by this reparation I can drive the hatred from my heart without introducing another passion, of which all the greatest services can scarce render me capable, should he make them the entire employment of his life.

They spoke in this manner, and he beheld them with eyes so powerfully fastned to the place, that though from the walls many Arrows were shot at him, and that he was in danger to be either kill'd or wounded; neither this consideration, nor any other, avail'd to draw him from the place, if the two Princesses, either mov'd by their generosity, which permitted them not to expose for a longer time to that danger the life of so great a Prince at a season when he had intentions favourable for their service, or to a witness of their displeasure, which made them flee his presence, had not retir'd from the place where they stood, and depriv'd him of that so desir'd sight, when his soul was most fix'd upon it. At their departure, the Heavens to him seem'd cover'd with cloudy darkness, and the Air lost its serenity: he accompani'd the sense of their departure with as many sighs as he could utter, and at length began to hearken to the intreaties of his Souldiers, who endeavour'd to retire him from a place where the stay was dangerous by reason of the showers of Arrows which had already killed two or three men: the King at last suffer'd himself to be perswaded, gently withdrawing, and turning his eyes from time to time towards the place where he had seen the Princess; but because among the Arrows which fell at our feet, there was one found with a Note fastned to it, he that first perceiv'd it unbound it, and presented it to the King; and as all things that came from that side touch'd him to the heart, he seiz'd it with an extraordinary greediness, and having open'd it, read these words.

To the King of the Franks.

I Hope that your good intention will produce the effect you desire; and I believe that I have known, that spirits that are incens'd at offences, are mollifi'd with services. However, I ought to advertise you, that if you do not pursue it with diligence, you will not have the entire glory of your enterprise; and that there are some would rob you of a part, by means which I could inform you, if I had a way more assured than that to which I trust this Paper.

The King several times read over these words, the beginning of which flatter'd him with as much consolation as the last gave him disturbance, not being able to imagine, neither by what persons, nor by what means he should be deprived of part of the glory he pretended in his enterprise: he doubted not but this Paper came from Albimer, who was that Inhabitant of Marobuda, to whom he had intrusted his Letter to the Princess, and who not only for being the most honest man in the City, had frequent access to her, but had a Sister who had many years waited on her, and a Sister who not only had spirit, but was particularly lov'd by her Mistress. This was that which caused a spring of joy in the soul of the King; and he believ'd that what Albimer told him of the mollifying of the anger of Rosamond, had come to his knowledge by the report of that Lady, who might have some part in her confidence; but he employ'd a good part of that day in searching out the truth of what he writ him in the end of the Billet; and though many things presented themselves to his imagination, he could find no judgment concerning it that could content him.

In the mean time, as his passion increased by this second view of Rosamond, and by that little hope which the Paper of Albimer gave him, he believed he ought to neglect nothing for the Liberty of the Princess, after such advice given him, and his diligence solicited; he therefore prepar'd for the Battel, upon which he knew Gondioch was resolv'd as well as he;

and not to be over-tedious with you, I will only tell you, that each of them having done all that the greatest Captains could do, and fought all their advantages by so much the more that Gondioch well knew Pharamond, and Pharamond could not despise Gondioch, they drew out all their Troops from the places where they were incamp'd, and by a mutual consent rang'd the two Armies in the great Plain which is within view of the City. Ours, though the less numerous of the two, was compos'd of fifty thousand men, but they were men made fierce and valiant by so many great Victories which they had obtain'd in so short time. And besides our Royal Captain, they had at their Head five or six Princes, and many more Illustrious men, able to command the most formidable Armies. The King divided his into three Bodies, having understood that the Enemy did the same; the first of which he gave to Prince Marcomire, the last to the famous Priam, and kept the main Battel for himself. Ibere and Meroveus commanded the reserves, and Prince Sunnon, with Genebaud and Charamont had the command of the Cavalry.

The King of the Burgundians having, like my Prince, reserv'd the main Battel for himself, gave the Vant-guard to Prince Gondemar his Brother, the Rear-guard to Gontran his Kinsman, and the other commands to such of his as were most capable, and whose valour and experience he had proved in several conflicts. He march'd to this Combat with less confidence than he was wont to the others which he had fought against less terrible Enemies than he whom now he oppos'd; and he knew so well the familiarity which Victory seem'd to have contracted with Pharamond, that for all his great courage, he could not hinder himself from fearing the event.

The order in which my Prince had order'd his Battalions, was admired by all the old Captains: and after he had exhorted the Souldiers with a charming eloquence, and encourag'd his men with the most pressing Arguments his desire of Victory could inspire him with, he caus'd the last signal to be given (at the same time that Gondioch did the like) and began the Battel. You will consent (my Lord) that I should abridge the particulars, lest otherwise I should be tedious, and that I content my self to tell you, that after the example of the two great Captains, many valiant men who fought under them, signaliz'd themselves by many brave actions; and all the Souldiers, both of either side, fought with infinite valour, Prince Marcomire and the gallant Gondemar broke their Lances the one against the other, and began a Combat with advantage little different; but they could not finish it, by reason of the necessity which constrain'd them to separate themselves to look after their charges, in which they both acquir'd sufficient honour. The King of the Burgundians gave many extraordinary proofs both of his Valour and Martial Discipline: and as he was animated by a passion wholly violent, he led his men to the Combat with so much fury, or rather he spurred them on with so much rage, that our first Squadrons could hardly endure the shock. As his were stronger than ours in number of men, he made use so well of that advantage, and of the heat wherewith he had inspir'd them, that he began to shake ours, and to open himself the way to Victory. This hope which they conceived, rendred them more fierce and furious; and our Officers beheld with infinite grief, that our Souldiers began to give Ground, when our great King, whom this disadvantage had inflamed with an anger not ordinary in him, ran with a courage able to assure the most fearful, to all the places where necessity called him to the assistance of his: and passing from side to side with his Face open, he enliven'd the hearts of the Souldiers with the fire which seem'd to dart from his eyes; and animated them in the end in such a manner, both by his sight, by his speech and by the diligence he took to sustain those that were faint, and by the seasonable assistance which he brought them, that he not only stop't the disorder which began to grow among his, but translated it in a little time among his Enemies, and charg'd them so fiercely when he once saw them shrink, that in the end he put them to rout, and made the Victory in all places declare it self in our favour.

Gondioch did a hundred Actions worthy particular notice; but he could not put a stand to the Fortune of Pharamond, which after he had attempted with a Valour extraordinary, he saw himself in the end vanquish'd, and his Army entirely broken on every side. 'Twas now that his despair made him seek Pharamond in all those places where he believ'd he might rencounter him, either to give him his death, or to receive his own at his hands: but the King of the Franks, by a motion much different from his, not only avoided the Combat with him, but caus'd it to be proclaim'd throughout the whole Army, that they should respect the person of Gondioch, and spare the blood of the Burgundians as much as possible. Yet it had been difficult for him to shun the rencounter of Gondioch, if in a place far distant from whence he was, the valiant Prince Ibere had not oppos'd his fury, and stop'd him by a Combat, in which they both receiv'd some wounds: though the King of the Burgundians in the end quitted him to follow some other design which his love inspir'd him with, having lost the hopes of Victory.

It remain'd as entire to us as the King could desire : as for the Souldiers, I doubt not but they had rendred it much more bloody than it was, if the élemency of our Prince had not stay'd their fury ; however, the Enemies lost more than thirty thousand men, and kill'd above ten thousand of ours. It had been difficult for Gondioch to have sav'd himself after he had thrown himself so far among us, if our King had had any design to take him : but instead of opposing his retreat, he favour'd his, and whatever advantage he might have drawn by it, he would not give him the displeasure to see himself Prisoner to a Prince, who some few dayes before had been his best Friend.

But if he us'd this diligence for the safety and satisfaction of Gondioch, neither the heat of the fight, nor the desire of Victory made him lose the remembrance of Rosamond, for whom alone he fought : and not doubting but that if Gondioch lost the Battel, he would retire into the City, and once more render himself Master of the Liberty of the Princess, and either remove her thence, or defend her within the Walls, he resolv'd to provide for this mischief, which in all likelihood might happen ; and therefore so soon as he saw the Victory declare in our favour, and the King of the Burgundians engag'd among ours, he commanded Prince Marcomire to advance with certain Troops towards the City, and defend the passage against Gondioch and his Forces ; which he might easily do, by gaining the Avenues of the two Bridges, by which alone he could from that side enter ; Gondioch himself having some dayes before broken a Bridge of Boats made over the River during the time of the Siege.

The valiant Marcomire executed the Orders of the King with an admirable valour and diligence ; and having left Genebaud and Meroveus at the Avenue of one of the Bridges, he defended the other against Gondioch, who presented himself a short time after, and us'd a very resolute Conflict, he not only repuls'd him, and chas'd him for many toylongs along the River, but by an effect of Fortune which he had not hop'd for during the Combat, he that commanded in the City for Gondioch, knowing his Prince by several marks, and believing himself oblig'd to favour his retreat, came at the beginning to the Bridge ; and in the end, transported by an imprudent heat, he caus'd the Gates to be open'd, and at the Head of five hundred Horse charg'd Marcomire in the Rear. Thus success came to Gondioch upon the point when he had just turn'd his back, and when he was in a condition neither to make use of it himself, nor hardly perceive it ; and the Brother of Pharamond taking his resolution with a marvellous promptitude of spirit, commanded my Father, who was near him, to pursue Gondioch with one part of the Cavalry which he gave him, and with the rest he turn'd head against the Burgundians, who were fall'd out of the City, and charg'd them with so much fury, that they were not able to sustain it. In short, he oppress'd them, disorder'd them, and put them to flight all in a moment ; and the routed Burgundians gaining the Bridge in this disorder, the multitude of those that fled hinder'd the shutting of the Gates, and permitted the vanquishers to enter pell-mell with the vanquish'd.

Marcomire made use so well of this favourable opportunity, that by this confusion he rendred himself Master not only of the Bridge, but the Gate of the City, which he defended till the arrival of Genebaud and Meroveus ; to whom he had sent notice of it so soon as he had gain'd the Gate of the Bridge. As soon as they arriv'd with their men, Marcomire press'd into the City after the Enemies he had before him ; and my Father, who had no order to pursue Gondioch far, return'd just at the same time that the Prince saw himself Master of the City by an admirable Valour and good Fortune. There was for the present some blood shed by the resistance which the Burgundians for some time made ; yet soon after, Prince Marcomire, who, though more choleric and violent than the King, is notwithstanding full of a true generosity, knowing himself the stronger, and not doubting longer the Victory, caus'd Proclamation to be made to the Burgundians to lay down their Arms, and commanded his own to desist from the slaughter. He that commanded in the City for Gondioch, was one of the first slain at the Gate ; and those who remain'd after him, not having so great an interest to defend it, receiv'd willingly the favour which Marcomire granted them, and made no longer resistance.

The King of the Franks receiv'd this news with a surpassing joy ; and seeing himself in the same day victorious over a formidable Enemy, and Master of the City, in which was inclosed her whom he ador'd ; he could with difficulty, by all the force of his moderation, retain the marks of his contentment. He left the care of the Camp to Priam and Charamont, whose experience was well known to him ; and with a small number attending him, he came towards the City, either carri'd by an impatient desire to see the Princess, or by a belief that she could not be defended by any power so well as by himself. Entering the City, he found things far more calm than he expected: and you may judge, my Lord, that he was not wanting to give to this gallant action of the Prince his Brother those praises were due to it, and to testify the kindness he had for a service of so great importance.

He presently made all the Burgundians depart the City, permitting them to go seek their King, and to carry with them all that appertain'd to them, without suffering any loss in their Equipage, or injury to their persons; and at the same time he sent back to the Camp part of the Cavalry, and caused some Infantry to come to the defence of the City against the enterprizes of Gondioch: and took such order for their lodging and subsistence, that the Inhabitants suffered no trouble nor inconvenience from them, though they serv'd for their defence, and under the Orders of their Princes, to whom Pharamond at his entrance committed the entire Authority over them.

While he put all things in order, which were necessary for the service and security of Rosamond, he knew not in what fashion he should proceed with her: and if upon one side his passion carri'd him above all things, to the desire he had to go and enjoy at her feet this precious sight; on the other side he was withheld, by the remembrance of the injuries he had done her, and those cruel words which he had heard from her own mouth; not being able to imagine that the service he came to do her, could be so considerable to counterbalance all those great injuries she had receiv'd from him; he therefore believ'd there was need of time to take his resolution: he saw likewise that the night was already somewhat advanc'd: and he believed that though his access to the Princess was free, he ought to take a time to visit her at a less inconvenient hour: but in the mean time, he doubted not at all, but he ought to send some of his to inform her the estate of affairs, and to tell her that she was Mistress of the City, and should be in few dayes reinvested in all the Kingdom of her Father. He did me the honour to give me this commission, though he had many persons about him, who might be more worthy; and I parted from him to go to the Palace, where he would not now lodge, but in that quarter of the City most distant from it.

When I was come to the Palace, I was brought before the Princess of the Cimbrians, who was now, as she almost always us'd to be, accompani'd by the Princess of the Sueves, to whom I was likewise charg'd to bear my Master's civilities: I had before seen these two Princesses, and therefore in all likelihood ought to have been arm'd against any surprize a second sight might cause: but most certain it is, I was no less astonish'd than I had been at the first, so that my feeble eyes were scarce able to support the splendor with which they were smitten; yet the beauty of Rosamond, which may damp the brightness of any other beauty in the Universe, hindred me not from admiring that of the Princess Albisinda. I saw them by the light of many Torches, which made a day out of darknets; and the Princess of the Cimbrians was seated upon the bed, on which Albisinda reposed. I confess that the Majesty of Rosamond, and the fire that seem'd to flee from her eyes, dazzl'd me, and struck me into such an astonishment, that for a time it depriv'd me of the power to discharge my commission: but in the end, composing my mind in the most respectful and most submissive terms that I could find, I made her understand the intentions of my Master. Rosamond heard me with an infinite reservedness and gravity; but however, without pride: and Albisinda hearkn'd with a winning sweetness to those obliging words I told her on the behalf of my Master: and after they had remained some time to consider, as I conceived by the looks which they cast upon each other, what answer they should return; in the end, Rosamond, as most concern'd, breaking silence with an admirable grace; Be pleas'd (said she) to tell the King of the Franks, that we doubted not at all but he would overcome in so just a cause, since in others more unjust he hath still been invincible; and that we acknowledge, as much as is permitted to us, the reparation he gives to the injury he hath done us: and if the death of Vindimir oppose not to his reconciliation with the King of the Sueves, it shall neither be mine nor my Sister's fault that he cease not to be the Enemy of our Fathers.

She pronounc'd these words with a Royal Majesty: and Albisinda, by some words which she added, testifi'd that her inclinations were not different from those of Rosamond. But when I address'd my self to the Princess of the Cimbrians, to demand of her if she would please to grant my Master the honour to wait upon her; It was not at all necessary (replid she coldly) to demand this permission, in a place where he knows well he is Master by right of Arms. And it is not just, my Sister (replied the Princess of the Sueves) that you should deny it, since he comes to do you service in a matter of so great importance. Rosamond answer'd not at all to these words, though she testifi'd by her countenance a little to approve them:

them: and I taking her silence for a consent, departed the Chamber, before I gave her time to explain it, possibly in a manner less favourable to the intentions of my Master than I ought.

He had attended my return with an impatience, which well made manifest the greatness of his passion; and he hearkn'd to the discourse I made him, with a commotion of mind which visibly demonstrated the agitation of his mind: he employ'd one part of the night to explain the words of Rosamond, and did all he could to find in them a sense that might be favourable to him. In this design he wanted a great assistance, which his ill Fortune depriv'd him of; and therefore causing Albimer to be sought for, so soon as he entred the City, he was informed that he was departed the day before, and that no farther news was heard of him. This unhappy chance gave him much trouble, having hopes by this means to clear himself of many things: and not having any acquaintance with his Sister, though the Brother seem'd absolutely fix'd to his interests, he believ'd that he might be departed out of the City, to give him more plenary advice concerning what he had mentioned in his Billet; and he fear'd, not without infinite trouble, lest he should be fallen into the hands of Gondioch.

The words of Rosamond seem'd to him very cold, and somewhat too fierce, in a time wherein he came from gaining a great Victory, and exposing his life for her service: but when he made reflection on those which she had said to him at their first rencounter, he found a great deal of sweetness in these, and cause enough to believe that a great part of that disgust which she had thundred forth with so much violence, was now over: but he receiv'd a far greater consolation, in that the Princess deny'd him not to visit her; and he prepar'd himself to this view, with an impatience easie to be observ'd in his eyes, but not without a fear little different from that which accompanies the most cowardly spirits, in the most perilous conflicts.

The next Morning (for it is necessary, my Lord, that I should pass over things of little importance, in which the recital may be burthensom to you, though it may give you a more particular knowledge of the greatness of his love) so soon as he believed that he might see the Princess, he went to the Palace accompani'd by the Princes his Brothers, Ibere, Geneband and Meroveus: but approaching the Palace, he pray'd the Princes to walk in the fatal Garden, where he had lost his Liberty; telling them, that he would not render them all miserable by the sight of Rosamond, against which he believ'd no power or force was capable to resist. Marcomire led all the other Princes into the Garden, and I alone follow'd the King by his order. He trembled like a fearful Infant, when he approached the Chamber of the Princess: but when he was introduc'd into her Closet where she then was, and that his eyes were again dazled with the brightness of that celestial beauty, he remained wholly astonish'd, having the countenance of a person, to whom was scarce left any sense or knowledge. Yet he soon came again to himself, by the force he oppos'd to those impetuous motions of his spirit: endeavouring to preserve all his courage in the greatest difficulty that he had ever encountred; he could neither from the countenance nor from the behaviour of Rosamond, draw any knowledge of his Fortune; and though, neither in the one nor the other, he could see any mark of sweetness or complacency, he found in her proceedings all that was due to his dignity, and what in all likelihood he was to hope for.

But if the Princess of the Cimbrians conserv'd all her Majesty, and seem'd to add to it a new lustre, at the approach of the King of the Franks; the King lost at her sight all the remembrance of his Dignity, and forgot those Formalities, which a great King like himself ought to observe in such an occasion, to remember only that he was amorous, and that he was criminal. In this thought, which entirely command'd his breast, and chac'd away all others, in stead of saluting the Princess, as perhaps he had done in another estate of life, he bended his knee before her; and bowing his head to her very feet, with the most passionate affection in the World; May it be permitted to this Offender (said he with a voice that betray'd his want of confidence) to appear yet before the feet of his incens'd Divinity? Or may he hope an abatement of your just displeasure, since he hath not yet sacrific'd his life to expiate his crimes?

This humility in the person of so great a Personage, and in a person who in all his actions had an admirable grace, touch'd possibly the spirit of Rosamond with some good motion of pity; and had perhaps oblig'd her to give some signs thereof, if the Rules of her duty or severity had not been more strong than any that passion could form; and therefore she pray'd him to rise; and seeing that he delay'd to obey her; Rise, my Lord, (said she) or you will constrain me to retire. I thought (said the King, obeying her with some reluctancy) that a man guilty of so many crimes, ought at least have remain'd at your feet till he had merited your pardon. You may merit it by other means (repli'd the Princess) and since by your last actions, you have made amends for those first wrongs which could be repair'd, you ought not to doubt but that you shall have that justice which is due to you, and that they will consider a good turn, who have been sensible of the injury. If it be so (repli'd the passionate King) I despair not of my Fortune; and as I make it entirely consist in the glory, of not being odious to you, I will endeavour to the last drop of my blood to become so happy. It is not necessary (answered the Princess) that you should buy so small a benefit at so great a price; for in few dayes past, you have shed too much of our Enemies blood, to make us desire the loss of yours. Ah, Madam, (said the Prince) I can hardly perswade my self that the little I have done, or whatever I am able yet to do for your service, can repair those faults which I have committed, for which I should scarce pardon my self, had you the goodness to forget them. All that which may justifie me in part, loses it force near you: and if of two offenders one sees himself punish'd by the Arms of a man, who was unhappily his friend, and should have been still, if friendship had not yielded to a more powerful force, the other sees himself exposed to torments, far more cruel than all those which Fortune or chance of War could make him feel: yet he will suffer them till death without murmuring; and since he is unworthy of your pity, if ever he dare to implore it, he will implore it, when he is giving up his last breath. 'Twas to make this protestation at your feet, and not out of a confidence drawn from a light service, that I have dar'd, unworthy as I am, to present my self once more before you. That which rests of my life, shall be dedicated wholly to your satisfaction: and that glorious punishment, which the just gods have imposed on me; by the one I will drive from your spirit, if it be possible, the remembrance of those crimes which have merited your anger, since it is (added he with a sigh) all the fortune to which I am permitted to aspire; and by the other, if I can die without being hated by you, I shall render my death so pleasing, that it may enzy the most happy lives.

Pharamond spake in this manner, transported by the violence of that love, which had the absolute command over him: but in words so passionate, he ran some danger to draw upon himself, more than ever, that anger of the Princess, which was so terrible to him. The knowledge I had of the fierce and haughty humour of the Princess, made me begin already to fear for him: but it is most certain, that the person of Pharamond is compos'd after such a sort, and the grace wherewith he accompanies his discourse hath something so powerful, that the most incens'd souls would difficultly find strength to oppose him at such a time, should they not make themselves insensible of a charm which obliges them to his favour. The Princess was now perswaded, both by what had pass'd at their first rencounter, by the Letter she had receiv'd, by the report of Gondioch, and by all the proceedings of my Prince, of the passion he had for her: nor was she perhaps ill satisfi'd with the noblest effect she could hope from her beauty: and if, though she suffer'd the passion, the discourse was able to incense her, it was conceiv'd in those terms, that the conjuncture of Affairs seem'd to excuse it, and gave her not the same reason to be transported, as if it had been spoken in another season, and more clearly. However it was, or were it that Rosamond, by the charms of his person, by the marks of his grief, and (it may be) by the love of Pharamond, was touch'd for him with a favourable inclination, and found in his condition and in his discourse, more reason to lament for him, than he incens'd against him; and that she judg'd it not convenient to let her displeasure break forth against an humbl'd Prince, in a time when divers considerations might divert it, she testifi'd nothing of anger at his discourse; and contented her self to attribute it entirely to his repentance, without ascribing any thing to his love: and breaking silence with her first coldness; Since in ceasing to offend (said she) you may cease to be hated, there is appearance that by the good offices you do to our House, you may hope better: and with whatever prejudice the King my Father and the Prince my Brother may be incens'd against you, I see nothing which may hinder their becoming your Friends, if the Alliance which they have sworn with the King of the Sueves oppose not; nor which ought oblige me to hate you, if they cease to be your Enemies.

In speaking these last words, Rosamond beheld my Prince with an eye in which he thought he saw some marks of sweetness or compassion; and the joy they brought into his soul, had spread it self in his visage, if he had not mastered it by those great reasons he had to moderate it, and the little foundation he had to conceive it. I would buy (replied he) the friendship of the King your Father, and the Prince your Brother, at the price of what I have most dear; and I wish I could satisfy the grief of the King of the Sueves, by a part of what I unhappily deprived his Son of: But, alas! (added he with a sigh) I had been happy in this misfortune, if his death had only drawn me the hatred of the Suevish King; or if it had been less apprehended by the divine Rosamond than by him that gave him birth. This is not (pursued he, he, with a behaviour yet more passionate) that the condition of that Prince seems not to me more worthy of envy than of compassion; or that I would not willingly change the glory I can hope for among men, for that of extracting from your fair eyes those tears he hath made you shed.

He had perhaps said more, but that he thought by some signs in the countenance of the Princess that these words had stir'd up some grief in her mind. This belief touch'd him with a sensible apprehension, and made him resolve not only to change the discourse, but to put an end to (notwithstanding the violence which oppos'd his resolution) a visit which ought not be too long, considering how he stood in the opinion of Rosamond. To this purpose, raising himself from the Chair where she had forc'd him to sit, Madam, (said he) it is not just to permit longer before you this offender; and I have perhaps too much abus'd your patience, that you have suffer'd it so long: nor is it necessary that I longer stay in a City where you do not command me to tarry for your service, and where I cannot but see my self with shame, having appear'd as an enemy. I go to expel out of your Territories those which in my remembrance of your enemies, and to restore to your obedience that which may yet be possess'd by Gondioch, and in hopes of the return of the King your Father into a Country of which he shall in few days be peaceably Master, I will depart out of his Dominions so soon as I shall be no longer necessary in his service: and though he cease not to hate me, yet I shall be always ready to assist him with my Forces, with my blood, and with my life, if his enemies renew the war against him: this is what I can offer to the King your Father. And for you, Madam, I offer you the miserable sufferings of a heart which will carry your chains till death; and of a soul which if fortune ceases to oppose it, will dispute perhaps with the whole world the glory to serve you.

The fear he had to receive a cruel answer to these words, made him depart so soon as he had spoke them; but not before he had bended his knee to her, as he had done at his entrance; nor without making her see in his eyes, that all that which he expressed of his passion, was below what he had in his breast.

Before we departed from the Palace, he sent me to the Princess of the Sueves, to tell her, that by reason of the misfortunes he had to make himself odious to her house by the unhappy death of her Brother, he durst not presume to visit her; yet he should esteem himself most happy, if she would give him some occasion to appease, by his services, a part of the hatred she might have against him: and this Princess, whose soul was full of sweetness, having with an infinite grace receiv'd the civility of my Prince, made me know that she could without reluctancy have seen him in the Chamber of Rosamond, if she had there met him; but that for the fear she had of the severe humour of the King her Father, she durst not receive him in hers, though she was no less sensible of the service which he had willingly done her, than she could be of the injury he had done them, possibly against his own intentions.

By this last view of Rosamond, the love of Pharamond gain'd new force, and was perhaps already arriv'd at the highest that ever any passion mounted to: he had not seen her before, but incens'd, and in a condition terrible to him; so that Fear, with Grief and Despair, possess'd the best part of his mind: but at this time it seem'd that the other passions were in part dispell'd in his mind, to leave it entirely to love; and that by this sweetness, which he found in the disposition of the Princess, he was permitted to admit those hopes which till then found no access. In fine, Rosamond had endur'd his sight and his discourse; and though it were with a great deal of coldness, yet it seem'd to him to be without any resistance, and that her coldness ought to be attributed to her displeasure rather than to other causes, as to the death of a Prince whom she ought to have espous'd, and to the dependence she had on the will of her Father, whose thoughts she could not be ignorant of, and whom she knew yet not reconcil'd to Pharamond, though he had no more reason to hate him: and more, he had declared to her what he had in his heart, though he doubted not at all but she already knew it; and he believed that he had observed in her eyes that this acknowledgment had not displeas'd her, and that by his love he was not become guilty of any new crime towards her: besides; he found his conscience more free than it had hitherto been on the behalf of Gondioch, and as he remembered, that that ingrateful Prince, both in the Battel, and in all that had pass'd before it, had openly testified an ardent desire to take away his life; and so much the more sought to do it, when he refus'd the Combat with him, and us'd all diligence to preserve his friendship, when he saw him most incens'd to his ruine; that he himself had taken a displeasure at him in his soul, which had driven away those scruples that had tormented him in favour of his party, though he could not yet conceive a hatred for him; and he believed that he had done enough, and suffer'd enough, not to fear that the world should accuse him to have offended the duties of friendship towards a person, to whom he was not bound for any good turn, though he should endeavour to gain the affections of Rosamond: he believ'd then that both on the behalf of Rosamond, and of Gondioch, he had reason to hope; and that if Fortune would a little declare in his favour, it would not be impossible that he should be one day happy.

These thoughts rendred him in a moment wholly different from what he had till that time been; and it appeared so much both in his eyes and all his person, that those who were about him easily discern'd the change. O Gods, (said he with a behaviour much differing from the ordinary condition in which we had for some time seen him) if it be possible that it may be permitted me to hope, and that I have no longer reason to fear neither the hatred of Rosamond, nor the friendship of Gondioch, how great will be my fortune? or rather, what obstacles can oppose my fortune, if I cease to love Gondioch, or to be hated of Rosamond? Have not I birth, force and courage comparable to any of my Rivals? or which of them is it against whom I durst not openly dispute? That Brother of Viudimir, that Viridomar, to whom they have destin'd so glorious a Fortune, whatsoever fame is already spread through the world of his valour, or whatsoever advantages have been publish'd of his person, cannot be well assur'd of his happiness, if he be not fortified against me with the hatred of Rosamond: and may not I hope that the Father and the Brother of Rosamond, whose hatred my past actions may have attracted, will be sensible of what I now do for them, and of the services which I will do them? Ah! if this happiness might befall me, (pursued he, confirming himself more and more in his hopes) I would make it possibly appear by fair effects, that of all the lovers of Rosamond, I am not the most miserable; and by that little in which Heaven is favourable to me, I will give sufficient trouble to the most powerful of my Rivals.

He flatter'd himself in this manner, being ignorant of what that fortune which seemed to behold him with a pleasing eye, was preparing for him more cruel and terrible: but as he would give the Princess the most absolute marks of his submission, he prepar'd himself to depart the City, and go to his Camp, when at the same instant the Scouts which he had sent into the Fields on the other side of the City, where the access to it was not at all defended by the River, being returned, brought him word that they had seen appear towards the Coast of Casurgis some Squadrons of Cavalry, and that the men of the Country had told them that they had seen others in other places, which seem'd to have some design against such places as yet remained under the power of the Cimbrian King; but that by the impatience of Gondioch they had left them, to come and attacque Marobunda where the Princess was.

The King, and those who were about him, who knew well that Gondioch before he came to the Battel had pass'd his Troops over the River, and had left none on that side, thought that he might have, during the night, found some passage, in a time when the waters were more low than ordinary; and that he had sent some Troops on that side, either to give suspicion, or to put himself, if he could find an opportunity, into one of those places from whence he might make war in the Country, and attend the recruit of his Troops. And though upon this consideration the King found little reason to fear a defeated Army, and which was not in a condition to perform any great exploit of war; yet he thought best to send to know further; and attending a more full advice, to stay in the City the rest of the day. He sent to the Princess to beg her permission, that she would be pleas'd to let him remain there for her service; acquainting her at the same time with the reasons that oblig'd his stay; and because Prince Marcomire was already returned to the Camp, he commanded Genebaud with three hundred Horse to march to the place where our Scouts had seen those Cavalry, with order to do all that he could, to bring some certain intelligence.

In the mean time, whatever disquiet he suffer'd to remain till the morrow in the City without seeing the Princess, he thought as the case stood, he could not without violating the respect he ought her, give her two visits in one day, in a place where notwithstanding the respect he gave her, it might be believ'd he was still Master; and not daring to hazard the demand of a second audience, he pass'd the time in far greater impatience than he would have done, had he been farther distant from her: but it is time, my Lord, that whilst I tell you what pass'd within the breast of Pharamond, I should enter into a farther discourse of his deplorable fortunes.

It was not without reason, that Gondioch had been advertised, that the Cimbrians had some intelligence in the Country, and in the very City of Marobunda: and though he had neglected the advice which he had received, as well because his love wholly busied him, and

and render'd him almost incapable to think of any thing else, besides what had relation to that; as because he had not heard it, but by a confus'd report, and by persons which were not so well inform'd of the truth, as to speak it with any certainty: but most certain it is, there had pass'd things of too great importance to be neglected; and to acquaint you with them, my Lord, I must tell you, that whilst the love of Pharamond and Gondioch hindred them from thinking of their enemies, they had not remain'd idle, but that the two Kings having call'd to their assistance all their Friends and Allies, had rais'd most powerful Forces to renew the war, and give trouble to their enemies. The news which they had heard of their division, had much augmented their hopes; and as the King of the Cimbrians attributed it to a jealousy which might be risen between these two Kings, either for the love of Rosamond, or some other consideration, rather than to any thoughts of Pharamond, which might give him place to become his friend; instead of being touch'd with any acknowledgment, or dreaming to joyn with him against Gondioch; he prepar'd equally against them both, believing he could never find a better opportunity to ruine them, than during their disunion; besides that he was joyned with the King of the Sueves in an Alliance so trait, that no consideration could separate them: and knowing well that nothing could divert his design, which he still vehemently preserv'd in his soul, to revenge the death of Vindimir, he remain'd fix'd in his resolution, to follow his fortunes to the end.

Prince Theobaldus his Son, who against all sorts of reason had receiv'd an infinite antipathy against my King, and who by reason of the love and the design he had for Albifinda, was more particularly knit to the interest of the King of the Sueves; confirm'd his Father in his intentions, and perswaded him to the war against us, as much as he could possibly: but as he found himself not yet in a condition to come with open force against two such Princes as Pharamond and Gondioch, who disunited as they were, might reunite themselves against the common enemy at their arrival; they joyn'd policy to open war, and manag'd those intelligences which they receiv'd among the Bohemians, before they enter'd the Country with their Armies. At present they likewise knew that the Princesses were in the hands of their enemies, and that having such precious gages, they might always be in a condition to impose hard conditions, and make their own advantageously; they therefore consider'd, that if it were possible to redeem them from the place where they were, and conduct them to some Town which yet held out for them, it would extremely advance their affairs, and put themselves in a posture to attacque their enemies, without any fear which might retard them.

To endeavour the execution of this design, Briomer presented himself; but Prince Theobaldus himself would have a part in this enterprize. This was the same Briomer, who had defended Marobuda against Pharamond and Gondioch; and I will add to that which I have told you of him, that though his birth was none of the highest among the Bohemians, yet he held one of the chief degrees, and possess'd the greatest charges of the Realm; for besides that he was hardy, valiant and able; he had the education of Prince Theobaldus from his cradle; and as he was dearly belov'd of him, so he had for him an affection more like that of a Father, than of a Governour. 'Twas then with Briomer, that the Prince would enter secretly into the Country of the Bohemians, and quarter themselves ready at some place, which still continued under their subjection, to find the means to execute the greatest things, and to form a party which should favour the entrance of their Armies into the Country.

Briomer having great acquaintance, and the inhabitants of Marobuda being all at his devotion, he believed that during our disorders, he might find some means to enter, and possibly to carry thence the Princesses; which was what the two Kings and Prince Theobaldus did most eagerly desire. One part of these designs were executed as they could have wish'd them. Theobaldus and Briomer with very little equipage were entered into the Country: and because they knew that the Plains on the other side of the River from Marobuda, were covered with the Armies of the Burgundians and ours, they had taken their way by the Country of the Coldules, and so pass'd to Egitina, a good City, in which the King of the Cimbrians had a strong Garrison.

They had kept their arrival so secret, that no person knew of it; and Briomer had so well manag'd his designs, that he had found means to enter into the City, the day before we gave battel: he had confer'd with the two Princesses, and told them the intention of their Fathers, and the design which Prince Theobaldus and he had, to take them out of the hands of their enemies. The Princesses, who had a great belief in Briomer, and knowing what esteem both the King and Prince had of him, dispos'd themselves to second his design; sign; and so soon as they should find an opportunity to retire themselves with Prince Theobaldus. They had such an one as they could desire, so soon as my Prince was enter'd the City; for as Rosamond was not only Mistress of her liberty, but of the City it self, she had the power to go forth, whenever she had an intention: 'tis true, that after the discourse which she had with my Prince, she had some aversion to execute this design; it seeming to her that it was to deceive in some manner a Prince who had dealt so generously with her, to flee secretly from a place where he had left her the Sovereign Authority, and where the retreat, the stay, and all things were in her disposition; she spoke to Briomer, who was concealed in the Palace, so soon as my Prince was retir'd, and would have perswaded him that it would be perhaps more advantageous to her, and to her House, to treat in another manner with Pharamond, and to make use of his assistance to chase out Gondioch, since he offer'd himself so willingly, rather than to make him again an enemy of her Father by a flight, and a proceeding which seem'd to partake of incredulity, and did but ill correspond with that of the King of the Franks.

Briomer found a great deal of reason in the discourse of Rosamond, but could not approve this design: for knowing that of the King his Master and the Prince his Son, he told the Princess that he did not doubt, but Pharamond as well as Gondioch might become enamour'd of her divine beauties; and that acting as this passion guided him, he did apparently all things which he believ'd capable to please or move her; but that she ought not to trust a young man, who might deceive her, and who remain'd still Master in her Country, whatever respect he gave her: and in the end, that though it should be true, that he acted sincerely, and that they could not hope of him other than real services and assistance, the intention of the King her Father was not to receive from him any obligation which might hinder him from being still his enemy, as he was bound to be by the Alliance which he had contracted with the King of the Sueves. That he attended nothing to enter into the Country, but to understand that she was at liberty; and that he would never pardon her, if he should know that she had remained an hour under the command of Pharamond, having had power to depart. That in the end, Prince Theobaldus her Brother, upon the advice which he had given him of what had pass'd, would be on the morrow before day, with four hundred Horse, at some furlongs distant from the City, to receive her in case she could get forth, and would conduct her to Egitan, where they might defend themselves against their enemies Forces, till those of the King her Father were arriv'd.

At these words of a man whom the Princess knew to be esteem'd by the King her Father, she remain'd without answer, only contenting her self to say, that she would obey the King without murmuring: Albifinda said the same: and their departure being thus resolv'd on the morning following (for they judg'd well, that how absoluté soever the Princess was in the City by the command of Pharamond, yet she could not get forth by night without giving great suspicion) Briomer pass'd the rest of the day, and the following night, in preparation of things necessary, and sent again to Prince Theobaldus, to acquaint him with the last resolution; and so soon as the day appear'd, the Princesses being habited, mounted with their Ladies in three Chariots which were ready; and to give less suspect, they visited several Temples within the City, apparently with design to thank the Gods for the happy change of their condition: having done their devotions in two or three of those in the City, they feign'd they would go and pay the same Duty to that of Diana, which is some furlongs distant from the City: and having caus'd themselves to be driven to the Gate, by which they were to issue out, those which guarded it, and who had order absolutely to obey the Princess, saw her no sooner appear, but they open'd the Gate, and left her a passage, as free as she could desire: from the Gate they went to the Temple of Diana, under the conduct of Briomer, who was pass'd out disguis'd; with some men on Horseback which accompanied him. But they made little stay; for Briomer having caus'd them to remount into their Chariots, drove towards the place where Theobaldus attend'd them; which was in a Wood, distant only some few furlongs from the Temple of Diana. Theobaldus came forth to meet them; and the better to disguise himself, in case that they should be seen by any person, and to make Pharamond judge that it was by others, and not by the Cimbrians, that the Princesses were taken away, he accosted the Chariot with his Sword in his hand, as enemies might do, and feign'd to take them away by violence. All things happen'd according to Theobaldus's intention, who would not by any means be suspected to be in the Country; and those persons, who by chance saw at a great distance what had pass'd, judg'd as he desired, that it was by enemies that the Princesses were taken away; and made the same report in the City, so soon as they enter'd.

In the mean time, my Prince, whose love had waken'd him very early, was no sooner risen, but he understood that the two Princesses had visited the Temples of the City, and were gone to that of Diana, which was without the Gates. So far there was nothing but the hour that surpris'd him: but as the season was for the present very hot, he believed that to avoid the heat they had taken the morning for their progress and devotions, as much less inconvenient. In the mean time, he found some time for himself to repose; judging that Rosamond did not disdain the office that he had done her, since she had so readily made use of it; but some time after, he understood by several persons at the same time, that the Princesses were forc'd away by a great body of Cavalry, who posted them thence with all diligence. The vexation that he had likewise upon this news, was, that it arriv'd late, and that the persons who gave it being Footmen, which had come slowly, understood but little, and minded less affairs of this importance: the noise of it had run a good while among the vulgar people, before it came to the knowledge of the persons who gave advice to the King. All his wisdom, and all his natural moderation, could not hinder him from breaking out into a passion; nor did I ever in my whole life see him in that posture he appear'd in at this cruel news: He at first could not believe it: but being confirm'd by the persons that reported it, whom they brought before him; and in the end by others, who afterwards saw the Chariots go with the Cavalry that conducted them; he did but too well know his misfortune, and was but too much perswaded: his countenance was an assured testimony of his inward grief, to those that stood about him; nor could he hinder himself to make known to them, by some words, not more than they believed, but more than till then he had declared to them. Ab Gondioch, (cried he) how cruelly dost thou revenge thy self on me? and rendrest me by the loss of that which thou now takest from me, more unfortunate than thou couldst be by the loss of a Battle: but hope not to enjoy thy fair prize with security; for since by this violent proceeding thou blottest out of my soul all that remain'd there of friendship for thee, which mangre thy ingratitude I had yet preserv'd, fear all things from a man, whom a passion like thine may deprive of reason as well as thee.

The belief he had that the Princesses could not be forced by any but Gondioch, made him speak in this manner: and though by the facility they had themselves given to this action, in passing out of the City at an hour so little ordinary, it might easily be conjectur'd that themselves had contributed, and that it was either by the Cimbrians or the Sueves that they were led away, rather than by the Burgundians; the report made of the violence which they used, took away part of the reason of this thought; and it seem'd entirely lost, by the little appearance there was, that the Princess Rosamond would be perswaded to such an action, and in a time when no necessity; nor any reason could oblige her to expose her self to the hazard she must run of being encounter'd by her enemies, when she was in the City with an absolute power, an entire liberty, and a security as great as she could find with the King her Father. If I believed (said he in this thought) that it was with her will, that the Princess had quitted us, either to render her self near her Father, or to flee from an enemy, whose repentance perhaps cannot find faith with her; instead of opposing my self to her retreat, I would favour it with all my power; and if the Convoy I should give her in person would be odious to her, I would send all my Army before her to facilitate her passage; but there is little appearance she should make use of dangerous ways, so long as ways of assurance stood open; or that she would flie those persons who adore her, whilst she might command them to conduct her into what place of the world she pleas'd to retire, to expose her self to the rencounter of an enemy more powerful without doubt than the Troops of her conductors. However it be, (added he some moments after) I must follow her, either to defend her from her enemies, if she be retir'd with her friends; or to deliver her from her Ravishers, if they have taken her by force.

At this resolution he stopt, not giving time to plaints, nor so much as words, but uttering what his passion made him speak whilst he put on his Armour, and the rest mounted on horse-back by his order: but ill fortune so order'd it, that of five hundred Horse which he had kept in the City, he had sent three hundred the day before with Geneband, and there remained but two hundred with him; and as for the Infantry which were in the City, they were useles at this time; nor would it require less than three hours time to command a party of Cavalry from the place where the Army was encamp'd; which delay would have depriv'd him of all hope to have overtaken the Ravishers, who had already above two hours way before us: He therefore resolv'd to follow them with his little Company; and he had gone himself, without doubt, had he been alone in so pressing an occasion. He gave however order to Gajaldus to go and command some Cavalry from the Camp to follow us with all diligence; and he hoped likewise that we might find Genebaud, since, according to the report made, he had taken the same road with those that had carried away the Princesses. I confess to you, that as at no time whatsoever he had been incens'd as at this; so at all others I never saw him such as he appeared to me this day: for in defiance of the natural sweetness which was predominant in all his person, he had something so fierce and so terrible in his eyes, and in all his actions, that his small Troop gather'd courage from him, and resolution to follow him without fear to the most terrible enterprises.

We, pursuing those who had got a great advantage of us, march'd with utmost diligence, though it concern'd us most not to kill our horses at the beginning of a course which might prove long; and having followed the trace of the Chariots and Horses as far as we could perceive it, at those places where we lost it, we instructed our selves as well as we could of such persons as we encounter'd in the way; among whom, we found many who gave us intelligence of what we sought. However, we should with difficulty have overtaken them; for by the uncertainty which we were often in which way to follow, we had given our enemies time to gain ground of us, if by chance at the passage out of a little wood we had not encounter'd Adelard with an hundred of those Horse which had parted the day before with Genebaud. We no sooner knew them, but the King having demanded of him news both of what we sought, and the rest of the company, he gave him an account of both; telling him, that the day before, they had march'd over a great part of the Country without any encounter; and that after having quarter'd all night in a Village, this morning Prince Genebaud having understood that several Troops were seen pass divers ways in the night-time, and believing it important to bring some news, chose rather to weaken himself by dividing his little party, than return to the City without doing what possible to inform himself: that to this effect he had commanded him to take six-score Horse, and return towards Marobuda in the same path they took, and endeavour to instruct himself as much as he could; and that the Prince in the head of the rest, had taken another way: that since that time he had heard nothing of Genebaud; but for himself, travelling about half an hours way from thence, he had met a body of about four hundred Horse, which guarded three Chariots; and that he which commanded them, having known him, had attack'd his with infinite fury, and by their inequality, constrain'd him to yield to their numbers, though his had fought with sufficient valour: that he had ten slain, and as many wounded; and that there had been perhaps a greater number, if the enemies had not testified a greater desire to retire, than pursue them: that he had rallied his own with as much swiftness as he could possibly, and now sought Genebaud to joyn with him, that he might be in a posture to sustain a second encounter.

Pharamond, to whom the valour of Adelard was well known, cheered him up with a great deal of kindness for his small disgrace; telling him that it was very ordinary that a great number should gain advantages over a small one; and that if he had any fault, it was by the too much courage which Genebaud and he had had in dividing themselves: and in the end, he commanded him to follow with his men, and to lead him to the place where he had fought.

Thus was our party strengthened with one hundred Horse; and with this number my Prince doubted not but to carry the victory from a number far greater than our enemies. Adelard could not inform him whether they were Cimbrians or Burgundians; but he only told him that in that little time he was with them, he saw not any whom he had known about Gondioch; as indeed it had been difficult for him to do, not having seen any face uncover'd, nor any Viser lifted up. The King was glad for the hopes he had to succour Rosamond, though in his mind he found much more disposition to grief than joy, not being able to defend himself from an apprehension which seem'd to threaten him with some fatal adventure.

We march'd under the conduct of Adelard to the valley, where we saw the signs of the conflict; and with the dead bodies of those which he had lost, we found many more of our enemies who were slain with them. From thence some time after, we marched through a wood, where the way being deep, we judged the Chariots had gone but heavily; and having employed about an hour to cross it, we were no sooner past it, but in a great and fair plain, which presented it self to our sight, we saw the Chariots of the Princesses, and the Cavalry which conducted them. This sight made Pharamond give evident signs of his joy to all about him; and turning towards us with an aspect in which there seem'd to shine something more than humane, My friends, (said he) 'tis here that you must fight for Pharamond, as hitherto you have fought for glory; and 'tis now that I demand

mand from a small number of valiant men a victory which is much more important than all those which our entire Armies have given. I hope that I shall do my endeavour with you, and that we shall overcome together, if fortune do not oppose us.

Speaking these words, he took a Lance, which would have bended any Arm but his with its weight; and charging his left Hand with his famous Shield, and pulling down the Viser of his Helmet, he march'd in the Head of us toward our Enemies. We had no great trouble to joyn with them; for they, stopping so soon as they had discovered us, soon after turn'd head, and advanc'd to receive us with a resolution parallel to ours. Theobaldus, inflam'd with anger, and spur'd forward by the hatred he bore my Prince, would not hearken to the counsel of Briomer, who, fearing a life much more dear to him than his own, and with reason dreading the valour of Pharamond, had pray'd him to retire with the Ladies and fifty Horse, whilst he with the rest, more strong in number than the Troop of his Enemies, offered to sustain the combat, and give him, if he could not overcome them, more than sufficient time to retire to some place yet under his obedience. Rosamond herself, believing that she could divert the combat by making known her Brother to the King of the Franks, had call'd him several times with great cries; and seeing that he could not understand her where she was, she descended from her Chariot to divert that misfortune she so much feared; and ran after him with all her force, endeavouring to stop him with her voyce: but she was got but few paces from the Chariot, when Theobaldus was too far distant to hear her, and spurring forward at the Head of his Troop, had, as well as we, crossed the whole space which separated us, and saw himself at the levelling of Lances, and the just distance of a career. He easily marked Pharamond in our Front, and Pharamond saw by many signs, maugre the anger which had incens'd him, and knew with joy that it was not Gondioch: and as he had not for his subject the consideration he still preserv'd for his person, he oppos'd himself without reluctance to him whom Fortune presented him; and levelling his Lance with a countenance so terrible, that I believe it could not at that moment bur chill with some little frost the boyling heat of the Prince of the Cimbrians, they parted both the one and the other with an equal fury; and as they were more advanced than their party, they encountred in the middle of their career before we could joyn. Their charge was such as might be expected from the valour and fury of two such Warriours; and the Lance of Theobaldus sliding from the Shield of my Prince, upon the Buckles of his Armour, found so much passage as to give him a large wound in his Shoulder: but the too well-tempered Steel of the cruel Lance of Pharamond, piercing the Armour of Theobaldus, as if it had been made of some tender matter, pass'd quite through the Shield, the Cuirass, and the Stomach of the unfortunate Prince, and appear'd almost entirely all bloody behind his Shoulders. The unhappy Prince tumb'd from his Horse with the Tronchion In his Body, rendring his last sighs in a River of blood: his vanquisher ignorant of his ill fortune, nor knowing yet if the blow of the Lance had proved so fatal, had drawn out his Sword, and had cast himself with an infinite fierceness against those who first oppos'd his fury; and opening a large passage in their thickest Squadrons, he was generously seconded by Ibere, Meroveus, Adelard, and many other valiant men who fought next him; and acted their parts with so much courage in imitation of their great Captain; that the Cimbrians, either unable to support so furious a tempest, or discourag'd and daunted by the fall of their Prince, began first to give ground, soon after were disorder'd, and in the end, entirely broken, scatter'd themselves confusedly through the Plain, and on all sides seeking their safety in the swiftness of their Horses heels.

The victorious King, in stead of pursuing them, turned towards the Chariots, whither his love with such violence drew him; and he turned so much the rather, being called by many loud and pitiful cries: his heart was as soon struck with them as his ear; and tumbling to Earth all he found to oppose his passage, he soon opened one large enough to approach that fatal place where the cries reached to Heaven: with what astonishment, or rather with what thunder was he struck when he saw? Ah! what sight? When he saw, I say, the Princess whom he ador'd, seated in blood, and amongst the dead; and holding in her lap the Head of her deplorable Brother, who gave up his Spirit in her Arms, and whose Visage she bedew'd with a torrent of Tears: they had taken off his Helmet, and on his open countenance might already behold pale death in its most terrible Figure: they would likewise have pull'd off his Cuirass, but the cruel Tronchion which had gone through his body, made it difficult; and when they drew it forth by violence, as they were forc'd to do, there issu'd from the wound a new River of blood which cover'd the whole body of the Prince, and depriving him of the rest of his force, left him scarce a moment of life.

Albisinda was seated on one side, and Briomer, the despairing Briomer, on the other. Al-

bisinda, according to her sweet inclinations, expressed her grief by her tears; but Briomer refounded his with cries full of fury, and words which denoted his despair: and the divine Rosamond, whose constancy was quite lost at so sad a spectacle, in the midst of a thousand sighs sending some plaints to Heaven, with her countenance bedeck'd with tears that fell on the dying body of her Brother, seem'd to receive into her bosome that death which she saw painted on his countenance: her Garments were in many places besmear'd with blood, and her Auburn Locks, which all her moderation could not deliver from some touches of her fair hands, by their disorder demonstrated that of her soul, and the violence of her grief. But neither grief nor disorder were capable to take any thing from her beauty; and maugre all that her affliction could present to our view, she seem'd to us yet more fair, than she was afflicted.

Theobaldus tended vitibly to his end; but his anger endured as long as his life: and putting himself to a great force to utter some words; My Sister (said he) offer blood, and not tears to my Tomb; and revenge me, if it be possible, revenge me of that cruel one who hath triumph'd over my life, and that of Vindimir. He could scarce speak these words, and the Princess, who perhaps in a more quiet condition would not have approv'd these violent motions, abandon'd her self at this time to all that grief which so dire an object could inspire her with; and receiving in her troubled soul that cruel impression her Brother aim'd to imprint; Yes, my Brother (said she) I will revenge you, and I swear it before the immortal gods, that I will pursue to the last moment of my life the cruel murderer of my Brother. It seem'd that the spirit of Theobaldus parting from his body, receiv'd some consolation from the promise of Rosamond; and he solicited her to it by a look at that very moment when life forsook him.

Pharamond arriv'd time enough to see him surrender up his life, and to understand his last words, and the cruel promise of Rosamond. Either the one or the other had been enough to let him know that it was the Brother of Rosamond he had slain, though the sight of his countenance, which he had often seen when he was his prisoner, had not confirm'd his knowledge of it: and in a moment wherein he believ'd to have paid a new service to the Princess, and possibly finish'd his pardon for all past faults, he found that by a dire effect of his misfortunes he had, and that before her own eyes, slain her Brother. This cruel knowledge of a misfortune so little foreseen, and the deplorable object which presented it self to his eyes, as well in the person of the dying Theobaldus, as in that of the afflicted Rosamond, struck him at the same time with so great an astonishment, and so cruel a grief, that scarce with all the force of his courage could he retain any life in his body; and having at this fatal sight pierc'd the Heavens with a doleful cry, he swooned in his Saddle, and was about to fall over his Crouper, if Prince Ibere, and my self, who were the nearest to him, perceiving him to fail, had not spur'd our Horses forward, and lent him our Arms on each side to support him. I lifted up at the same time the Viser of his Helmet to give him Air, and I perceiv'd that he had not yet entirely lost his senses and knowledge, but that he had his soul troubl'd in such manner that he could scarce feel or know any thing.

Whilst we thus supported him with our Arms, and that in this languishing posture, he cast his eyes on Rosamond; the Princess, notwithstanding the sad employment in which she was busied at the cry which he made, turning her head towards his side, saw him and knew him: this sight added so cruel a redoublement to her grief, that she could scarce support it without falling into the same condition with her Brother; and that without doubt had happen'd, if this passion alone had possess'd her soul some moments longer: but anger joyned it self to grief, even at the same instant restored her that strength which had abandon'd her, and rendred her no less formidable to the astonish'd Prince, than she seem'd disconsolate to him: her eyes were inflam'd with a fire mix'd with tears, and her Anger causing them to cast forth sparkles more lively than ordinary, carri'd both their Lightnings and their Thunderbolts at the same time into the bosome of my Prince. He could scarcely support her Looks, when her Words struck him with a blow far more terrible; and the Princess causing that displeasure to resound, that she could not retain upon so dire an accident: And how, Barbarian (said she) dost thou come to shew thy self to me cover'd with the blood of my Brother? Or art thou not satisfied to have slain him before my eyes, if thou seest him not die in my Arms? Com'st thou in my Bosom to seek that remnant of his life which thy cruel hand may have left him? Or dost thou believe, that without that addition which thy detested sight may bring, there is not enough grief in the soul of two Princesses, whose Brothers and Spouses thou hast slain? The violence of the passion which turmoyl'd her, cut off her Discourse at these first words: and the Prince not finding any thing in all his courage to justify himself, though his innocency might well have furnish'd him; remain'd mute and immovable immoveable between our Arms, rousing his eyes on that deplorable object, and contriving in his mind nothing but dire resolutions.

But whilst Rosamond shed tears, and Albifinda accompani'd them with hers, either out of the true grief she had for the death of a Prince who ought to have been her Spouse, or out of the part she took in that of Rosamond; Briomer echo'd forth his despair in Lamentations and Actions full of Fury; and having done things more agreeable to the grief of a Father, and of a most passionate Father, than that of an affectionate Governour, and expressed the trouble of his Soul in a manner unreasonable; so soon as he saw and knew my Prince, excited by the passion which transported him, rising from near the body of Theobaldus, he ran towards Pharamond with his sword in his hand, resolving to sheath it in his body. Thou shalt die (cried he, approaching him) or thou shalt send me to the infernal shades with my dear Theobaldus. Speaking these words, he was very near to my Prince; to have executed his design; and he had done it without doubt, for the little care the King took to prevent him, and the little heed which Ibere and I had to his behaviour, if Meroveus, who had better mark'd it, had not spur'd his Horse before him, and by the shock tumbl'd him to the Earth. The King who perceiv'd it, testified his displeasure; and looking upon Meroveus with some marks of discontent; Ab Meroveus (said he) wherefore do you oppose so just a displeasure? Or take care of a life so deplorable? These words saved Briomer from a farther displeasure; not but that Meroveus made his sword be taken away, and kept himself in a posture to hinder him, if he should have persever'd in his design.

The Prince having thus begun to open his mouth to speak to Meroveus, sought words for the Princess; but finding none to express his grief: You see (in the end, said he, with a voice betraying his want of confidence) you see, Madam, whether it be my intention, or my fortune which causeth my greatest crimes; and you cannot possibly doubt but that at this fatal time I had a design to serve you, and none at all to offend you; but it is not my fortune to find my justification: for a man hated by Heaven, as I am, can never be innocent. Arm your self then for that vengeance which you have promised to the Prince your Brother, and bring a thousand deaths to the heart of this Offender, by all those most cruel punishments your most just anger can inspire you with; they shall be much sweeter to me than your hatred: for nothing can be so cruel to Pharamond, as the unhappiness to be still odious to you. Yes, cruel one (answered the Princess, turning again her head towards him) I will arm for the vengeance I have promised, and which I owe to the blood of my Brother; but it shall not be only the Sueves and Bohemians which shall demand of thee the lives of their Princes, I will arm with them all that the World hath of valiant men and haters of Villainy: and since that by my misfortune, and thy cruelty, I see my self engaged in an Enterprize little conformable to my Sex, and perhaps less conformable to my inclinations; I will call gods and men to my assistance, and cover thy Country with a World of merciless Enemies, and with a thousand Swords snatch away that life which thou didst receive from Heaven only for my torment and thy misery. Ah (cri'd my Prince) if it be this life that can satisfy you, that satisfaction will be easily given you; and you will arm unprofitably so many thousand of men against me, since from my own sword you may receive what perhaps you might in vain attempt by so many others.

Speaking these words, he laid his hand upon the hilt of his sword, which I had put up in its sheath, and drawing it, turned it against his own bosom, when I cast my self down before him, and at the same time Ibere, and many others seized on his Arm to divert his cruel resolution; but we had with difficulty done it, if Rosamond, eager as she was for his ruine; had not her self, by what motive I know not, opposed it. 'Tis not to thy self (said she, with a demeanour which seem'd enlivened with some interest for his safety) that I would owe a revenge to which I am oblig'd; nor canst thou redouble the hatred I have for thee by a more cruel offence, than it will be to deprive me of the glory I hope for. Go, miserable man, since it is to thy misfortune that thou wouldst I should attribute thy crimes; and if thou beest sensible of any grief, deplore that cruel necessity to which thou hast reduc'd me; but know, that as I ought to assail thy life to acquit my promise, and my duty, it is thy duty to defend it, to let me have the glory of depriving thee of it; and if thou hast abandon'd it to this grief, whether true or feigned, which thou testifiest, I shall perhaps more difficultly pardon this fault than all the others thou hast committed against me.

Finishing these words, she made a sign with her hand for him to retire; and turning her head on the other side, testified that she could no longer suffer his presence. Pharamond remain'd for some time in the place where he was, overwhelm'd with an Abyss of Grief, which his whole courage was not able to support: and a little after with some sighs taking leave of the Princess, he turned the head of his Horse, and spurring him to a full speed, fled from the Object he ador'd with a swiftness wholly prodigious, and threw himself into the Wood which we had pass'd, without regarding whether he was follow'd by his own, or thinking into what place he retir'd.

But, my Lord (continued Cleomer) I consider not at all that I do insensibly abuse your patience and attention; and besides that the King my Master may have some impatience again to see you, it is now so late, that it is necessary you give some time to Supper, and the rest of the Night to your repose. Doubt not at all (said Constance) but I have a great desire to see the King, especially after so many admirable things which you have recounted of him; but he shall pardon me, if for himself I cannot break that attention you have given me to the Story of his Adventures, and particularly in a time when I can hardly give you a moment of release. At these words, he sent Valerius to intreat Pharamond to pardon him, if he could pass the Night without seeing him, and give him leave to dedicate it entirely to the rest of his History, rather than suffer a discontinuation; and in the end, having suffered Supper to be served, and causing Cleomer, whose merit and quality he knew, to accompany him, he took a light repast; which was no sooner finish'd, but having made some excuses to Cleomer for the trouble he gave him in so long a recital, he desir'd him to continue, and heard him begin again in this manner.

The end of the Second Book of the Second Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

AS the Adventures of Pharamond, and of Rosamond, form but the same History; it seems to me that I ought not to divide the recital, and principally in those most important things which are come to our knowledge: And for this reason, My Lord, I will tell you, That after Pharamond had in that manner remov'd himself from us by a precipitate flight, and we had follow'd towards the Wood which we saw him take; The desolate Princess of the Cimbrians, and the afflicted Albinda, remain'd in that fatal Field, where amongst the blood and dead bodies, the unfortunate Theobaldus had lost his life. And in the same place they yet dedicated some time to their tears; for the Soul of Rosamond was so overwhelm'd with a pressing grief, that it permitted her to take no resolution, nor to depart from the dead body of her deplorable Brother: but in the end, she was forc'd to hearken to reason, and to the prayers of the persons who attended her, who could not longer suffer her to remain in a place, and in so mournful an employment: and the comfortless Briomer having caus'd the Corps of Theobaldus to be taken up, and plac'd in one of the Chariots which had carried the bodies of the Princesses, seated himself by it, not being able to forsake it upon any consideration, whilst the two Princesses being with the Ladies mounted in the other two, they were about to take the way towards Egitina, whither Briomer intended to conduct them, when they saw appear a great Body of Cavalry which advanc'd towards them with too swift a career.

They remain'd some time without power to discern whether they were Friends or Enemies, though they had more reason to fear the one, than hope the other, seeing them come from a part where the Cimbrians had no Parties; and in the end, when they were at a distance which permitted them to observe them more distinctly, many which were about the Princesses

Princess knew them for Burgundians; and soon after they discerned the famous Ensign of Gondioch, which made them know that he was in that Party. This advice which they gave to Rosamond, begat a new trouble in her mind, though there was already sufficient there to leave her little liberty to observe what she did; which made her, without perceiving that the Princess of the Sueves was not in the Chariot where she saw some Ladies about her, to command it to march after Briomer, who was already departed with the Corps of Theobaldus. The Chariot had not moved far by her order, but the Ladies advertised her that Albifinda was not with her: but they told her in the same time, that seeing her Chariot depart, she was got into the other that followed with the rest of the Ladies; and soon after, seeing it advance near hers, they chose rather to march to separated, and stay a more convenient time to come together, than stop and attend their Enemies.

But they had gone but a little farther, when they saw him come up; and Rosamond knew Gondioch at the head of his, who having lifted up the Viser of his Helmet, aborded her Chariot, and saluted her with an infinite respect. The Prince Condegar his Brother was next to him, and made himself easily be taken notice of by his noble carriage, and by the beauty of his Arms. Gondioch had understood by the Cimbrians, whom he found flying through the Plain, the defeat of their Party, and the deplorable death of their Prince by the hand of the King of the Franks; and in this accident so cruel to all other persons, he found matter of great joy, for the misfortune of his dreaded Rival, whom he saw by his miserable Adventure, depriv'd of all the hopes he had conceiv'd. It was with this advantage which Fortune had given him, that he approach'd Rosamond with more assurance; and seeing her countenance cover'd with tears, I praise the Gods, Madam, (said he) as much as it is permitted me in the deplorable estate in which I see you, not only that I have not contributed to that misfortune which makes you distil those tears, but that I come the first of all men to offer you my hand and my life for the revenge you owe to the Prince your Brother, and to protest to you that I will less make war with Pharamond, as against my Rival, than I will against the murderer of Theobaldus. Though I may seem weakened with the loss of one Battel, the event of which, Fortune, rather than Valour, decided; yet I am not wholly ruined, but have still the entire Forces of a potent Realm, ready to wait on your displeasure, and that of the King your Father. I will muster together a power which shall not be despisable; and when this Pharamond, this lover, as cruel as he is a friend unfaithful, together with the Cimbrians and the Sueves, shall have the Burgundians to combat with, that Fortune which hath hitherto been the Author of his so great advantages, may possibly change, and he with difficulty find amongst men the least refuge from so great enemies.

To this effect spoke Gondioch; and perhaps his passion had made him speak more, when Rosamond gently turning her eyes towards him, and beholding him with a behaviour which might make him judge how little she was sensible of his offers; Though you have not slain my Brother (said she) you know well that since the death of Vindimir, I have felt nothing of misery, with which I ought not to accuse you, and at present you are bound by so great obligations to the murderer of my Brother, that I cannot but be suspicious of all the offers you make me. Let it not then disgust you; if I employ both other forces and other hands than yours, in that I owe to the blood of my Brother: and in requital of that diligence I take to preserve your reputation in refusing an assistance from you which would make you pass among men for ingrateful, I only demand of you the freedom to lament my own misfortunes.

This reply of Rosamonds surpris'd the Burgundian King, and the confusion it gave him, render'd him for some moments astonish'd; but soon after, dispelling that with a passion which made him insensible of all things but it self, *If I have contributed (said he) to a part of your injuries, you can accuse nothing but a passion which may demand a pardon for greater crimes; and for those obligations I have had to the King of the Franks (though the reproach would have been less displeasing, and perhaps more just from any other mouth than yours) you know, Madam, that by his infidelity I am dissens'd with them, and that without fearing to pass as ingrateful among men, I can pursue him unto death as the greatest of my enemies. If it be so, (replied the Princess very briskly) Pharamond is not so far distant from you, but that the same day you may satisfy the disgust you have against him. I should satisfy it without doubt (answered Gondioch) and should run with infinite joy to the opportunity you offer me, if I could forsake you; but as the opportunities to serve you are more precious to me than all others, you shall permit me to accompany you to an assured retreat. If you no longer continue to make war against us (replied the Princess) we have no more enemies in this Country; and then with the persons which yet remain with us, we can retire to some place of the King my Father, without any necessity of your conduct. You may think it* good,

good, if you please (added the Burgundian) that I depart not from you, and that I tell you, that you cannot be so assured with the King your Father, as with a Prince that adores you, and cannot without death desert you. I see well (said the Princess very fiercely) what will be our condition : and no sooner did I see you, but I did not at all doubt we were prisoners. But let us go (continued she with a noble and becoming constancy) whither our Fortune will please to lead us. The Gods, who have once delivered us from your hands, may still yield us the same succours, and leave you nothing of your unworthy proceeding, but shame and confusion. Speaking these words, she arm'd her self with a resolution worthy of her great courage ; and turning her head on the other side, spoke no more to Gondioch, nor design'd longer to look upon him, though he march'd by the side of her Chariot.

In the mean time, Prince Gondemar his Brother, having beheld the Princess of the Cimbrians with that astonishment which her admirable beauty gave the whole world, and had excus'd by this sight the actions of the King his Brother, which perhaps he before condemn'd ; having understood that the Princess of the Sueves was in another Chariot, willing to render her what he believ'd due to her degree, and what he had heard publish'd of her merit and beauty, he approach'd to her, and saluted her with a becoming submission ; and the charming Albisinda, who had at the same time learn'd his name and quality, receiv'd his civility with no less sweetness. Gondemar beheld her with an infinite curiosity : and if the beauty of Rosamond had dazled and astonish'd him, that of Albisinda touch'd him with strange and tender motions, and made him already begin to feel something extraordinary. The more he beheld her, the more he perceiv'd some alteration in his soul ; and he knew in the end that he became, and possibly that he was already become enamour'd of that fair Princess. Yet the greatness of his courage permitted not this knowledge to astonish him ; and as the sweetness which appear'd on the countenance of Albisinda attracted rather than dishearten'd, he permitted himself to be seduc'd by a charm which might without doubt produce a more grand effect. He had by his first discourse testified to the Princess the share he took in the grief which appear'd on her visage ; and he was about to open his mouth possibly to speak to her according to those motions which his growing passion could inspire him with, when he was disturbed by the confused voices of the men of their party : and turning his head at the noise they made, he with them beheld appear and advance at a great trot a great body of Cavalry, whose Forces seem'd little different from theirs. The more they approached, the more they made doubtful the minds of the Burgundians : and when they were so near as to give place to some discernment, Gondioch himself knew the first by many marks to be Franks. To speak the truth, it was indifferent to him to encounter Franks or Cimbrians, since both the one and the other were equally his enemies ; but he would much rather have chosen to have seen the Princess whom he loved, in the power of the King her Father, than in Pbaramond's. He feared not at all the Combat, nor could he be reproach'd for default of courage ; but at this time it was with infinite grief that he saw his enemies appear, judging well that he could not fight them without hazarding the loss of his fair prize : and as his love stopt his eyes to all other considerations, addressing himself to the Prince his Brother, who was near to him, and speaking to him very low, not to be understood by the Princesses, My Brother (said he) it is to day that I would owe all my Fortunes to your friendship and your valour ; and as I cannot believe you will judge ill of my courage to see me stie the Combat upon an occasion that concerns the whole repose of my life, I pray you to sustain with all our party that of our enemies which you see approach us, whilst I with ten or twelve Cavaliers only, lead away the Princess to that place where I have resolv'd to conduct her. I desire no greater number of our men, that I may not too much weaken you ; nor should any passion or interest perswade me to leave you, if I saw you not in a condition to gain the victory.

In this manner spoke Gondioch ; and Gondemar, seeing that he had no time to spare to execute the will of his Brother, amus'd not himself to answer him, but putting himself in the head of his Troops, he placed them between the Chariots, and the enemies which advanc'd towards him ; and so covering his Brother and the Princesses, he gave Gondioch the liberty which he desired, to retire with that Chariot in which only Rosamond was, which he caus'd to be encompassed by ten Cavaliers, marching on the side of the Princess, whilst one of his guided the Chariot that way he resolv'd to take, whom he made to drive with all possible speed and diligence : that of Albisinda, to which he did not use the same violence, stirr'd not from its place ; and as this Princess, and the persons who were about her, could not but expect either from the Cimbrians or Franks, much better conditions than they could hope from the Burgundians, they attended the success of the Combat, with some thoughts of liberty.

'Twas in few moments that the Burgundians and Franks drew near to each other; nor was Gondioch so far distant, but that he might easily have seen the beginning of the Combat, if both his eyes and thoughts so absolutely fixed upon Rosamond, would have permitted him to turn his head that way. But, my Lord, before I make you the recital of the fight, I must tell you, that it was by the Kings order sent by Gastaldus to the Camp; that a part of the Cavalry were mounted on Horseback, to come and joyn with him; and Prince Marcomire, more diligent than the others, and more zealous for the interest of the King his Brother, parted thence first with six hundred Horse, and had followed the tracks of Pharamond, with a swiftness which permitted not the rest to overtake him. The knowledge he had, that the King his Brother followed after the Princesses, who were led away in the Chariots, made him that he no sooner saw the Chariots and the Troops which encircled them whom he took for their Ravishers, but he doubted not at all, that these were they against whom he was to fight.

With this resolution, having for some few moments stopt his Party, and with some few words represented unto them the necessity which invoked their utmost valour; he marched in the head of them, with a countenance and presence so gallant and courageous, as could make him be supposed no other than the Brother of Pharamond. The number was equal or little different betwixt the two Troops: The courage of their two Chieftains alike, and the Combatants on each side advanc'd with an equal vigour. The two Princes having run against each other, with an unspeakable fury, shivered their Lances to the very handles, without moving in their Saddles: but in the first encounter, the earth was seen covered with great numbers of dead, wounded and dismounted persons of each party; and many Horses having lost their Riders, ran with an uncontroul'd liberty; through the Plain. After the trial of Lances, the Swords began to glister; and between these two parties was maintain'd so bloody a contest, that in a short time, the number of the dead surpass'd the living: The two brave Captains, by the effects of a prodigious valour, endeavour'd to force a victory for their party; and in truth, they carried it into whatever parts they applyed themselves: many times they assaulted each other with a heat and valour little different, and as many times had they been separated by their own, or constrai'd to lend their assistance in other places where their courage still open'd them a passage. In sum, the slaughter was so great, by the obstinacies of the combatants, that both of Franks and Burgundians there remained but a small number of men, who though covered with wounds, resolutely disputed the victory, and seem'd yet resolute to dispute it to the last drop of their blood. The two Princes sigh'd at the same time, to see those men whom they esteem'd dear, fall on every side of them; and Marcomire being touched with compassion, once more approaching Gondemar with his Sword in his hand, made a sign to him, that he would speak to him. The Burgundian having observ'd him, stopt to know his intention; and the Prince of the Franks approaching to him with his Viler half lifted up, There is already too much blood shed (said he) for a particular quarrel: and if thou beest so valiant as thou seemest, and so reasonable as thou art valiant, thou wilt not refuse either to spare the rest of the blood and lives, which remain to other men, by a combat of thy person and mine, or to restore that liberty to the Princesses, which thou hast deprived them of. If it be the Princess of the Cimbrians thou demandest (replied Gondemar) she is not in our power; and for the Princess of the Sueves, whom thou mayst see in that Chariot, I will fight against thee and against the whole world, rather than lose her.

'Twas cause of no small discontent to Marcomire, to understand that it was not the liberty of Rosamond he could hope for from the success of the Combat: however, his true generosity perswaded him not to repent what he had done for the service of Albifinda, though it little concerned that of the King his Brother; and beholding fiercely the Burgundian Prince; The Princess of the Cimbrians (said he) will possibly find a defender more worthy than my self: but since the gods have conducted me to the succour of the Princess of the Suevians, I will as well fight thee for her, as I would have done for both; and will lose my life, or give her liberty.

Whilst the two Princes spake in this manner, they rais'd their voices to such a height, and were so near the Chariot of Albifinda, that she could easily understand their discourse; and by the knowledge she had of their intentions, she knew for whom she ought to make her vows, and the difference she ought to put between her Ravisher and Defender. And therefore beholding them with an equal distinction, and having cast her eyes on the visage of Marcomire, which appeared in part under his Viler, and observ'd those beauties, which in a Sex like ours deservedly might attract admiration, she soon perceiv'd him cover that part of his face to renew the Combat, and the two Warriours (having with a furious furious voice commanded their men to be only Spectators) run one against the other with a far greater rage than had incensed them at the beginning of the fight. They made themselves to be observ'd by the Princess, and the other Spectators, by those terrible blows they gave; and as they were both valiant in the highest degree, they gave all that beheld the fight reasons to admire it, as the most fierce and furious Combat that ever was made between two men. I shall not weary you, my Lord, with the particulars (having but too much to recount you of the life of my Master) it shall suffice that you understand, that they were already covered with that blood, which in streams gush'd from their almost numberless wounds, when their Horses weaker than their Masters, and wearied with too great travel, tumbled at the same time under them, and oblig'd them to continue a Combat on foot, in which they drew forth almost all their blood; and in the end, reduc'd each other to an estate neither longer to fight nor to sustain themselves. Gondemar having stagger'd for a small time, at length rudely fell upon the Grass, turning by the blood that issu'd from his wounds that verdure to a vermilian hue; and the Brother of Pharamond employing all his forces to keep himself up, endeavour'd with infinite pain to reach the Chariot of Albisinda: before he could come near, his Helmet, the Buckles of which were broken, fell from his Head; and that fair Visage which the Princess had before but in part seen, now became her entire Object. The beauty of Marcomire, admirable in a degree remarkable in persons of our Sex, seem'd somewhat to amaze Albisinda: and as she had still in the Combat took notice of the person that fought in her quarrel, and whose victory and safety her apprehension of so great an obligation made her think it her duty to desire; so the sight of so beautiful a Defender, added something which particularly augmented her concern for him, and made her behold with some grief his staggering steps, and the blood which from many wounds spouted out between his gaping Armour: at length he approach'd the Chariot, on which he lean'd one hand to support himself; and looking upon the Princess with those eyes which his many wounds had enfeebld; Madam, (said he) I believe that you are free, and I come to offer that which remains of my life, to that which rests to complete your service. He had scarce strength to utter these words; but soon after his sight was cover'd with darkness, and his strength forsaking him, he remain'd senseless in the Arms of two of his men, who came to sustain him.

The charming Albisinda could not see the fair Marcomire, in this condition, without being sensibly touch'd with compassion; nor could she rejoyce at that liberty she thought she should buy at the rate of the life of so extraordinary a person. She learnt his Name from his Attendants; and this knowledge doubly surpriz'd her with a violent grief, to see a Prince whose dignity accompani'd both the valour and the charms of his person, reduc'd to the extremity of his life for her defence: yet could she not know him to be Brother to the Murderer of Vindimir and Theobaldus, without finding in that knowledge a cruel subject of extraordinary grief. Not but that she well knew Marcomire to be innocent of the misfortunes of her Brother, or that he seem'd less worthy of her compassion, and possibly of some more obliging thought for being the Brother of Pharamond; but she was not ignorant of the humour of the King her Father, fearing all things from his severity, if she should pay all she believed due to her generous Defender. However, this fear was not sufficient to restrain her; but yielding rather to her pity and to her acknowledgments, than to any other considerations, she caus'd the bleeding Prince to be laid in her Chariot, believing he might better so, than in any other manner, find those helps his condition did require. Those that remained of the Franks, follow'd their Prince, and the Chariot which carried him, towards Egitiaz, whither the Attendants of the Princess conducted her: and the Burgundians taking up their Prince, departed another way, without opposing or hindring their retreat.

In the mean time, the King of the Burgundians led away the Princess of the Cimbrians, making the Chariot march with all possible diligence. In a little time, he had pass'd several furlongs from the place where he had left his Brother engaged in a Combat, crossing all that Plain without finding any obstacle to stay him. The courageous Rosamond supported this last disgrace with a countenance worthy the greatness of her Soul; and in stead of breaking forth, or permitting her self to be transported to a passion against her unworthy Ravisher, she was contented to testify to him her displeasure, by her silence, and by her disdain: and to make him judge that the grief he might possibly cause by his violence, had no part in those sighs and those tears which she dedicated to the death of Theobaldus; as often as he opened his mouth, either to comfort her displeasures, or to execute his own procedure, she turned her head on the other side, not deigning to answer him a word: and more sensibly did she afflict him by this manner of behaviour toward him, than she could have done by complaints and reproaches.

From

From the Plain they descended into a fair Valley, and had for some time kept along the Banks of a small Stream, which murmur'd along a pleasing Meadow, when they spied coming directly towards them a Knight follow'd by eight or ten Horsemen, who march'd some paces behind him, and seem'd to be of his Train: His Squires bore after him his Shield, his Lance, and his Helmet, and his Visage being uncover'd, those who nearest saw him, judg'd that few men in the World were adorn'd with so Noble a Gesture, Majesty and Grace in all his person: all the Features of his Countenance were proportionably compos'd; his Eyes lively and sparkling, his Hair black, long, and flowing in fair and beautiful curls; his Stature large, straight, and the fairest in the World; or to praise him truly, little or nothing different from that of the King my Master. He was mounted on a most stately Steed, and his Arms were beyond measure rich and magnificent.

His silent march gave Gondioch and his the more time to observe him: and when he came near the Chariot, he permitted it to pass without moving from his place; and saluted the Ladies, whom he confusedly beheld, with infinite civility: Gondioch and his men had not separated themselves at all from the Chariot, but an hundred paces behind it follow'd two Officers of the Princess, who would not forsake her; and whom Gondioch's fear to incense the Princess had forbid him to draw away. When the unknown Knight pass'd by them, he stay'd them to inform his curiosity, and pray'd them with a becoming civility, to tell him what those Ladies were he had seen pass by in the Chariot: but scarce had he opened his mouth to ask them, when one of the men hastily breaking silence; It is the Princess of the Cimbrians (said he) and the only Daughter of our great King, whom an unjust Ravisher hath surpriz'd, and thus leads away by violence. The unknown Knight seem'd touch'd at these words; and addressing himself to him that spoke them, Do you speak the truth? (said he, with a countenance full of fierceness.) Yes, my Lord, (added the Companion of him who had before spoke) and if you at all doubt it, you may easily clear your self. He had scarce ended these words, but the Unknown covering his Head with his Helmet, and making sign to his own to follow him, return'd on a full gallop towards the Chariot, which he easily overtook. Gondioch perceiving his return, and doubting possibly his intention, stopp'd the Chariot and all those that convoyed it; and presenting himself at his approach, before he could come near the Chariot, fiercely demanded of him what he desired. I would understand (repli'd the Unknown Knight, with a boldness not inferiour to his) if these Ladies which thou leade'st away, do willingly follow thee? And what concerns it thee to inform thy self? (replied Gondioch infinitely enrag'd.) I have (answered the Unknown Knight) that of service and interest which we owe to the Sex: and if it be by force that thou leade'st them away, thou shalt hardly accomplish thy design, though assisted by far greater Forces.

He had scarce spoke these words, when the Ladies which were about the Princess, by their cries and confused words confirm'd him in the truth of their Adventure, and at the same time demanded his assistance. This solicitation was little necessary for a man, whose vertue and courage were sufficient spurs to incite him to so generous an action; therefore taking his Lance and his Shield from the hands of his Squires, he made Gondioch know, that before he led away the Princess, he must with his Sword open his passage. This obstacle begat a furious rage in the Burgundian's breast; and beholding his Enemy with eyes sparkling with anger, Thou wilt repent thy self (said he) of thy presumptuous undertaking: for with thy life shalt thou satisfy the displeasure which thou make'st me sensible of. I have seen (replied the Unknown Knight with a look full of disdain) as terrible as thy self who could not affright me; and in the condition in which I encounter thee, I can difficultly believe thee to be a valiant man.

These words were not necessary to incense Gondioch, whose choler was rais'd to the highest pitch; but believing that he should have need of his men to guard the Chariot, and fearing if he should call them to fight with him against those of the Unknown Knight, the Princess might in the mean time escape, he sought a remedy for that danger: and looking on his Enemy with a most assured confidence; To take from thee all doubt (said he) of my valour, I desire that thou mayest without any hinderance prove it: and though seldom men like my self commit themselves to the like proofs, and that considering the glory I give thee opportunity to acquire, I can hope for little; if thou wilt that our men be Spectators of our Combat, we will end our difference in thy person and mine. I am pleas'd with what thou desire'st (repli'd the Unknown Knight) so that the Chariot depart not from us; and I will tell thee more, that if Fortune give thee the Victory in our Combat, thou wilt perhaps lose nothing of the glory thou hast acquir'd.

Finishing these words, they commanded their men not to move from their places; and turning the heads of their Horses, they took from each other the distance of a just carrier, and soon after parting, they ran together with a marvellous strength and agility. Their shock was truly terrible, and their Lances flew in a thousand splinters while they sat unmov'd in their Saddles. At the same time they put their Hands to their Swords, and turning with an equal courage, charg'd so furiously, and dealt such furious strokes, as could not but be the effect of an admirable and extraordinary force and valour. The Combat remain'd a long time equal; for the most feeble of these two Champions were perhaps able to have for some time withheld and stopp'd the glory of the most valiant in the World. Many times did their Spectators balance their judgment of the event of the Combat, and as often they believed it could not be ended but by the death of both the Combatants: but in the end (for I hope you will be pleas'd, my Lord, that I pass over particulars of the least importance) some difference might be not'd between the Forces of Gondioch and his Enemy; and that Gondioch, famous by so many celebrated Victories, began to faint by reason of the many wounds he had received; and found with an infinite grief, that those of his Enemies, though very great, did not cause the same effect in him. He despair'd not however of Victory, but seeking it in the greatest danger, threw himself more than ever under the force of his Enemy; and in requital of the blows he received from him, made his Armour blush with those streams of blood which issued from the open'd passages.

Yet the unknown Knight seem'd incens'd, rather than weakn'd, and pressing Gondioch with more fury than he had hitherto done, he threw upon him a tempest of such terrible blows, that in fine, his Forces were constrain'd to yield and bend under them; and he after having some time reel'd in his Saddle, to fall without sense to the Earth, staying in several places with his blood the verdant Grass; His Vanquisher seem'd to behold his fall with some compassion, when the Burgundians, in whose Souls he had equally incited a fury and despair, ran upon him with great cries, and forgetting the command of a Master, who was no longer in a condition to be obey'd, endeavour'd with all their might to revenge themselves upon his Enemy: but the Unknown flew among them with so extraordinary and prodigious a valour, that before his men could come to his assistance, he had with his two first blows given a deserv'd death to the two most hardy; and made the rest judge, that without the assistance of his own men, he could carry the victory from them all: he had likewise tumbld down some others, and they had all without doubt been slain, had not the valiant Unknown person taken diligent care for their safety, by commanding his men to retire, and ordaining those which remain'd of the vanquish'd to take up their Master, and afford him those helps he was yet capable to receive.

After this Action he approach'd the Chariot, and having before understood the name and quality of the Princess, he alighted to accost her with more respect. Rosamond, who now beheld his Noble Carriage with as much astonishment, as in the Combat she had admir'd his valour, and who by the success of it was bound to him for her liberty, to receive him with more civility, lifted up her Veil, which till then had covered her Face, and discover'd that prodigious beauty, whose first brightness mortal eyes are hardly able to support. This valiant unknown Knight was not only astonish'd at it, but seem'd struck in that manner, that he appear'd like one almost bereav'd of sense and knowledge; and remain'd at this sight, on which all his senses were fix'd, immoveable, mute, and amaz'd in such manner, that he had not the assurance to open his mouth to speak, or scarce the force to sustain that resplendent light which dazld him. As this was not the first effect of this nature that the beauty of Rosamond had produc'd, she seem'd not at all surpris'd at his behaviour; however dissembling the suspicion she had of the truth, and supplying the trouble which she observ'd he had in his countenance by the assistance she gave him, she feign'd to attribute it to other causes than to that which she ought to have accus'd; and having in few words, but with an infinite sweetness, return'd him thanks for the assistance he had given her, she demanded of him with a manifest disturbance and compassion if he were not wounded.

The time which she took to speak, was sufficient for the Unknown Knight to recover himself; and at the length with great difficulty finding words to answer her, Yes, Madam (said he) I feel that I am wounded, nor can it be easie in such encounters as these to escape without wounds; but those which I have receiv'd, shall not hinder me to finish what rests for me to do in your service, and to accompany you to whatever place you resolve to retire. As I owe you my liberty (answered the Princess) I would not refuse your company, if in the condition in which you are, I could accept it without exposing you to some danger; but however it be, I believe that to afford you fitting remedy for your wounds, there is a retreat nearer than that we have design'd to be if possible conducted to.

The brave unknown Knight sigh'd at this Discourse, without returning answer, and made her Judge by his silence and action, he felt more than he could express; and in the mean time time the Princess calling to her one of those Officers which followed her, demanded of him how far it was to Egitina, and understood from him that she might be there in two hours. The day was already so far spent that the Princess could not hope to get thither by day-light, besides that she had spent all that day, and a day full of so many cruel accidents, without taking any nourishment: but there was no nearer place of retreat under the obedience of the King her Father, and the Country being so well known to her men; that they could conduct her through by ways, she resolv'd to march to Egitina without farther delay, and to commit her self, since she was reduc'd to a necessity to do it, to the conduct of a person of whom she had conceiv'd a marvellous good opinion, and whose generous proceedings could not beget in her the least mistrust. In these thoughts addressing her speech to him, I am constrain'd (said she) to accept that company you offer me; and to lead you farther than perhaps your wounds will permit you to go without inconvenience: but we have no place nearer where we can give you that assistance we owe you; and I hope in that you will receive some marks of the acknowledgments of the King my Father: But (added she) will you not permit me to demand to whom I am engag'd for my liberty, and excuse the desire I have to know a person in whom I see all the signs of a true Grandeur? Hitherto (replyed the unknown Knight) I have made my self little known in those places I have pass'd in that condition you now see me; but now, since my condition hath received a change which it owed perhaps to the conduct of my life, there is no reason but I should submit to the obedience I owe you; and therefore since you command it, I will tell you that I am Son to the King of the Huns, and my name is Balamir.

That name of Balamir, (though he that bore it was not much more aged than the King my Master) was already in such manner blazon'd through the world by many effects of an admirable valour, that the Princess of the Cimbrians could not hear it pronounc'd without paying him that respect due, and shewing her self glad to be oblig'd for so great a service to a Prince of that high birth, and whose great reputation accompanied so worthily all those advantages she had mark'd in his person: she permitted her eyes to run over him more accurately than her grief had till then suffer'd her's; and again addressing her self to him with a behaviour full of sweetness and majesty, This name of Balamir, (said she) is so famous throughout all the world, that the very naming it is sufficient to make us learn all we ought to know: but all that I have seen in you, seems so conformable to that great name, that I could indeed hope no less from you. You will pardon the trouble and the grief wherewith my soul is this day afflicted; and if they have made me commit any faults against you, permit me to repair them in another place, and in another condition, the best I can possibly.

After these words, she prayed him to get up into her Chariot, for fear lest travel on Horse back should injure his wounds: but he excus'd himself from this great civility of the Princess, with a profound submission; which having more advantageously testified to her by his behaviour and by his looks, than by his words, he mounted on Horseback so nimbly, as made him easily be adjudg'd able to support a greater travel. The Princess had the goodness to let the Burgundians know, whom she saw in a capacity to succour Gondioch, that if they would carry him to Egitina, he should be treated like a King, and not like an enemy: but they accepted not her offers; but making a Hand-barrow, with the greatest diligence possible, they carried him another way, whilst Rosimond with Balamir took theirs towards Egitina, where, with Briomer and the body of Theobaldus, she hoped to find Albisinda, if fortune had been favourable to those that fought for her. You shall understand at leisure, my Lord, the fortunes of them both; but it is now time that I return to the desolate Pharamond, whom I have perhaps too long forsaken in this recital of what befel to the two Princesses.

The unfortunate King of the Franks, transported by that cruel grief which entirely possessed his soul, was fled from us with an infinite swiftness, and as I think I have told your Lordship, had thrown himself into that wood which we had some time before cross'd. As it was not the society of men, but rather the horrors of solitude that he sought; so he frequented not the beaten paths, but the places most obscure, and most conceal'd. He wandred a long time without other design than that to flee from the world, from the light, and from himself, if it were possible: but in flying all things, he could not flee from his grief, which cruelly followed him every where, and begat a war in his bosom in what place soever he retir'd. At this fatal time, a thousand sighs issued from his breast; and accompanied sometimes with some lamenting words, made those places of the wood he pass'd, echo his mournful sounds, and had touch'd with pity the most obdurate hearts, had they been witnesses of the sad marks of his desolate grief.

Oh Fortune (said he) though all men are sensible of thy inconstancy, is there any among men whom thou hast treated like me? Those favours which thou mayst have afforded me in war, can they be esteemed favours, if they prove more unfortunate to me than all the miseries of the vanquish'd? Oh Gondioch, Oh Maximus, Oh thou King of the Cimbrians, I envy your condition; and it would, perhaps, have been more sweet to me to have lost ten battels, and to have been despoil'd of my estates, so I had not become the murderer of the Brother of Rosamond. O Theobaldus, thy death causes me to die ten thousand more cruel deaths; and that vengeance which thou hast dying demanded, must be cruelly executed against this unfortunate, who would willingly, if it were possible, at the price of his own, restore thy life.

In speaking these words, and many others like them, he found himself near a fountain, by the side of certain Ruines, covered with Moss, in the most obscure and savage place of the wood; and because night approached, and he found himself wearied with that days travel, he alighted, drank some water of the fountain, and let himself fall upon the grass, lying without any care either of the wound he had in his shoulder, or of the need he had of nourishment, having taken none all that day. It was in this place that I found him a little before that the day had yielded its brightness to obscurity: and as I was, perhaps, of all his, the person most affectionate to his service, and which was most obliged to it by the confidence he honoured me with; I was the most diligent to follow him, and the most happy to find him.

I could not see him in the condition wherein he appeared to me, without distilling some drops from my eyes; and approaching him, I accompanied for some time my grief with my tears, and with my silence, without speaking a word: but a little after, he discover'd me; and gently turning his eyes towards me, I am much pleas'd, Cleomer, (said he with a feeble voice) to see you alone near me; for in this deplorable estate into which Fortune hath thrown me, the company of other persons would scarce be supportable. That grief which had lock'd up my heart, and bound my tongue, hindred me from answering him for some time; and when I could do it, instead of amusing my self in vain to combat his grief, I entreated him not to be offended if I solicited him to depart from that place, and go to some other where his wound might be dress'd, and he receive that nourishment which was necessary: he received my discourse with his accusom'd sweetness, yet seem'd little perswaded; but beholding me with a languishing eye, which discover'd the little love he had for life, Ah, Cleomer, (said he) those things for which you take care, are of little importance: happy should I be, if this wound which gives you so much disquiet, were in the midst of my heart. I must die, (added he a little after) and since Fortune hath so cruelly abus'd those hopes I durst conceive, and that in a misery like mine, none that have not lost their reason can think of a remedy, I must embrace that which only death can offer me, and not any longer suffer a thought for the preservation of this deplorable life.

He spoke to me many others things to the same purpose, which the length permits me not to recount you; and whatever I could say to him to oblige him to quit that place, he pass'd the night there in the most pitiful condition in the world; and though I was wearied, and had fasted as long as he, yet the trouble his condition made me partner in, hindred me from feeling it: but I labour'd as much as I could, to perswade him to mount on Horse-back, not daring to stir a pace from him to go seek our people, or procure things necessary, for fear lest I should no more find him.

The Sun was now risen, yet could not I judge what resolution he would take, when I heard the wood resound with the noise and neighing of Horses; and a little after, I saw our men appear on all sides, who, having search'd over the rest of the wood, in the end came to this place. Had I followed the intention of my Princce, I had conceal'd my self: but on the contrary, I both shew'd my self, and call'd them with a loud voice; and no sooner had they discover'd us, but they came running to us on all sides; and the principal of them being alighted, approaching the King, environed him: he rais'd himself half way to look upon them, and saw not only Prince Ibere, Meroveus, and Adelard, who had followed him the day before, but with them he saw Charamont, Gastaldus, and many other principal Captains of the Army, who had parted from the Camp after Marcomire, and followed him with the greatest part of the Cavalry.

My Prince, however overwhelmed with this grief, could not but with some shame behold himself before so many brave men in a condition so little conformable to his great courage; and casting down his eyes with some confusion, he endeavour'd to dissemble a part of what he felt. Charamont, and all those that came with him, had understood from Ibere what had pass'd the day before; and by the knowledge they had of so great a misfortune befallen the King, they seem'd not astonish'd at all at those marks of sadness they beheld beheld in his visage, and in all his proceedings. Charamont, whose spirit was sensible of the misery of his Prince, flattered at present his grief, instead of condemning it; and only told him, that there might yet be a remedy for his misfortunes; that if he would be assenting to himself a little, and not lose his courage at a time wherein it was most necessary, he did not despair to see him happy.

Though the King had ever a great belief in Charamont, yet he perceived now but little foundation of reason in his discourse; attributing it to his affection, rather than to any appearance of probability: and shaking his head with an aspect that express'd his thoughts, Charamont, (said he) flatter us no more; never was any misfortune parallel to mine: and as my misery is without example, so it is without remedy, without consolation: I will therefore seek neither the one nor the other, but only in death; for the fear which it gives to the most happy and most stout-hearted comes not near the horror I find in life.

Though Charamont would not at first disturb the grief of my Prince, he oppos'd to his discourse sound and solid reasons; telling him, That a misfortune like that which was befallen him, might well produce some effect on the most firm and constant spirit in the world, but ought not to daunt a courage like his, or make him forget that he was a great King, made illustrious among men by so many famous victories, and a King on whom the whole world had cast their eyes, as on the fairest object of their hopes: That a passion like that which he resent'd, was pardonable in a Prince of his age, whilst it drew him not from those limits which were prescribed to his degree and virtues; but that it would be no more so, when it should make him lose the memory of what he ought to all the earth, and more especially of what he ought to himself. But when he saw he was insensible of this discourse, and seem'd to have buried in his grief the remembrance of what ought to have been most important to him; My Sovereign, (said he) I had no design to tell you all things in the condition wherein I found you; but since you constrain me by thus abandoning your self to passion in a time wherein all your virtue is most necessary, I must no longer flatter you, but advertise you, that if the love of your self can prevail nothing with you, it is by that of glory and by that of duty that you are called to the defence of your Kingdoms. The King of the Sueves hath assaulted Franconia; and that Viridomar whom they have so long expected, and to whom they have destin'd the possession of Rosamond, not only accompanies his Father, but hath made the blood of your people run down in streams, and overturning like an irresistible torrent the greatest part of your Provinces, has already laid siege to the Metropolis of your Realm; and by a boldness yet less pardonable in a Rival than any other enemy, he will not present himself before his destin'd Rosamond, till he be able to offer her the Crown of your Fathers.

These words which Charamont pronounc'd with an infinite grace and vehemency, imprinted a deep sense in the soul of Pharamond, and wakened him from that fatal dream wherein his grief seem'd to have buried him; and turning his head towards Charamont, he demand'd of him if what he had related of the King of the Sueves, and the Prince Viridomar his Son, were true, when he presented to him a man on whom he had not as yet cast his eyes: Sovereign, (said he) see here Harald, whom Basogastus hath sent to you, he arriv'd last night at the Camp, and it is from him your Majesty may best learn the estate of Franconia.

The King received Harald with his ordinary sweetness; and having listen'd to what he had to say, he understood that the King of the Sueves and Prince Viridomar his Son, were enter'd into Franconia, with an Army of one hundred thousand men, whilst the King of the Cimbrians, as it was reported, was turned towards the Country, where we now were with the like Force: That they had open'd their passage by the Country of the Catti, and soon cut in pieces all the Forces they found in the Frontiers: That by the sole terrour of their Arms they had made themselves Masters of the Country of the Chassuares, and all the Territory bordering on Visurgues: That having laid waste the Country by the severity of the Suevish King, who destroy'd all with Fire and Sword, they were advanc'd towards the Mein without finding any considerable resistance: That Basogastus had performed all the duty both of a faithful Lieutenant, and experienc'd Captain: That with all possible diligence he had caus'd Levies to be made amongst the Angrinarians, the Marses, the Bruderes, the Tenieres, the Saliens, and other people which compose Franconia: That with those Forces he had on foot, he had defended the passages as much as he could possibly, but that he was found too weak to oppose so great a power; and having been over-powered by numbers in many encounters, and in the end defeated in a great Battel which he was constrain'd to give, and by which he had lost a great part of his Army, he was retir'd into Peapolis, (which was well furnish'd with all things to maintain a Siege) resolving resolving to defend it to the last man: That he had sent several messengers, but that none were returned: That fearing lest they were fallen into the hands of the enemy, and that the King was still ignorant of the misery of his Country; in the end, Harald, though he had most important employments in the Army, judging well of what necessity this advice was for the safety of the Kingdom, had offered to go himself: and that in effect, by the dangers he had run, and the difficulties he had to enter into the Country of the Bohemians, the passages of which were guarded by the Cimbrians, he had judg'd that those who were sent before him had been taken.

To this discourse Harald added several other things, which were publish'd of the valour of Viridomar; by whose presence the King his Father thought himself more fortified, than by his best Squadrons; recounting many particular proofs, of which no examples were to be found but in the person of Pharamond: and concluded in the end, with telling the King that his presence was not only necessary for the safety of his Realm, but that if he did not march thither with all diligence, he would possibly find affairs in such a condition, as it would be difficult for him to recover them.

The King sigh'd many times, during the discourse of Harald, and with an admirable patience, gave him all the attention he could desire; but when he saw him prolong his discourse in the praises of his Rival, he seem'd more mov'd at those words than at any other part of his discourse; and made it appear by a redness which dyed his cheeks, that he was not insensible of them. And when Harald ceas'd to speak, turning himself towards Ibere, Charamont, Meroveus, and the others, with an aspect more lively than formerly; Come, my friends (said he) let us march to the defence of our Country, to which honour and so many duties call us, and which no passion can dispense with: our enemies shall possibly yet find some resistance from us; and that happy lover destin'd to the possession of Rosamond, and who by my ruine would raise himself to that felicity, will not, it may be, find the way so easie as he imagines.

He added to these but few words more; that grief which wholly possess'd his soul, giving him but little liberty: but he was no longer obstinate to stay in that place where we were, nor did he hinder the dressing of his wound, or refuse that sustenance was presented him. His wound constrain'd him to stay three days at a Bourg, where we made him stop contrary to his intention; and having in the mean time taken resolution to do all things to which he believ'd himself oblig'd, and by the assistance of his courage and sollicitation of his friends, awakened in himself all his virtue, he sent his orders to the Camp near Marobuda, to cause his Troops depart, and take their march on that side he resolv'd to pass: and because he would no more go into that City, where he could no longer see Rosamond, and where he feared too much to be detested as the murderer of their Prince; he caus'd a Bridge of Boats to be built lower over the Elba, by which he design'd to joyn with Prince Priam and the body of the Army, in the Country of the Coldules.

But having understood how Prince Marcomire his Brother had left the Camp, with six hundred Horse, to come and joyn with him; and how in the end, he had fought with Gondioch, and was retired sorely wounded in the Chariot of the Princess of the Sueves, towards Egitina; he would not depart, without knowing news of him; nor could the fear to incense Rosamond, in sending one of his own messengers to a City whither it was reported she was retired, how powerful soever it was over his spirit, restrain him from paying what he ought to a Brother, and the virtue of such a Prince: resolv'd therefore to lose all things rather than forsake him, he sent Adelard to Egitina to see him, since he was not permitted to go thither himself, and understand in what citate he was: And because from the Bourg where we were, to Egitina was but four hours journey, Adelard returned the same day, and reported that he had seen the Prince in bed with many great wounds, but not at all dangerous: That the Princess Albisinda caus'd him to be served with a generous care; and that the Princess of the Cimbrians, though she had not visited him, had commanded he should be treated according to his quality, and the service he had done for the Suevish Princess: That he seem'd well satisfied to be in the place where he was though according to his opinion, he perceiv'd something new breeding in his soul: That he entreated the King to march without delay, to the assistance and succour of his Kingdom; the necessity of which he had inform'd him of, and whither he would come and find him so soon as his strength would permit him; and in the mean time, to be assur'd that he was not only in safety, and well served in Egitina, but that perhaps his stay would not be improfitable to him.

This report of such a person as Adelard, who was considerable both for his birth and virtue, and particularly esteem'd by Marcomire, begat some repose in the spirit of the King: and and if he had no reason to fear his wounds, he was not at all troubl'd, that he made some stay near Rosamond, to whom, if he were so happy as to see her, and to be hearken'd to by her, he might speak something of his innocence, and of his love. However, though Marcomire had with him a part of his Attendants, yet would he needs send some of his own to serve him, and to tell him, that neither the help he ought to his Kingdom, or any other considerations, should compel him to forsake him, if he thought his presence necessary, but that upon the least occasion he should be ready to return with the whole force of his Realm.

To the discourse which Adelard made the King touching the Prince his Brother, he added what he had heard of the Combat between Balamir, and Gondiob; and how that Balamir, the youngest Son of the King of the Huns, who had already gain'd so fair a reputation in the World, having overcome Gondiob in the fight of Rosamond, had accompany'd her to Egitina, where she caused those wounds he had receiv'd to be dress'd with great care; and where it was reported, that he was more deeply wounded by the eyes of Rosamond, than by the Sword of Gondiob. Pharamond, to whom Renown had already made known the valour of Balamir, and that possibly among men there could not be found a Rival of greater merit, and who with greater advantages might dispute with him Rosamond, principally in a time wherein all things were as favourable to his Rivals, as they were contrary to him, understood with no small grief, that his ill fortune had rais'd him up such a Competitor: and though he did not fear his valour, nor that of all men together, if all men had been his Enemies; yet he fear'd his fortune, and the advantages he had to be introduced to the Princess by his services, while he himself had made himself known to her, only by too cruel offences.

This reflection which he had made, both on the good fortune of Balamir, who by a Destiny so contrary to his, had begun to serve Rosamond so soon as he saw her; and on that of Viridomar, to whom she was design'd before a fight of her, or without having bought the possession, by one sole fight, drew many sighs from his breast, and made him speak many words deploring his misery, and discovering the birth of a passion, which joyned it self with his love and grief, the more to torment him: but as by his great courage, he was resolv'd against the most terrible events, he fortifi'd himself with whatever of most heroick it could inspire him with, to combat his ill fortune to the end: and the corivalthip of two such valiant men, instead of adding to his misery by abating his courage, revived in him what his grief seem'd to have laid asleep, and renew'd a fire in his eyes, which denoted the return of his pristine fierceness; We shall see (said he) these terrible Rivals, which my cruel destiny hath rais'd me, we shall see them without fear of that great reputation renown flatters them withal; and if the Heavens be not as favourable to them as they are opposite to me, I dare hope we shall see them without envy. All things concur to their felicity, as they arm themselves for my ruine; but with all these advantages, they have not yet overcome me; and if my courage abandon me not, it shall cost them Rivers of blood, before they shall be possessors of Rosamond.

With this resolution, which seem'd to give him new strength, and banish'd all that feebleness which his love or grief might have wrought, placing himself at the Head of his own men, we march'd towards the Elba, which we pass'd over by the Bridge of Boats which he had caused to be made; and so into the Country of the Coldules, where we joyned with the body of the Army, conducted by the famous Priam, and took our way towards the Frontiers of the Bohemians, whom we left on that side where they border on the Country of the Narisques, and with much difficulty climbed up the Mountains. Not but that the passage had been more easie on the Coast of Usbinum, and the Mountains less craggy; but the King not doubting but that the Cimbrians did defend that passage; and fearing besides, lest a retardment might cause the ruine of his Country, he shunn'd as much as he could the meeting with the Father of Rosamond, for fear of finding new occasions to offend her. From the Hercinian Mountains, we descended into the Country of the Narisques, and march'd towards that of the Hermatures: but because our Army came not near the number of our Enemies, not being compos'd of more than forty thousand men, so soon as we were parted, the King sent back Harald to Basogastus, to advertise him of his Arrival, in case he could enter into Peapolis, and oblige him to come to his assistance; the Princes Sunnon and Genebaud were post'd before with all possible speed towards the Provinces to make Levies, and to lead all the Troops they found in a posture to march into the Country of the Marcomans, where the King had appointed the general rendezvous.

From the Country of the Hermatures, we march'd into that of the Hirudes, which borders on the Frontiers of Franconia; but before we entred, the King being inform'd what

what had passed, the condition of Peapolis, and news of the Princess Polixena his Sister, for whom he suffered no small trouble, understood likewise, that by the valour of Viridomar, the Affairs of the Field were in an ill estate; that with a part of his Troops he had on all sides beaten the Allies of Franconia, whom Basogastus had called to his assistance, and slain with his own hand the two Princes of the Turomens and the Marcomans in a battle gain'd over them: That as for the besieged City, Basogastus still defended it with infinite valour; and that as he had retired into the Walls with a good party of those which remain'd of his Army, he still made sallies, by which he much annoy'd the besiegers: That as for the Princess Polixena, she was in Peapolis, where she was retired sometime before the siege, from a Palace in the Country, together with the Princess Theodora, Wife of Priam, not without having been in manifest danger of falling into the hands of the Sueves. It was farther told him, that the King of the Sueves was some dayes before retired into his Kingdom, leaving the care of the Army, and of the management of the whole War to the Prince Viridomar his Son, for which the whole Country rejoyc'd: not that the Prince was less formidable than the King his Father, who was without doubt much inferior to him, in valour, and the whole mystery of War; but because he better treated the vanquish'd and made War with a noble mildness and generosity, whilst the King his Father put all to the sword, in all places where he commanded.

The King thus fully inform'd, was astonish'd that his Enemies could so long time keep him ignorant of the misfortunes and miseries of his Country, though he might well perceive the cause to be the situation of the Country of the Bohemians, encompassed on all sides, as with a high Wall, by the Hercinian Mountains, and that vast Forrest, all the passages whereof, by which in likelihood news was posted, were guarded by the Cimbrians; he therefore deliberated at present with the principal Commanders of his Army, what was necessary to be done in the conduct of this War, not being ignorant that he had to deal with a Prince, whose Renown was already flown through the Earth, and who, according to the fame spread abroad of him, was inferior in valour to none in the World.

Many of his Commanders were of opinion that he was not to advance into Franconia, till our Army were strengthened by those Succours we expected, judging that we ought to attend them in the Country, whither the Princes Sunnon and Genebaud had order to conduct them, without committing our selves, in the condition we were, to the hazard of a battle, the loss of which might draw with it that of the whole Kingdom. But though the King hearkned willingly to the advice of his Friends, and respected it as far as he could, yet he could not resolve on what they propos'd; representing unto them, that it had little appearance of reason to attend a Succour, which by the loss of his Neighbours and Allies was very uncertain, and could not but at best be late: That the Army began to increase, and would by his farther advance into the Country, daily strengthen it self on all sides, whilst that of his Enemies must of necessity be weakn'd: that therefore he judg'd it better, and more honourable for him and for us, to march by little Journeys straight to Peapolis: That by our march we should either oblige Viridomar to raise his siege, and advance with his whole Army towards us, or at least with a part of it, whilst he left the other to beleague the City; or if neither of these yet to stay in his Camp, and there expect us: That if he took this last resolution, he would thereby give us time necessary to lodge advantagiously, attend the Succour of our Allies, and annoy the Enemy in such sort, that it would be impossible for them to make any progress in the siege: That if they came to meet us with a part of the Army, ours would be strong enough to fight it; or if he intirely raised the siege, and came with his whole Forces, Basogastus, who had a good party of Cavalry, which he might draw forth in little time, being free to sally, would fall upon them in the Rear, and give no little trouble to an Army that were to find another in their Front; and especially in a Country which yielded all advantages to us, and all inconveniencies to our Enemies: That he would send new Orders to Sunnon, to march with all speed towards Peapolis with those men he had raised; and that he could not fail to arrive either to our assistance, or to that of Basogastus.

This was the King's resolution, which was approv'd by all his Commanders, not only because it was more glorious than any other he could take, but because the success might in probability be such as the King foresaw. So soon as it was taken, they began to put it in execution; and on the morrow, the Army entred into Franconia, in a most gallant order: the march prov'd so much the more easie, in that we had no Rivers to pass which in that season were not fordable, nor any City which might stop us. The City of Peapolis is situated in a fair Plain, on the Banks of the River Meine, which on one side washes the feet of its Walls; whilst on the other it is fortifi'd with a deep and large Ditch full of Water, and the Citadel flank'd with a great number of strong and stately Towers which defend it, makes its approach very difficult. The King of the Sueves had besieg'd it on both sides, but his Army had an entercourse by two Bridges of Boats, which he had caused to be made above and below the River: he was seiz'd on part of the Suburbs, which was on the other side of the River, which the Inhabitants had forsaken, seeing well they could not defend it, and was lodg'd on a Hill amongst the ruines of an old Castle there demolish'd, and which commanded not only over the Suburbs, but over a Bridge of Stone which led from thence to the City, the Entrance into which is fortifi'd with strong and great Towers, which the Sueves batter'd with their Engines, and which the Franks defended with infinite valour, and a resolution to break the Bridge, when they could no longer maintain it.

Though the King of the Sueves had assaulted the City, with an inexpressible care and conduct, yet he had made little progress; for besides the experience which Basogastus had in the mystery of War, he had so great a number of men for its defence, that he feared rather to be famish'd than forc'd: but when he understood by Harald, who favour'd by a Salley made by the besieg'd, found the means to get into the City, that the King march'd to his relief, he ceased to fear his Enemies, and prepar'd himself to favour his approach, when opportunity should present. So soon as the King of the Sueves was departed, Prince Viridomar understanding that the Princess Polixena was in the City, had offer'd her liberty to depart, and a convoy to conduct her in security to any place she would retire to: but though he had often solicited her, with all that civility due to her, that fair Princess, born with a courage worthy her Illustrious House, and incens'd with a particular displeasure against those Enemies who destroy'd her Country, and brought into it a War with so much injustice, disdain'd his offers, and return'd for answer, that she was content to perish in the ruines of the City, if it should be reduc'd to that, rather than see her self oblig'd for her safety, to the irreconcilable Enemies of the King her Father. Her generous resolution inspir'd the like into the Princesses and Ladies of Quality, who were with her; and Basogastus himself seem'd more strongly encourag'd to her particular defence, than to that of the City.

Viridomar testifi'd some displeasure at this constancy of the Princesses; nor was it known whether for this consideration he less press'd the besieg'd, than they had been by the King his Father: It seem'd likewise to his Followers, that he continued this siege with some reluctance, or at least, that his vigour and natural fierceness were obscur'd by a sadness and melancholy, which they had for some time observ'd in him, without being able to imagine the cause. But both the one and the other seem'd powerfully revived in him, when he understood that Pharamond was entred into Franconia; and that that Pharamond, murderer of Vindimir, and lover of Rosamond; that Pharamond, whose glory he had envi'd with a generous emulation, and him whose person he fought, and not his Kingdom, march'd towards him to fight him; the news rekindl'd a martial ardour in his bosom, and return'd into his eyes their accusom'd splendour: he weigh'd not at all what resolution he was to take; and as it was Pharamond, and not his people, against whom he would carry the War, he no sooner understood his return, but he dispos'd himself to march directly towards him, and gave, that very moment, Orders to his Army to prepare to depart the next Morning.

Yet he would not wholly raise his siege, fearing to displease the King his Father, who had absolutely defend'd it; but believing with an Army of sixty thousand men he could overcome Pharamond, the number of whose Forces he had good intelligence of, left still thirty thousand at the Leaguer of Peapolis. It was perhaps the great desire he had to dispute with so famous a Competitor both in love and glory, which made him march so readily against him: however, he told his Captains, and the reason which oblig'd him to go with such hast to fight him, was because he understood that his Army was every day increased by the people of the Country, which flock'd in to him from all parts; that he fear'd if he should give him time, he would make himself so powerful, that he should not be able to maintain the Field against him but upon great disadvantages. There was not only probability and reason, but truth in what he said; for it is certain, that after our entrance into Franconia, our Army was strengthn'd by more than ten thousand men, and that before we approach'd them, there wanted but little to make it as numerous as the Sueves.

Pharamond, who had his Scouts in all parts, no sooner understood the march of Viridomar, and the division he had made of his Troops, but he thank'd the gods for this opportunity to encounter him with hopes of Victory: and having embattel'd his Troops in an admirable order, he march'd towards him with a joy which we had not for a long time mark'd on his visage: yet he would not tire either his Men or Horses by too long Journies: but as he desir'd Victory in this War more than he had done in all other, and well knew that the Loss of one Battle could not but be of a terrible consequence, he resolv'd to neglect nothing which might give him any advantage over the most valiant enemy he had ever to deal with. All our Commanders, and all our Soldiers, who besides the love they had for their Prince, were firmly perswaded that they could not be overcome whilst he fought in the head of them, followed him with an infinite courage and confidence. In the end, after some few days march, which was so much the shorter, because each of the two Armies went half the way, they fac'd each other in a great Plain between the City of Devona and the River Sala, a little above the place where it disburdens it self into the Mein.

The Sun was scarce four hours high when we discern'd the Army of the Sueves: and because that it was at that season of the year when the days are longest, and that the King judg'd well that there was little appearance but that the fight would begin that day; he caus'd his Troops to stop, and his Soldiers repose themselves, whilst he employed his time in preparing things necessary for so important a Battel. He would himself as he was always accusom'd, not only view all the Plain, to observe what Posts might be advantageous to him, but also take notice of the countenance of the enemies, and the order of their Battel: and Fortune would, that as the Prince of the Sueves did the same on his side, they saw each other twice or thrice, and the last time so near, that they had without doubt come to blows, if they had not been separated by a large and deep Ditch caused by some springs of water, and which was above three thousand paces in length.

The two Princes by several marks knew each other, and kept for some time along the Banks of the Ditch, one beholding t'other with a menacing aspect: but as they were both generous and modest, they threaten'd only with their eyes, without breaking into words: and maugre the interest which incens'd them, they had conceived mutually an esteem which permitted them not to behold each other without a respect: however, their anger might easily be observ'd in their visages under their half lifted up Visers; and if they had not remembred that they had two great Armies that day to fight, they had soon by the end of the Ditch fought a way to joyn, and determine by a more single Combat their particular quarrel.

I doubt not but Pharamond appear'd such to the eyes of Viridomar, as he hath ever appear'd to all other men; but I confess that Viridomar, by what I could discern, seem'd such a one to me as nothing but my Master could equalize. That little I could discover of his countenance charm'd me, and I had certainly been more taken with his person, his carriage on Horse-back, and all his actions which were admirable, had I not been still present with the King my Master. His Arms were no less fair or rich than those of my Prince; his Helmet was covered with a Plume so white that it exceeded the Snow, and which by the agitation of the wind wav'd upon his Shoulders; and on his Shield, with which his left Arm was charg'd, were seen three Lions sable in a Field Argent, the famous Badge of his Illustrious House: the desire they had soon to see each other nearer, made them willingly depart from each other, to range their Troops, and prepare for Battel.

Both the Men and the Horses having taken both repose and repast during the survey of the King, at his return the Illustrious Priam and the valiant Charamont rang'd them in that order which they were to observe in that days conflict. Pharamond plac'd himself in the head of his right Wing, Priam commanded the left; Ibere the Cavalry on the right, and Meroveus the left; and Charamont brought up a Reserve of two thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot men: before the Army march'd, the King rode through all the Ranks, and shewing himself in the body of the Army with his face uncovered, encourag'd both his Commanders and Soldiers to the Fight, and by a discourse full of eloquence, and with an aspect which seem'd that day enlivened with something extraordinary, represent'd unto them not only of what importance it was for their glory, to preserve that reputation they had acquir'd in so many Battels, wherein Victory had still accompanied them, but the necessity which oblig'd them that day to fight for the safety of their Country, which depended on the event of that Combat: and the Soldiers by their cries on all sides seem'd to encourage and quicken each other with an heat equal to his own.

Finding them thus heartned, without further delay he led them to the Combat: observing at the same time his enemies to advance with a resolution equal to ours; and when the Armies were separated but by a very little distance, he gave the last orders, and caus'd the signal to be given. 'Twas now that in the middle might be seen Piles march against Piles; and the Cavalry in the Wings having levelled their Lances, part at the same time, and encounter with an undaunted fury. The Rivers of the Meine, and those of Sala re-echoed echoed this terrible encounter; the Heavens were darkened with the Splinters of the Lances, and the earth covered with blood, and the bodies of men dead and dying. The Infantry despising the distant sight of Arrows, to come to handy blows, began a fight much more bloody; and soon after, finding their Pikes too troublesome, letting them fall at their feet, made use only of their Swords, with which, my Lord, you know better than my self the great massacre ordinarily made in Battels.

Fortune so order'd that Viridomar that day, as well as Pharamond, fought in the head of the right Wing of the Army; and so he found himself oppos'd by Priam who commanded the left Wing of ours, as Pharamond was by Almeric, a valiant Captain, who commanded the Suevish left Wing: so that by this array the two Captains had not that satisfaction which they possibly equally desired, to begin the Combat of the two Armies: with that of their persons; but if it proved safe to the one and the other, it was no less cruel to those two Wings which Priam and Almeric commanded: for those two Commanders, though valiant, could not resist the Puissance of the two Enemies which oppos'd them, which like two violent Torrents, ravaged and threw to the ground all that oppos'd their passage. The generous Priam, Illustrious for a thousand fair exploits in War, yielded to the prowess of a young man, and was thrown down by the Lance of Viridomar: But Almeric, yet more unhappy, was run through by that of Pharamond, and fell without life under his Horses feet.

The fall of the two Captains wrought no small terrour and fear in those bodies that obeyed them: and if on the one side Pharamond overwhelm'd all that stood before him, and by his example made his followers fight with so much vigour, that they soon broke the Wing that oppos'd them, and in the end, put it to an entire rout; on the other side, Viridomar led his to the Combat with so much valour and good conduct, that all the resistance of the Franks was in vain, and they in the end broken, by the great force of the Prince of the Sueves. The generous Merouée, who commanded the Cavalry of this Wing, sustain'd it a long time with an extraordinary valour; and engaging in person with Viridomar, yielded not unto him, till after a long and doubtful combat; but in the end, he found his strength inferior to that of the Suevish Prince, when covered with wounds, and scarce able to support himself in his Saddle, he was succour'd by his friends, at a time when he was ready to abandon the Victory, and perhaps his life to the strongest.

The affairs were in this estate, on the two sides of the Battel, and the two Captains were on each side pursuing the Victory they had gain'd, and ignorant of the destiny of the other, when Pharamond, whom though the heat of the fight had a little transported, yet had not made him forget that he had the same interest in the other Wing, as in that which fought under his conduct; having made his enemies turn their backs, and pursued them without any resistance, rode to a little Hill, which he saw near him, from whence he might plainly discern what passed over a good part of the Plain: No sooner was he mounted on it, but he perceived the misfortune of his, and beheld his left Wing defeated, and retiring in disorder before the Sueves. This sight enflam'd him with anger, and commanding Ibere to pursue them that fled with a part of the Troops, and to hinder them from rallying or joyning with the others, he with the rest turn'd head, and flew to the relief of his left Wing with infinite diligence, having commanded Charamont to lead up the reserve to battle.

Almost at the same time, Viridomar having had advice of the misfortune of Almeric, and the defeat of the Wing he commanded, had turn'd head with an intention like to that of our King: and the two conquering Princes, with their victorious Troops, saw each other coming with a design alike, and the same resolution. Viridomar, who march'd before the Sueves, knew Pharamond at the head of the Franks; and as it was his person which he particularly sought after, spurred on by apprehensions both of glory and revenge, he had no sooner taken notice of him, but with a strong Lance, he ran against him, after he had defied him with a loud cry. Pharamond not disdainng such an enemy, according to his example took a Lance, and covering himself with his Shield, parted at the same time with a swiftness and fury which nothing could equalize: the Sun in all its dayly surveys of the world, never beheld so terrible an encounter, which made these two the valiantest men in the world prove something to them extraordinary. My Master could not be shaken in the Saddle by the Lance of Viridomar; but as the blow was too great to pass without a great effect, the Horse-girts were broken, and the King constrain'd to fall behind the Horse-crupper, with the Saddle between his Legs. Viridomar receiv'd the blow of Pharamond on his Shield, and held him so firm in his Saddle, that he could not be mov'd; but his Horse not able to support the puiffance of fo great a froke, tumbled with his Matter a great diftance off, rouling upon the ground, as if they had fallen from the ruines of fome high Tower. Pharamond blufhed with fhame and anger, for an accident which had never before befel them; but being on his feet, in an instant; and cafting himfelf lightly upon a fair Horse, which I had the honour to prefent him. Viridomar was taken up by his own men, but with more difficulty; and before he was again mounted, Pharamond had many times call'd him, and made more than one of his own feel the effects of that anger his fall had caus'd. No fooner was the Suevifh Prince remounted but with his Sword in his hand he returned to feek Pharamond; and overturning all that endeavour'd to hinder his joyning with him; Let us finish (cried he with a clear and thundring voice) what we have begun; and fince thou art the lover of Rofamond, and I the Brother of Vindimir, let us end a quarrel, which is only Pharamond's and Viridomar's, and not the Sueves and Franks.

Pharamond, who difdain'd to fhun the combat, and whose fall had incens'd him, ran at thefe words to Viridomar, with a refolution no whit inferiour to his; and both the one and the other, with their Swords in their hands, endeavour'd to clear the paffage to each other: but as the Sueves caft themfelves before Viridomar, we did the like to Pharamond; both equally endeavouring to prevent thofe sad confequences which might follow upon the combat of thofe two Princes. They foamed with anger, and feem'd to dart fire through the lights of their Helmets: but do whatfoever they could, it prov'd impoffible for them to get together again; and they were confin'd, having threatn'd each other with their voice and with their hands, to carry thofe effects of their anger to a general victory, which they could not employ in a particular combat: nor did either the one or the other forget any thing which might conduce to the gaining it by their party, however in the end neither had that fatisfaction they defired, though it feem'd to incline more to our fide than the Sueves, and that we might well have hoped it, if the day would have lent its light for victory to declare it felf entirely: for when night made the combat ceafe, there were few places in the field where the Sueves yielded not place to the Franks: the number of the dead on their party exceeded ours; and if they retired in good order, and without any appearance of a rout, we had the advantage to keep the Field all night. We loft twenty thoufand men, and the enemies five or fix and twenty thoufand: and if Prince Priam, Merouée, and many other remarkable perfons among us, were wounded; Almeric, who commanded next after Viridomar in the Suevifh Army, and many other confiderable perfons of their party, loft their lives.

But though other perfons might poffibly have found fatisfaction in thefe marks of our advantages, Pharamond, who was never accustom'd to conquer by halves, had no fatisfaction in the event of the combat, but feem'd as much afflicted, or rather as much incens'd, as if he had loft the Battel: he therefore resolv'd at the return of day, to renew the fight, and prepared all things in fuch order and diligence as was to be admitt'd; but fcarce had the Sun faluted Aurora, when he was advertis'd that Viridomar was parted fome hours before, and retir'd with his whole Army towards Peapolis; yet not like a man that fled, but like one called by other affairs, marching ftill in battel-array, and in condition to fight. Pharamond, knowing well that it was not fear that made him take this refolution, judg'd that he either went to joyn with fome reinforcement from the King of the Sueves, or to attend him at Peapolis, and give him Battel with his whole Forces; having been deceiv'd in his hopes to carry it with thofe that followed him.

This belief oblig'd the King to march after him to fight him before he joyn'd with the reft of the Army; and already had he given orders to his Horse to mount, when he received a Message from the Prince Sumnon, by which he affur'd him, that in three days he would be with him with twenty thoufand men. This news made him change his refolution: for not doubting but with this affiftance, and thofe Troops which Bafogastus had in the City, that he fhould be able to fight the entire Forces of the Sueves, he took another in the Field; and having commanded his Officers to give that day to the refofe of the Soldiers, and to the interr'g of the dead, as well Sueves as Franks, he returned the meffenger to the Prince Sumnon, commanding him to march directly towards Peapolis, and to govern his march in fuch fort, that he fhould come to the place assign'd on the precise day and hour appointed; giving him more time than neceffary, that he might the more eafily do it without wearying his Soldiers: and at the fame time he fent to Bafogastus a valiant perfon, who promis'd him to perfish or get into the City, by whom he gave him advice of the day and hour he would affault the Suevifh Camp, and giving him order to fally out with his Troops fo foon as he fhould hear the alarm in their Camp.

By this means, he doubted not but he might carry the victory, how valiant soever he knew Prince Viridomar; and having employed that day in preparing all things necessary, and exhorted the Franks on all sides to fortifie themselves with a noble resolution to deliver their Country from the oppression of their enemies, he departed on the morrow, and marched towards Peapolis by little journies, but in the best order in the world, keeping himself still in a fighting posture, in case the enemy should make head against him: we might in all probability have been annoyed in this march, following an Army, who, to furnish us, ruined and burnt all in our way: but by the excellent orders of the King, and the affection which his people had for him, bringing us provisions from places far distant, we suffer'd no want, but had the means in five days to come, within view of Peapolis, where we might have arrived in three, if the Prince would not have spared the travel both of men and Horses, to keep them in better condition to fight, and likewise to give time to Prince Sunnon and Genebaud, of whose advance he had every day advice, to shew themselves at the precise hour, at the appointed place.

The Sun was just laid down in Thetis her lap, when we arriv'd within two hours march of the City; and because the King had resolv'd to assault the enemies at the dawn of the following day, he had caus'd his Troops to take some refreshment, that they might the better march in the night, to their appointed Quarters: and before darkness again forsook the world, we drew near the enemies Camp, and ranged our selves in order to fight: But Prince Viridomar, not being less expert in the mystery of war, than the most experienced Captains, having foreseen a part of our design, had not separated his Forces; but whilst those which he had left at the Siege, kept their first posts, though in a readiness to sally when necessity should call them; those which we had before fought with, were rang'd in battel array at the foot of a little Hill, on which, as I told you, the Prince of the Sueves was lodg'd, and from which he had equally the sight of the City and his own Camp.

From this place, which extends its prospect over all the neighbouring Plain, he saw at the break of the day, the King of the Franks assault the Army at the foot of the Hill: Sunnon and Genebaud with an infinite fury and resolution, charging those who were lodg'd between the Hill and the River; and the valiant Basogastus making a no less furious salley upon those who besieged the City towards the land side. By this vigorous proceeding, he knew with what a personage he made war, and blam'd perhaps for some time, the hasty choler of the King his Father, which had engag'd him in it. However, as he had a courage which nothing could daunt, he in a moment took his resolutions; and judging that the Troops which were on the other side of the River, and the City, and which Basogastus attacked, were more than necessary to sustain his assault, and that those which were between the Cavalry and the River, were too feeble to resist Sunnon: he sent speedy order to him who commanded on the other side the River, to cause a part of his Troops to pass over the Bridge of Boats, to the assistance of those which Sunnon and Genebaud assaulted, and to defend himself against Basogastus with the rest: and having given orders to him whom of all the Sueves he had most confidence in, to command against Sunnon, himself descended the Hill, and came to the head of his Army to oppose Pharamond.

The King my Master remembring that at the preceding Battel, Viridomar had fought on his right Wing, resolv'd, that he might become his opposite that day, to fight on the left Wing: and Viridomar, who had made the same observation, and who desir'd nothing with so much zeal as to fight with Pharamond, had with him chang'd his place, and put himself in the head of his left Wing, that he might charge the right Wing of Pharamond: this equal desire both of the one and the other, was that which hindred the effect of their design; and as instead of Viridomar; Pharamond encountred Haldan, a Prince of the Royal blood of Suevia; Viridomar found the Prince Ibere, to whom in the absence of Friam, the King had given the right Wing to command, and who by a vigour which youth rendred more strong in him, than in his Father advanced in years, sustained the great Forces of Viridomar with infinite courage: not that his strength was not found somewhat inferiour to that of Viridomar; but as he was truly one of the most valiant men in the world, he did all that could be done against so terrible an enemy, and by his great prowess, hindred a part of that disorder Viridomar had brought into the body, had it been commanded by a less valiant person.

For Pharamond, he found less resistance, though truly he found sufficient both from the Chief and Soldiers: but in the end, he overthrew all that stood before him, and open'd a fair way for victory. The Princes Sunnon and Genebaud, on their side acted all that could be expected from their valour: but the Troops which they commanded were much different different from those which had followed Pharamond in so many famous encounters; and though at first they lay hard upon the Sueves, which were between the City and the Hill, those which were sent to their assistance from the other side had stopt them, and disputed with them the victory: however, they gave to Sunnon the advantage he desired, which was to amuse a part of the enemy, whilst Pharamond combated the rest, Basogastus busied at the same time those whom he had before him, the Combat passing between them with much equality,

In sum, my Lord, for I shall grow tedious to you in recounting the particulars of several battels, to you, I say my Lord, who have gain'd such important ones, and who being so great a Master in the art of War, can with no great pleasure heark'n to that mean discourse I make you: In sum, I say, after a long and resolute Combat, by which the earth was seen covered with blood, and the streams of the Mein dy'd with the same colour; Pharamond conquer'd intirely on his side, and Viridomar, Maugre the valour of Ibere, having gained some advantage on his, the Conquerors and the strongest came to the assistance of the vanquish'd and most feeble, as they had done in the first battel; and the two valiant Princes again saw and ran at each other, with their swords in their hands, with a fury not to be expressed: but they could not continue their Combat, by reason that the Franks and the Sueves equally hindred them, which constrain'd them to turn all their thoughts on a general Victory.

The force of Viridomar was too prodigious for us to dispute; but in the end, he perceiv'd that he disputed it with us in vain: and knowing that he could no longer maintain his Army, who weakned by the number of the dead deserted him, and ran away in disorder on all sides, he caus'd the retreat to be sounded; and leading with an infinite diligence the strongest to the help of the others, and opposing them to the fury of the Franks, he made his Troops retire towards the Hill; but still fighting with an order which Pharamond admir'd; and with the freshest men, still favouring the retreat of the wearied, which the roughness in many places, and the number of the Ditches made more easie than it would otherwise have been, he esteem'd Viridomar's wisdom in the retreat, no less than he had done his valour in the fight: but having for some time observed him, he called those Troops which were most necessary for his design, and by his words and actions animating others to the Combat, he resolv'd to pursue his enemies, and gain if possible an entire victory: when the Sueves from the top of the Hill, made the Heavens eccho with their cries of joy: and soon after, Pharamond was advertis'd that there were seen appear a body of twenty thousand men, which the King of the Sueves had sent to the assistance of his Son.

The King stopt at this news, and after having a small time deliberated what resolution to take, he judg'd it not convenient to engage farther his men, wearied with long travel, or oppose them to the fury of fresh men, who might charge them at such advantages, and rob them of that Victory they had yet gain'd. For these reasons he likewise caus'd the retreat to be sounded, and sending orders to Prince Sunnon; to draw towards him, he retir'd his men from fight, and went and encamp'd some furlongs from thence, on the banks of the River, after he had lodg'd some men on a little Hill, between the Camp of the Sueves and his. Twelve thousand of ours were this day slain, but the enemy lost no less than they had done in the former battle; yet by the assistance which was arriv'd, they yet found themselves stronger in number than we, but not in a condition to continue a siege before an Army like ours.

The King employ'd the rest of that day, and the beginning of the following, to draw some Trees from that Hill where he had lodg'd his men, to our Camp, and from the foot of that Hill to the River; and prepar'd for the design he had again to present battel to the enemy; and if he refus'd it, to assault him on all sides, and endeavour to chase him from the advantageous posts he possess'd; at what time was sent to him a Trumpeter from the Prince of the Sueves, accompanied with one of his Squires.

After the usual formalities at the entrance of the Camp, they desir'd to speak with the King: and the chief Officers of the Guard, having advertis'd the King, brought them before him by his order; he received them with his ordinary affability, and the Esquire of Viridomar, telling him that he had a letter from his Master, the King reach'd forth his hand, and having open'd it, read these words.

Viridomar

*Viridomar Prince of the Sueves, to Pharamond
King of the Franks.*

Though we are not at all weaken'd by those advantages, which thy fortune or thy valour may have given thee over us, and that we can yet continue the War with our first hopes: yet I confess that the blood of so many thousand men, which we sacrifice to our particular quarrel, moves me to compassion. And therefore if thou beest valiant, as renown publishes thee, and as I have known thee, thou wilt not refuse to end our differences, by the combat of our two persons. Thou owest this satisfaction to the Brother of Vindimir, and thou oughtest to desire it as the love of Rosamond; and as I confess that I should win infinite glory in prevailing against thee, so I dare affirm thou wilt lose nothing of thine, by fighting with me. The Place, the Day, and the Arms shall be at thy choice: for besides that the Laws of Combat give them thee, I owe this respect to a King, especially to a King less considerable for his Crown than Virtue.

The Princes Sunnon, Ibere, Genebaud, Charamont, Gajaldus, and many others the considerable of the Army, were present, when the King receiv'd and read this Letter: no sooner had they heard it, but they began to murmur, and aloud adventured to tell the King, that it was not for a great King like himself, to commit himself to a particular combat: that these examples were of too great consequence among Kings: that Viridomar, who neither was one, nor had been offended by Pharamond, but by his Arms, and in a legitimate defence, had no reason to demand the Combat; and that he could not accept it without being blam'd by all the earth, not only for the interest of his Dignity, but for having expos'd to a hazard, with which he might well dispense, that glory he had purchas'd by so many famous victories. Prince Sunnon boyling with choler, demanded his place, telling him that his birth was equal to that of Viridomar, and that neither the one nor the other were responsible for their lives to their people, since neither of them wore a Crown. Ibere and Genebaud said after him, that being born of Royal-blood, they might aspire to the same honour, against a man who was no King; and Genebaud particularly alledg'd, that if Viridomar demanded reason of the King for the death of Vindimir, he ought to do the same of him, for the wounds he had given his Father Prince Priam in the Battel.

Pharamond hearkned to them with his natural patience and modesty; but in the end, he represented unto them, that if Viridomar was not a King, yet he would be so after the death of his Father; that since he was not inferiour to him, neither in Birth, Valour, nor fair Reputation, he by combating him could neither wrong the Royal Dignity, nor the Glory he had acquir'd: and afterwards turning himself towards the Squire of Viridomar; You will excuse (said he) the affection of my friends, who cannot without some grief see the danger I expose my self to, in fighting with your Prince. It is only their fear for me, that makes them speak, and not any default either in his degree or reputation: but because the danger ought not to be more considerable, than the honour I have to gain against so valiant a man, and that possibly my apprehensions of injury are no less great, nor less just than his, I accept with infinite joy the occasion he offers me, to spare the blood of our people.

After these words, which stopt the mouths of all those about him, having understood from the Esquire, that he had charge from his Master to agree all things with him; they agreed that the Combat should be fought the third day following, in a place assign'd between the two Camps, which should be guarded by an equal number of Soldiers of one and the other party; that they should name Judges of the Field, and be arm'd with the customary Arms of Cavaliers. They agreed moreover that during the three days there should be a Truce, during which the dead should be interr'd, and those persons who were in the City, be secur'd to come and visit their friends in the Camp.

The King added this last cause, out of the desire he had to see the Princess Polixena his Sister, whom he dearly lov'd, and whose sight he had many years been banished from. Those that were about him would likewise have had it concluded, that since the Combat was to be fought to spare Blood, if Viridomar should be vanquish'd, his Army should retire without delay out of the limits of Francia: but the Esquire having represented on the part of the Prince his Master, that whatever intention he might have to perform their desires, he could not be assured of those of the King his Father, and much less if he should should lose his life in the Combat; that Article was pass'd over, and liberty remain'd to each to finish or continue the War, whatever were the success. This made us again murmur; but we were constrained to render our selves obedient to the Kings pleasure, whose eyes were blind to the injustice of this condition, through the desire he had to fight with a man to whom the possession of Rosamond was destin'd. The King having sign'd the Agreement, sent one of his Esquires with Viridomar's, to see the same performed by the Prince of the Sueves: but before his departure, he return'd Answer to his challenge in these terms:

Pharamond King of the Franks, to Viridomar Prince of the Sueves.

BOTH as from the Brother of Vindimir, and as from the Lover of Rosamond, I accept the Combat thou presentest me, and am well content that the reason thou hast to make War against me both in the one and the other quality, should be decided by our Arms. As the first hinders thee from being my friend, the last permits me not to love thee. I was before sufficiently unhappy by the hatred of Rosamond, nor is it necessary that the fortune of Viridomar should render me more miserable. I will therefore dispute thine with thee, though I cannot hope it; and shall do it so much more willingly, whilst I shall believe I dispute not only with the most happy, but most valiant of all my Rivals.

This was the Answer which my Prince returned to Viridomar, and in an hour afterwards, the agreement being sign'd by the Prince of the Sueves, the three days Truce was proclaimed in both Camps, and in the City, and both parties began to make use of the liberty it gave. By this assurance Basogastus came forth of the City, with the most considerable among those that had serv'd the King under his command, who came to visit him in his Tent. He receiv'd him not like a subject affectionate to his service; nor like a Governour, who in his youth had educated him with so much diligence; but like a real Father, with all these marks of tenderness and affection which a son could testify. Basogastus seeing in his person such fair and happy effects of his care, could not sufficiently thank the Gods, or applaud his own good fortune; and as he was considerable to all for his Merit, every one took part in the inexpressible joy which he testified.

The King had dedicated a longer time to the welcome which he thought due to him, if he had not been forc'd to retire at the arrival of the Princess Polixena, his sister, who with the Princess Theodora, wife of Priam, and many other Ladies which follow'd in several Chariots, alighted at the Tent of the King, whose impatience to see her had made him send for her. The whole Army ran with ardency, and the whole Army remain'd astonish'd at the sight of her admirable beauty. For my part, having the Idea of the beauties of Rosamond in my remembrance, I was of no easie belief that any other could astonish me; but I confess that at this last sight of Polixena, I lost that opinion: for I found her beauty so prodigiously augmented since our last departure from Peapolis, that I could with difficulty imagine it at all inferiour to that of Rosamond.

Having said hitherto nothing of this Princess, give me leave now, my Lord, to speak a little; and because it is not just you should longer be ignorant of the accomplishments of the Sister of my King, I will tell you, that with the fairest and most lively complexion that Nature did ever form, she has two black eyes, and her locks of no less sable hue. The colour of her hair, with the more than snowy whiteness of her complexion, produce an admirable effect of wonder; but her eyes create another far superiour: besides that they are well adorn'd, and of the most exact form in the world, they cast a lustre not easily supported, and a fire replete with a spirit more than natural: Yet they want no sweetness when she is pleas'd to be complaisant; and at those times that sweetness is the most charming in the world: but ordinarily a fierceness predominates over all her other qualities, but such a fierceness which much differing from any thing of rude or proud, there is nothing but it attracts, touches, and insensibly engages, though this effect be not ordinary, but to sweetness and complacency: nothing is so fair and beautiful as the form and colour of her lips, nothing more white than her teeth. Her visage is oval, but little, as her stature and person is indeed delicate, though noble and free, and her breasts and her hands more fair, if possible, than all the rest of her person. In short, it may be said that the Graces have compos'd every part of her, and all her actions; and though there be nothing nothing of affected, neither in her countenance, nor in her discourse, she seems together civilised with an air so great, so noble, and so extraordinary, that into whatsoever estate Fortune can throw her, there may yet be discern'd the marks of that Grandeur which predominates in all her person; for her spirit is much above all that I can make you comprehend, and adorn'd with that noble vivacity which gives an admirable grace both to her discourse and to her actions: she hath a solidity in her judgment comparable to that of persons of a far greater age, both of the knowledge she hath of the world, and for a resolution not ordinarily found in those of her age nor sex. I will tell you nothing of her excellent virtue, of her wisdom, of the regular strictness of her manners; all that I can say will be below the truth, and it may be judged better by the conduct of her life, than it can by my discourse. She hath been accused often to want a loving tenderness and compassion, and my self have heard the King and the Princes her brothers laughing tax her of this default; but for my part, I believe that like other persons she might be capable of it, and that she might have a soul tender and passionate, if she had not always judged that such passions were vicious so soon as she perceiv'd them, or had not studied to resist them by a severe virtue.

You may well judge, my Lord, that a Princess a thousand times more amiable than I could represent her by my discourse, was receiv'd by a brother who dearly loved her, and who had not for many years seen her, with the greatest marks of affection; and it is most certain, that all that which a friendship of this nature could produce of tenderness and softness, appear'd at this time. The King embrac'd her a thousand times, and a thousand times testified his joy to see her arriv'd at that perfection of merit and beauty: And the Princess with an admirable grace, and a discourse full of Charms, let him know the share she took in that great glory, which by his admirable actions he had acquir'd amongst men; but the modesty both of the one and the other, soon made them leave off this subject; and from it they fell into an entertainment full of sweetness, and more particular to themselves, in which they spent a great part of the day.

The Princess Theodomira had visited the generous Priam her Husband, whose wounds, no more than those of Prince Meroveus, had not hindred them from appearing at the Camp in their Chariots, and who were now in bed in their Tents, with an entire hope of recovery. The King would not that the Princess his Sister, nor Theodomira, or those which had accompani'd her, should return to the City with Basogastus, of whose going thither, there was a necessity: and as Theodomira was well content to stay with her husband, to serve him in that condition wherein he was, the King desir'd the Princess to stay with him, at least the three days of the Truce; causing her to be magnificently lodged in his Tents which were the fairest, and most commodious in the world.

It was there that in a more particular discourse, he learn'd from her in what manner she had spent her time since their separation, and (by an apprehension which makes those that are violently tormented with any passion find some consolation, by discovering to any persons that interest themselves) he related to her the sad discourse of all that had befall him in his unfortunate loves, and made her understand the present deplorable condition of his life. The Princess often shed tears at this recital; but in the end, she stopt that source, not to augment the affliction of a Prince, who was already plung'd into an Abyss, and endeavour'd to make him hope not only that it was not impossible that the mind of Rosamond might change, but that (by what might be judg'd by the recital he had made of her discourse, and all her behaviour) her inclinations were strangers to those appearances of hatred she was oblig'd to testify to him.

The King, though little sensible of this hope, yet receiv'd it more kindly from the mouth of his sister, than he should have done from any other person. But if she were afflicted with the knowledge she had of his sad adventures, she could receive no comfort for the trouble she felt, nor assure her self from the fear that possess'd her, when she bethought her self that he was to fight against the Prince of the Sueves. The Renown spread abroad of his valour, and that which the King himself had proved in two encounters, fill'd her soul with terror, and made her shower down tears, notwithstanding the entreaties of the King, who reassur'd her the best he could possible, by telling her from how many dangers, which he had judg'd no less than this, his good fortune had retriev'd him. He told her likewise that to divertise her with a sight not ordinary to her, and to incense him to the Victory by a presence so dear to him, he resolv'd that she should behold the Combat together with Theodomira, and the other Ladies which had follow'd her, for whom he would cause a Scaffold to be erected in the Field; and though the Princess testifi'd great reluctancy, assuring him that she could not see him in that danger without betraying too great marks of fear, yet he importun'd her in such manner, and abated her fear with so great hopes, that in the end she resolv'd to obey him.

The first and second day of the Truce pass'd in this manner; and that I may not retain you in too tedious a recital, the day appointed for the Combat no sooner appear'd, but all things were prepar'd. At an equal distance between the two Camps, they had encompass'd with Barriers a great space of ground, in which the two Princes were to fight: that part which view'd the Camp of the Sueves, and by which their Prince was to enter, was guarded by two thousand Sueves, chosen amongst the most considerable of their Army; and that which was on our side, by a like number of Franks, as had been agreed. The rest of the two Armies were to keep within their Camps, where their Officers had orders to detain them. On one of the other sides was erected a Scaffold for the Judges of the Field; and opposite to that, the King had caus'd another to be rais'd for the Princess, and the Ladies of her Train; having however sent to know of the Prince of the Sueves, if he would consent that the Princess Polixena his Sister, and some Ladies that were come with her to visit him, should be spectators of the Combat. The Scaffold for the Princess was covered with magnificent Tapistry, and had on the top stretched out very high a Pavilion of a light stuff but rich and shining with interwoven gold: and because all before it was open, there was to be seen below the seat appointed for the Ladies, and in the middle above all, that for the Princess, with a covering of gold which made it remarkable.

So soon as the hour appointed for this terrible Combat, which made so many thousands of persons to tremble, was come, that the Guards of the Field were rang'd, and that the Judges, who were Basogastus for the King, and Haldan for Viridomar, had taken their places in their Scaffolds; the Princess, and the Ladies of her Train were conducted to theirs by Ibere, Geneband, and many other considerable persons: and Polixena having taken her place (and made Theodomira and the other Ladies sit down in those ordain'd for them) drew all the eyes of those who were so near as to observe her; though it might be said that her beauty had lost some part of its lustre, by the effect of a fear which made her look more pale than ordinary, and seem'd to take from her eyes a part of that vigour which they had at other times. Her habit had been extreme careless, if she might have followed her own humour; the sadness which accompanied that fight, not only having made her forget, but refuse all ornaments, if the King, whose thoughts were contrary to hers, and who would not that at this time there should appear any thing of sadness in his party, had not importun'd her to do otherwise, and add the lustre of Gold and Jewels, to that of her excellent Beauty.

She had not been long plac'd, but that on both sides the Plain and the River might be heard to echo back the found of a hundred Trumpets; and at this noise, as terrible at this, as it had been pleasing and agreeable at other times, were seen to wax pale hundreds of visages, and hundreds of valiant men tremble, whose own peril could never have made them fear. A little after, and as it were both at the same time, the Champions presented themselves at the entrance into the Barriers, accompanied with two flourishing Troops of their own party, whose number was equal, as it had been agreed.

Though the soul of my Prince was abandon'd entirely to grief since his last misfortune, yet he would not now demonstrate it, nor give by the knowledge of it any cause of joy to his enemy; and therefore instead of denoting his sadness by his Arms, as he had for some time before done, not doubting but Viridomar would be magnificent in his, he covered himself that day with the fairest; nor had he any thing in his whole Equipage which was not pompous and magnificent, Prince Sumnon carried his Helmet, cover'd with several Plumes, Charamont came after with his Lance, chosen among a number for so important an office; and I had the honour to carry his Shield: In which, instead of the famous Livery of his House, he had caus'd to be painted a hand coming out of a Cloud, and darting Thunderbolts on a heart which was expos'd to them, with these words in the Roman Tongue.

Less cruel than those of your Eyes.

Entering into the Barriers, he cover'd his head with his Helmet, charg'd his right hand with his Lance, and his left with his Shield, and advanced with a countenance like to that of the god of war, at the same instant that Viridomar appeared on the other side in the same posture. It was impossible to see any thing more stately than his Arms, the precious stones whereof by the lustre of the Sun, which darted its Rays from above, dazled the eyes of the Beholders; yet they shone more lively on his Helmet, than on his Curia's, behind hind which was rais'd a long Pennon laden with so many several Plumes, that his Head seem'd to bow under their weight. His Lance, though strong and weighty as it was, was cover'd with little scales and devices of gold and enamel; and on his Shield he had caus'd to be represented a Love in a languishing posture, turning his eyes from a Sun which darted its Rays through all the Hemisphere, and turning them towards another, which only appeared confusedly behind the Clouds, which conceal'd it, with these words in the Latine Tongue:

Whither my Destinies shall call me.

There were few of those persons who endeavour'd to explain the device of Viridomar, who did not believe that by the Sun which he disdain'd, he meant some beauty which he had known, and whom he had abandon'd for Rosamond, whom he had never seen nor known, but by the fame of her Renown. He was mounted on one of the fairest Horses in the world, fierce and proudly prancing; and whom he managed with so good a grace, that if I had seen him at another time, I had beheld him with pleasure and admiration.

The two formidable Warriours, having beheld each other with an eye full of incens'd anger, while the Sun was equally divided to them according to custom, after the Heralds had made their usual Proclamations, gently advanc'd to the distance of an ordinary Carriere, whence they darted at each other a countenance that struck fear into the most hardy; and when the Trumpets had given them the last signal, levelling their Lances, and letting their Horses go with a fury which nothing could equal, they encounter'd in the middle with a shock, which resembled rather that of two armed Gallies, or something more furious than that of only two men: their Lances were good and strong, but they broke into a thousand splinters, which flew towards the Sky with a violence sufficient to have struck the Stars from the Firmament; and the two valiant Knights having receiv'd the terrible blows on their Shields which refilled them, bended and shook in their Saddles through the force of two such powerful assaults: but staying themselves with all their strength, they resettled themselves equally, and spurring on their horses, whom so fierce a rencounter had almost set upon their Croupers, they finish'd their Carriere, and turning about, appeared in as good posture as if they had never encounter'd.

'Twas now that having turn'd head, they drew their terrible Swords, and were about to return to each other with a fury so much the greater, as the effect of their encounter, possibly little answerable to the hopes they had conceiv'd, had equally incens'd them; when by a prodigious effect of Fortune, Viridomar being near to the Scaffold of the Princess, though he had sufficient reason to busie himself wholly in the affair in hand, lifting up his eyes towards her, easily observ'd her on her seat, which was rais'd so much above the rest, that it was not easie for him to mistake her. At this sight he seem'd not only astonish'd, and wholly lost, but remain'd unmoveable; and planting himself before the Scaffold in the posture of a man who remembered no longer what he had to do: O gods! (said he, so high as to be understood by many persons) this is the same: and a little after, Alas! (added he) what fortune is mine?

He was in this posture when Pharamond came up to him with his Sword in his hand, and with a countenance which struck with fear all the Sueves. It had been easie for him to have struck him in a time wherein he put himself in no posture to defend himself; but as ordinarily he preserv'd in all fights his judgment entire, he observed the action and posture of Viridomar; and seeing that he neither prepared to assault him, nor defend himself, he would not make use of the advantage he gave him, but approaching him with his Sword advanc'd; How, Viridomar (said he) hast thou then forgot that thou hast an enemy before thee, an enemy whom perhaps thou hast no reason to despise?

The Prince of the Sueves seem'd to be awakened out of a profound sleep, at the words of Pharamond; and beholding him with an eye troubled with the different thoughts that turmoyl'd him; Pharamond (said he) I am not at present in a condition to fight thee; and if thou art still generous, thou wilt not refuse to delay till to morrow the end of our Combat. Pharamond was as much astonish'd at this Adventure, as he had ever been in his life; and as he certainly thought it was no fear of the event that could make Viridomar quit the Combat; so he could not divine the cause, nor imagine what judgment to make: he kept silence a while, observing his behaviour, but soon after breaking it, We should do well (said he) to finish what we have begun: for we shall be blam'd by all the world, to have broken but one Lance to dispute Rosamond; but if thou hast any wound, or any reason which hinders thee to finish our Combat, I will not refuse thee the delay thou demandest. Viridomar answered not to these words of Pharamond; but having signified by bowing his head, that he thanked him for his courtesie, spurring on his horse with a prodigious swiftness, he presently got to the Barriers. and assoon disappeared from the sight of all the Spectators.

Never possibly any event, however extraordinary, had caus'd a greater astonishment, than was that of Pharamond, and all the Spectators at so strange an Adventure: and as there was none in all that great Plain, who could attribute this action of Viridomar's to any default of courage, so there was not any, who were not highly surpris'd, and who studied not to seek the true cause. Not but that, by his carriage near the Scaffold of the Princess, and by his words, which he had spoken high enough to be understood by her self; they believed that it might be an effect of her beauty, or that they did not judge her beauty able to produce as strange ones. But he having scarce time to behold her a moment, and at a time when his thoughts were otherwise employed, they knew not what judgment to make.

However it was, Haldan and all the Sueves testified much disorder, though they possibly rejoiced to see their Prince escape for that day, out of the great danger to which he was expos'd; and without speaking one word, they returned to their Camp. The Franks were more satisfied than they, in this event, being delivered from the fear they had for their Prince, whilst he could have no part in that scandal, which his enemy had to fear: but the joy of the Princess was much greater than that of any other persons; and she had joyc'd much more, if she had not had some fear for the following day, in which this cruel Combat was to be renewed.

When all the Soldiers were retired into their Tents, this action of the Prince of the Sueves was diversly talk'd of: and while the youngest and most boyling bloods would blame it, and draw consequences injurious to Viridomar; the King breaking silence; Let not the bravest among you (said he) judge ill of the courage of Viridomar, his valour is above all the descants you can make; and you ought to believe as I believe, that it was by some just and powerful argument that he was induc'd to quit the Combat. He added to these many other words, by which he made them know, that it was not for them to judge of the courage of one of the valiantest men in the world, against whom he had never gain'd advantage, though they had in Combat assaulted each other three several times; and of a man who might yet deprive him of his Honour, if Fortune were favourable to him.

The rest of that day was spent in this manner, and in the morning the King prepared himself to return to the Combat: the fears of the Princess returning with the light, she was in the Chamber of the King, where were the Princes and all the chief Commanders of the Army; and he already call'd for his Arms, at what time there entred the same Squire of Viridomar, who some days before had brought his Challenge: the King caus'd him to approach, judging well that he would speak with him; and the Squire having done his obeysance with the reverence he ought, presented him a Paper on the behalf of his Master, in which he found these words:

PHaramond, thou hast deprived my Brother of his life, and thy Sister hath given me my death; behold in what manner thy House triumphs over ours, and expect not the Combat from a man, who seeks no longer revenge for Vindimir, nor disputes with thee Rosamond.

In truth (said Constance to Cleomer, interrupting him) you relate me a very strange adventure; and though all those of the King of the Franks have something in them worthy admiration, yet I cannot refrain from testifying to you how much I wonder at this last: but go on, if you please; for though I should devote the whole night to your rehearsal, I cannot suffer a discontinuance.

The end of the third Book of the Second Part.

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

YOU may believe, my Lord (continued Cleomer) that the reading of that Letter from Viridomar, though it declared the cause which had made him quit the Combat, diminish'd not the astonishment they had conceiv'd at so extraordinary an accident : but that on the contrary, it gave the King, the Princess, and other persons about them, infinite matter of consideration and discourse on the Adventure. The King, having twice or thrice read it, sought for the Squire, to draw from his mouth a greater knowledge of the intentions of his Prince : but it was told him that he was departed while he read the Letter ; and being mounted on Horseback, was returned back in great haste.

The King finding himself more free by his departure, gave the Letter to the Princess his Sister to read, desiring that from her hands it should pass to those of Sumnon, Ibere, and other principal persons, who coveted to see it. At the reading of it, the countenance of Polixena was covered with a carnation dye, which render'd her yet more beautiful ; and the King beholding her with a sigh ; My Sister (said he) I am possibly not lightly oblig'd to your beauty, nor could it produce its effects in a time more favourable to me : but in truth, I must confess I find it supernatural ; for though I was surpris'd by the divine beauties of Rosamond, the first moment I saw her, it was in a time wherein I dedicated all my affection to her, had nothing to think of but her, no enemy before me able to divert or busie my entire thoughts : This would make me judge that the Prince of the Sueves had seen you before, if I had not too great reasons to confute that opinion : For in sum, you were witness with what zeal, and with what animosity he desired the Combat against me ; and you are witness how he quitted it, and ceas'd to be my enemy, so soon as he saw you, and knew me for your Brother.

The Princess answer'd not at all to this discourse of the King, either out of a modest shame which would not easily permit her, or out of anger for the presumption of a person, who durst declare so publickly, and make known to all the world he was enamour'd of her : yet after many importunities, she told the King that she had never seen Viridomar, and that she as well thought he had never seen her ; when the King again continuing ; However it be (said he) I cannot refrain from conceiving infinite joy at this adventure ; for besides the danger I was expos'd to, in combating a man, whose strength has not been hitherto found inferior to mine ; I lose him, who of all my Rivals was the most formidable, and who with a merit equal to that of Balamir, and the most accomplish'd persons in the world, had the advantage to be ordain'd by the King of the Cimbrians to the possession of Rosamond. This good effect (said the Princess, with a fresh blush) might appease a part of the choler I have against him, if the cause which produced it, had ever produced anything less pleasing to me : but as nothing is more dear to me than your satisfaction and repose, I would willingly be expos'd to the war you wage against me, to see you freed from such an enemy, and such a Rival. As there are none but our friends (reply'd Pharamond) I shall without difficulty tell you, that besides the interest I have in the change of Viridomar, I see nothing in yours which may displease you : for besides that there is nothing in the world, to which by reason of his great degree, fair reputation, and all other advantages, this Prince may not aspire ; I confess, that in the concernments we had together, I have conceived so much esteem, though I had little friendship for him, and in his carriage wholly extraordinary as it is, I find something so great and so noble, that if he hath need of me at this time, I shall no way oppose him. The King finish'd these words laughing, but in such a manner as made the company judge he had spoke his thoughts ;

and

and the Princess endeavouring to dissemble the trouble they gave her. I hope my Lord (said she to the King) that if Viridomar keeps his word with you, we shall not hear any thing spoke of him, but by the noise of his renown; and then neither shall we have any subject to complain of him, nor you occasion to be either opposite or favourable to him.

The King judg'd it not convenient to explain himself farther on this subject; nor would he press the Princess overmuch, in a matter he perceiv'd but little pleasing to her; but as the change of affairs requir'd new resolutions, the three days of truce being expir'd, and he not knowing whether the Sueves would continue the War, or retire with their Prince, he sent Gastaldus with a Trumpet to know their intention. Gastaldus went to their Camp in the ordinary form; and soon after returning, reported to the King, that Viridomar was departed from the Camp at the break of day, accompani'd only with three or four men; not as it was believed, with design to return to his father, from whom by his knowledg he could hope but a very ill treatment: That at his departure he had exhorted the Sueves to retire, and had prayed Haldun and the principal commanders of the Army, to lead them back into Suevia, hoping that the King of the Franks would grant them free passage: That he would not use a greater authority for fear to offend that of the King, who was highly jealous; but had testified to all the Captains, that he would never lose the remembrance of what they should do at his desire: That they resolv'd to obey, though they infinitely fear'd the displeasure of their King; and were ready to retire, if Pharamond would give them a free retreat.

The King, who with no small trouble beheld the miseries of his people, entertain'd with joy the Sueves resolution, and not only afforded them all sorts of assistance and favour in their retreat, but offer'd all sorts of good entertainment and noble conditions in his Court, to such as might fear the cholera of their King. He gave magnificent presents to the principal, and treated the rest like Friends and Allies, through all the Lands of Franconia; delivering our Country from the oppression of their Arms, and from a bloody War, in which by the unjust displeasure of their King, there had perish'd many thousands of men. The King enter'd into Peapolis, where he had not for a long time been seen: and Franconia breath'd under the sweetness of peace, though to all appearance it could not be of long continuance.

The Franks began now infinitely to rejoyce, at the so much desired sight of their Prince: and as by his excellent virtues, and the sweetness of his government, he had drawn the hearts of his people with a violent affection, all his subjects ran from all parts to Peapolis to see him, so that his Court was without doubt greater than that of the greatest Monarchs. There might you behold renew'd all the pleasures, and all the most flourishing divertisements, by the magnificence of the Prince, which drew from all parts all that could contribute to them. But during the repose of others, his mind was cruelly tormented; and if the heat of the War, the fence of Honour, and the jealousy he had conceiv'd against Viridomar, had apparently buried a part of those violent griefs that afflicted him: Now he had no longer those objects of glory, of duty, and of emulation, which had before buied his mind, but that his grief and his love might more easily be felt; in this appearance of repose he seem'd to tast, they began again to make War upon him with all their forces, and cast him into the most disconsolate condition imaginable. The divine beauties of Rosamond, and all that could contribute to his love, not only now return'd to his memory, but withal what was most powerful to force his love, what was most formidable to cause his fear, at the same time presented it self. The marks of her first anger for his former offences, and that of her last for the death of Theobaldus, with the cruel promise by which she was engag'd to pursue him to death, appear'd before his eyes in their most terrible shapcs, and rendred his condition more miserable than that of the most unfortunate living. He loved the Princess of the Cimbrians with the most violent love that ever heart felt, but he knew he was hated with a hatred little inferiour to the love he bore her, and with a hatred which not only made her insensible of his love, but made her arm, or cause to be arm'd all the Power imaginable against his life; yet with this knowledge he could not refrain not only from adoring her, but could no longer live without seeing her; but as he well perceiv'd that the sight of her was a happiness, he could with little appearance of reason hope for, he miserably consum'd and spent his days of all men the most deplorably.

All his friends excessively afflicted themselves; and as the cause of his evil was no longer secret, those who were the most familiar with him, the young Princes, and those to whom age gave a little more authority, as Priam, Basogastus, Charamont, and others, represented to him all things which they judg'd convenient to yield him comfort: but though

though he hearkned to their discourse with his accustom'd affability, and instead of being troubled at it, testify'd his obligations for these marks of their affection. yet he made them in the end know that these endeavours of theirs were wholly unprofitable, and that as he was unfortunate in a manner wholly strange, and of which never any example had been seen, if they could not find remedies proportionate to the nature of his ill, he must only lament it, and attend some comfort from heaven, or from the change of his fortune. He spoke these words oftentimes with a troubled countenance, and not seldom with tears, which with all the greatness of his courage he could not retain, and in such sort did he soften them by his discourse, and the sweetness of his behaviour, that they had no longer power to oppose him, but receiv'd into their souls the sad impression of his miseries.

The Princess Polixena was afflicted in such manner, that it seem'd not to be the grief of a brother, but her own that she resent'd; and as the King discover'd himself to her more than to any other person, all that he had in his heart, she had greater cause to afflict her self, and become passionate for him, than those who only saw the exterior marks of his love and grief.

To settle him again in those glorious designs which the course of his love had interrupted, they propos'd to him the passing over the Rhine, and the Conquest of the Gauls, in a time wherein it was so much more easie, in regard the Roman Empire was depriv'd of all its strength, the Goths under the conduct of Alaric being possess'd of Rome and Italy, the Vandals under Gunderick being re-entred into Spain. The Emperour Honorius passing his life in solitude at Ravenna, not so much as informing himself of the miseries of the Empire; and you, my Lord, in whom only it could find a stay and defender, languishing in the chief City of the Tectosages of a cruel wound, from whence nought but death was expected: But the love of Pharamond, who other times had been so desirous of all opportunities to reap honour, and so firmly fix'd to this enterprize, render'd him now insensible of this Importunity; and he represent'd to those who spoke to him of it, indeed with sufficient appearance of reason, that though he had a passionate desire, yet he had little cause to abandon his Country, and deprive it of its main strength at a time, when it was threatned by the King of the Cimbrians, and the King of the Sueves, who intended not only to assault it with all their own powers, but according to the common report were arming all Germany against him; but that when by the assistance of heaven, either by Peace, or the events of War, he should see his Country secured from his enemies, they should see him more desirous than ever to attempt any enterprize to which honour call'd him.

He liv'd, or rather languish'd miserably in this condition, when one day walking in an Alley in the fair Gardens of the Palace with the Princess his Sister, three men came to salute him, two of which he presently knew for an Esquire of Prince Marcomire's, and one of the Officers he had left with him; and the third soon after for Albimir, that Inhabitant of Marobuda, of whom I have already spoke, by whose means his Letter was delivered to Rosamond, and from whom he had receiv'd a Note fastned to an Arrow during the War with Gondioch; and whom at his entrance into Marobuda, he could not find, though he made diligent search after him. He receiv'd the two first with his accustomary affability; but so soon as he knew Albimir, he embrac'd him, and shew'd him a thousand kindnesses extraordinary, not without many times changing colour, and giving the Princess his sister occasion to note that the sight of him did very much concern him.

He demanded in the end with a longing desire, and as it were all at the same time, news of the Princess Rosamond, of Prince Marcomire, and the cause of their arrival: they feared at first to speak before the Princess; but the King having told them that he had nothing to conceal from her, the Squire of Marcomire assured him that the Prince his Master was recover'd of his wounds, having been a long time ill at Egitina: that he had been well attended by the care of Albifinda, and by the Orders of Rosamond her self; and that by what he could judge, the stay he had there made, was not at all prejudicial to him; but that at the same time that the King of the Cimbrians was arriv'd at Marobuda, Briomer had caused him to be stopp'd at Egitina, where he was very strongly guarded, and not permitted to see but a small number of his people whom they had left with him to serve him: That the Princess of the Sueves had made great complaints, representing that a Prince who had expos'd his life for her defence; and shed his blood to rescue her from the power of her enemies, should not be treated like an enemy: That the Princess of the Cimbrians seem'd but ill satisfied; but that neither the one nor the other could hinder the effects of the King's will, nor that of Briomer, who was solely powerful with him, and seem'd more incens'd than himself to the revenge of Theobaldus: That the Principal of those who attended the Prince, were likewise detain'd and kept Prisoners; and that the Squire who spoke, and the Officer of the King had with difficulty sav'd themselves by the assistance of Albimer, who was likewise come with them, by reason of the little safety he could hope for in the Court of the King of the Cimbrians, where he was known to be affectionate to the King of the Franks, by reason of the earnestness he shewed to serve his Brother.

The King was infinitely displeas'd and vex'd at the imprisonment of his Brother, and testified a great sorrow to have forsaken him at a time when he was strong enough to have rescued him out of the hands of his enemies: but remembering at the same time, that neither the Prince was in a condition to follow him, nor could he have taken him from the place where he was, without carrying the war to a place where Rosamond was in person, he found himself not so guilty, and less worthy of reproach.

But all the displeasure which had incens'd him for the interest of Marcomire, could not hinder him from lending attention to what they said concerning Rosamond; and he understood from the mouth of Albimer, who was better instructed in the affairs of the Cimbrians than Marcomire's Esquire; that Rosamond, having made some stay at Egitina, was by the Orders of the King her Father, at his arrival there, return'd to Marobuda, accompanied by the Princess Albifinda and Prince Balamir: That the last had been admirably well received by the King of the Cimbrians, as well for the assistance he hop'd from a Prince of his degree, as because that with some Troops that Briomer had given him before the arrival of the King, he had utterly driven the Burgundians out of the Country of the Fohemians, and in several encounters overcome Gontran, who commanded them: That it was not to be doubted, but he was passionately amorous of the Princess of the Cimbrians, and that she testified a particular esteem for him: That the King of the Cimbrians incens'd with a furious choler against Pharamond for the death of Theobaldus, would interest all Germany, and all the world if it were possible in his quarrel: that he had demanded the assistance of all his Neighbours, and that some days before the departure of Albimer, having understood how the Prince of the Sueves had abandon'd the Combat and War against him, and renounc'd those pretensions he had for Rosamond, after he had been transported violently against his proceedings, seeing himself free in the disposal of his Daughter, and disengag'd from his word given to the King of the Sueves, had declar'd, and sent to be declar'd throughout all Germany, that he would give Rosamond, and his Kingdom with her, to that Prince who should bring him the head of Pharamond, and that with that price only she could be attain'd: That it was judg'd, that this hope would encourage many Princes to the enterprize, to which a less would not so easily have carried them: That they counted a great number among those who pretended, who would not be wanting to present themselves with all their Forces: That the King, as it was believed, would not make any long stay at Marobuda; but intended to depart, as it was said, towards the Frontiers, to the Country of the Sidons; to have there some conference with the King of the Sueves, and the rest of the Princes which armed themselves on his side.

To this discourse of affairs in general, Albimer added for his particular interest, that he was infinitely dissatisfied that he did not meet the King in Marobuda at his entrance, as well to have given him advice of what was pass'd, as he had begun to do by his Note, as to offer himself, to do him all sorts of service; but that to his grief, and by the misfortune of Theobaldus, which he could have diverted, had he seen the King, he was the day before sent by Briomer to Egitina, and there detained by a dangerous sickness: That being there, when Prince Marcomire arriv'd, he had had the honour to visit him many times, whilst he lay sick of his wounds, and to employ himself in all things wherein he thought himself able to serve him: but in the end, being suspected by Briomer, he was no longer permitted to see him, and himself threaten'd, if he did not escape thence; which had oblig'd him to depart with the two Franks, after having assisted them in their escape, as much as was possible: and that he would now seek nothing but at the feet of a Prince, to whose service he was wholly devoted, and would fix himself till death.

The King thanked Albimer for those marks he had received of his affection, and not only promis'd him an assured retreat in his Court, but a fortune, and establishment much different from what he had receiv'd among the Cimbrians, and such that he should have no cause to pine after his native Country: but having satisfied him on that side, like an acknowledging and magnificent Prince, he open'd his mind to that increase of grief, which the discourse of Albimer and his companions had given him; and he found so much trouble for the last proofs of the hatred of Rosamond, and in the imprisonment of Marcomire, that he could neither support it nor dissemble it. In the hatred of Rosamond, he found nothing but what he had before foreseen; and he had understood from that Princess her own mouth, that she would arm all the earth against him: That the King of the Cimbrians's power though not so dreadful, yet was sufficiently formidable by the effects it might produce; nor had he at all any doubt but he would testify the most violent resentments for the death of his Son. But in the imprisonment of Marcomire, a Prince of admirable merit, whom he had always dearly loved, and who was not fallen in that danger, but for his particular interest, he met with matter of affliction, in which he could not comfort himself; and as in this accident he saw himself not only concern'd by fraternal amity, but by honour, which engag'd him to succour his Brother, he could neither find one moment of repose, nor one grain of patience.
that

Ab! let us march, (said he, breaking out into a passion) let us march without farther delay; and since my desperate misfortunes will yet again lead me to these cruel Plains, where I have lost so much, let us once more cover them with armed men, and rescue Marcomire from that barbarous King, in whom my good intentions begat nothing but cruelty. It is to me a desperate mischief, but it is a mischief with which no consideration can dispence; and at the price of all my fortunes, and all my repose, nay of mine own life, I must deliver Marcomire.

He remained some time in this resolution, preparing to act what he thought himself bound to, notwithstanding all that his love could inspire him with: but a little after, listening to thoughts quite contrary, and feeling the power of his affection, which presented it self with its entire Forces; Wherefore (replied he to himself) should I again make War against Rosamond? for I shall not only present my self in Arms against her Father, but I shall with my Arms assault that same City, where she is environed with Marcomire, and with the same ill fortune which hath accompanied me in my love, after having slain her Brother, I should put my self in danger to deprive her Father of his life.

This thought made him rave and tremble from head to foot: and as by the proofs he had made, he had reason to fear his fortune in all that regarded his love, he fear'd that it would prove so fatal to him, as to make him slay the Father of Rosamond. This fear made him grow pale; and still more and more fortifying it self in his mind, made him resent all it could contain of most cruel, or most terrible: so that having his spirit wholly fill'd with this dreadful Idea; Ab, (cried he) I will not again make war against Rosamond, and draw on my self that danger (to which I seem provoked by my cruel destinies) to charge my self before her, with crimes yet less pardonable than those I have unhappily committed; I have already too much shed the blood of her miserable subjects, and I would I could repay with all mine, that which I have spilt of her Illustrious House: I have other ways to satisfy what I owe to Duty, and to fraternal Amity; and I will yet deliver Marcomire from the hands of our enemies, without appearing an enemy to Rosamond.

He was turmoyl'd for some days by these different thoughts, without being able to determine what he should do: but in the end, he took his resolution, a resolution wholly agreeable to his love, though little to prudence and his dignity; and having caused Albimer to be call'd, withdrawing with him alone into his Closet; Albimer (said he) whatsoever injury I receive from the King of the Cimbrians, I cannot resolve again to carry a war into your Country; and though I am oblig'd to it, by the unjust imprisonment of my Brother, I may find perhaps ways to deliver him, without rendring my self more criminal to the Princess whom I adore, and whom I shall adore to my death: and if all others fail, I have one infallible one, which I shall embrace in the utmost extremity, and by which I shall acquit my self at the same time, of what I owe to Marcomire, and of the hatred of Rosamond. I fear indeed that if the King of the Cimbrians see me return armed into his Country, he should be transported to some fatal resolutions against my Brother, and that those powers I employ for his liberty, should be turned against his life: but above all, Albimer, I cannot live without the sight of Rosamond, though the loss of my life should infallibly accompany the sight of her; for at present, it is so unfortunate and deplorable, that it would be but a bad effect of its prudence, to think of its preservation; and I hazard so little in hazarding it, that my friends cannot blame me with reason, when they see it expos'd to this danger. 'Tis for this reason, Albimer, that I have need of your assistance: and if by your help I may pass unknown to Marobuda, and remain there some days, and find means to see the Princess, you ought not only hope all things from my acknowledgments; but if this hope is beneath your courage, you may be assured that I will be indebted to you for something more precious than all I can hazard, nor ever forget how much I am oblig'd.

After these words, he more clearly explain'd his intention to Albimer, whom though the greatness of the danger to which he would expose himself, made somewhat fearful, he found in him so much disposition to serve him, that he had nothing to conquer in his spirit, but that fear he had for a life or a liberty so precious: in the end, the King vanquish'd all difficulties, not by reason, but by resolution; and the same day, calling Priam, Basogastus and Charamont, to whom only he would communicate his design, to hinder them from being alarm'd by his absence, and to oblige them to supply by their prudence the ill effects it might produce. You may judge, my Lord, that they withstood his design with infinite reasons, but they withstood it in vain; and the King, who by his natural affability, had all his life treated them rather like Friends than Subjects, spoke to them now with so much authority, and testified so well that he would be master at this time, that they were constrain'd to submit to his will, though with much aversion and discontent.

Yet it was by their counsel that the King parted not from Peapolis, in an estate so as to alarm his Court or people; but as he had not his Troops in that readiness his necessities requir'd, by reason of the threats and preparations of his enemies, and so wanted no pretence to visit the Frontiers, daily threaten'd to be assaulted by the Sueves and Cimbrians; after he had taken leave of the Princess, as for a little voyage, and left Priam and Basogastus at Peapolis, he departed with the greatest part of the Cavalry, and coasting along the Banks of the Mein, advanced to Mensgade which was in our possession, and is little distant from the Frontiers of the Cimbrians. From thence he visited several places, which he gave order to fortifie; and having thus employed two days, the third he remanded Ibere and Genebaud, who had followed him from Peapolis, with some orders to perfect the Levies; and the fourth he quitted his Party, and leaving Charamont (privy to his secret) order to command them on that Frontier, and not remove himself thence, he departed without any more with him than Albimer, my self and two Esquires.

With this little Train, which he found yet too great for his design, he resolv'd to pass into a Country, where not only all things arm'd themselves against him, but besides the proper Forces of the Country, they had call'd all their Neighbours to attack that life he went so voluntarily to expose. This action denoted so much more the violence of his love, as he was naturally full of wisdom, and that in his greatest youth, there were never observ'd in him those transportations of mind, which were ordinarily found in persons of his age. However, I may speak it with truth, that the consideration of Marcomire, in whose imprisonment he conceiv'd both his honour and fraternal love equally concern'd, was no less powerful over his spirit, than the power of his love; and that since he could not resolve to wage war against the Father of Rosamond for the liberty of Marcomire, if all other ways to restore it failed, he was resolv'd to put himself into the power of the Cimbrian King, to release his Brother, and to pay in this manner what he ought to the friendship of Marcomire, and to the hatred of Rosamond. He did me the honour oftentimes to make me the partner of these his thoughts; and the knowledge I had of his humour, and the truth of all his words, made me give but too much credit to all his discourse.

As at our setting forth we were not far distant from the Frontiers of Bohemia, so it was but the second day after that we entred that Country; and our entrance was so much the more easie, by reason that the King of the Cimbrians, well inform'd of the love and intentions of Pharamond, not fearing he would make war against him, had not caus'd the Avenues of his Kingdom to be guarded as at other times: With the same ease we went farther into the Country, under the conduct of Albimer, who knew the ways and passages most open, and whom the King caus'd to pass for our Master, in those places where we could not hinder our selves from being seen; yet we shunn'd the meeting with people as much as possible: and as in those preparations for war, it was no strange thing to see armed men travel, the King scarce march'd at all without his Arms, nor carried he in this voyage any other weapons than what common persons might bear, and not those magnificent and stately ones, to which he was accusom'd, and which might make him be taken notice of by their sumptuousness and beauty.

As we advanc'd into the Country, the King understood with the news of the departure of the King of the Cimbrians from Marobuda towards the Frontiers, that of the great force which he arm'd against him: but by the usual delay of such affairs, and the mighty preparations of the King of the Cimbrians, he judg'd well that there would yet be some time spent, before he could enter into Franconia. For in sum, though with the Forces of his Realm, and those of the King of the Sueves, who notwithstanding the love and behaviour of his Son, was not disinited from him, he was sufficiently able to make war against us; yet the knowledge he had of the valour of Pharamond, and the difficulty he should have to vanquish him, if he did not arm a great part of the world against him, had made him resolve not to assault him, but with such a potent force, as should make all others yield to it: and not doubting but the hopes of possessing Rosamond, would draw a great number of Princes to his party, he attended the effect, and assembled a world of enemies to come and overwhelm Franconia.

had

We received advice that Godegesile, successour of that same Radugaise, whom you, my Lord, slew in Italy, and King of the Herules, and part of the Oriental Goths, a Prince of great valour and high reputation, charmed with those sweet hopes to possess Rosamond, had summon'd all the Forces of his Realm to come and assist her Father. That Ardaric King of the Alains, that same Ardaric whom you drove out of Spain, having till now unprofitably sigh'd after the beauties of Rosamond, whom he had seen, and by whom he had been disdain'd, seeing himself recall'd by the promise of the King her Father, to those hopes he had lost, arm'd the Alains for this quarrel, and prepar'd to march with the Cimbrians against us. That Amalaric King of the Turingiens, and Odoacre King of the Basternes, equally surpris'd with the beauties of Rosamond, either by the report of her far spreading renown, or by the sight of her portraicture, which her Father had sent into all Countries and Nations, and allured by that fair hopes he gave them, hasten'd to this war with a formidable power: but the most surpris'ing news that reached the King, was, that King Gondioch himself, for whose interest he had attracted the hatred of the King of the Cimbrians, being recovered of those wounds which he had received in the combat against Balamir, making all other considerations yield to his hopes to possess Rosamond, had not only offer'd to the King of the Cimbrians the employing of all his powers against us, but had with others been received into the Alliance he demanded, and to the hopes to possess Rosamond, by the destruction of Pharamond.

This last action of the King of the Burgundians, did truly incense my Prince: but notwithstanding so terrible a preparation, and the union of so many great Princes against him, was able to strike terror into the best assur'd mind, it did not at all shake his; either through the grandeur of his courage, which made him despise the greatest dangers, or through the little interest he took in his own preservation, in a time wherein his life was odious to him. Would to God (said he with a sigh) that with all these great enemies, we had not the hatred of Rosamond to struggle with: we should possibly little esteem their power; if it were not armed with a power far more terrible.

However he was not wholly insensible at this news; and though by the prepossession of his love, he had almost forgot all he ought to himself, he could not forget that assistance he ought to his people in those miseries that threaten'd them; and his disquiet had been unexpressible, had he not believed that the great preparations of his enemies would delay their executions, and give him time to return to the defence of his Country.

Being now approached near the heart of the Country, we received two advices, which though different in themselves, did both extremely concern him: by the one, we understood, that Prince Marcomire, whom the King of the Cimbrians had caused to be arrested at Egitina, where he was straitly guarded, being taken out of prison to be conducted to Marobuda, by those orders which Briomer received from his King, was deliver'd and taken from his Guards which had charge of him, without being able to judge from whence that assistance came, or to hear any news of him after his deliverance, though Briomer was extremely tormented, and manifested infinite displeasure at his liberty: by the other we were informed, that the Princess Rosamond, with the Princess Albisinda, whom the changes that happen'd to their Families could not disunite, was retired after the departure of the King to Lisurgis, a magnificent Palace of the King her Father, about four hours journey from Marobuda, where she was resolv'd to attend the return of the King; and liv'd in the mean time, in as great a retirement as was possible.

At the news of the liberty of Marcomire, the King my Master entertain'd all that joy so welcome tidings were able to inspire him with: for what he ought to the friendship of such a Brother, and to his honour, which was not meanly engag'd in such imprisonment, had possess'd him with a trouble, from which he could not be deliver'd without infinite satisfaction: he manifested his joy to us, by all imaginable exteriour signs: but though the imprisonment of Marcomire had been in part the cause of his voyage, his liberty made him not break off his design, or discontinue it: and indeed we were so nigh to the Palace where Rosamond sojourn'd, that no consideration could oblige him to return without seeing her: and her present retirement at Lisurgis, contributed much to facilitate his design; for fortune so order'd, that a Sister of Albimer's, a widow, for some years past, a woman of a great spirit, and who by many effects of the goodness of the King my Master, was no less affectionate to his interests than her Brother, had a very fair house on the Banks of the Elba, where she at present liv'd, and which was not above an hours walk distant from the King's.

Albimer, who, however fearful of the great danger to which the King expos'd himself, yet had still a great desire to serve him, propos'd immediately this conveniency to execute his design: and as he doubted not but that his sister went every day to Lisurgis, (as well to complement the Princess, to whom she was very acceptable, as to visit her younger sister, who was in her service, as I believe I have told you) and was not ignorant of the good intentions she bore towards my Prince, nor distrusting her discretion and conduct in things of greater importance; he counsel'd the King to retire to this house, which was in the middle of a Wood, distant from all Roads, and in the most solitary place of all the Country.

The King, whose desire to see what he lov'd, shut his eyes to all considerations of danger, and who rather than fail of his intents, had resolv'd to enter Marobodu, where his countenance had been seen by all the World, and where he could not have stayed, but with the hazard of those perils you may easily imagine, adher'd to the advice of Albimer as the best effect of his good fortune, and committing his safety to his conduct, he suffer'd himself to be guided to that house, like a man whose passions had left him no thoughts of life.

Besides the interest which Albimer had to conceal the arrival and stay of the King in the Country, he was likewise oblig'd to conceal his own; not doubting but that besides the suspicion already had of him at Court, they might have understood his journey into our Country; and so his proper disgrace, which permitted him not to shew himself, did afford us the less opportunities, and oblig'd us to a greater restraint, than if he had had the liberty to walk abroad, and suffer himself to be seen: for this reason he would not that we should arrive at his sisters, but by night: and led us by unusual ways, though well known to him: but before the approach of night, there besel to the King an adventure so extraordinary, that it makes me believe, my Lord, it will give you some astonishment.

We had scarce two hours journey to the Place, whither we were to go, and we began to enter into a Wood of great extent, where ordinarily the Kings of the Cimbrians took their pleasure in the Chase, when we first heard a great noise, and soon after casting our eyes among the trees, which were not there very thick, we saw, though with confusion, a Combat of many men on horseback. The King, who for the reasons he had to conceal himself in that Country, endeavouring to avoid the meeting with any person, stop'd at this sight, to consider what resolution he should take, either to pursue his way, or to take another course which Albimer propos'd, when he saw coming towards us on full speed a young man without Arms, and with a visage on which all possible marks of fear and grief were pourtray'd: he was already very near us, and I believe that the prepossession of his mind permitted him not to see us, when the King out of his natural generosity, forgetting the design he had to conceal himself, advanced towards him, and demanded the cause of the Combat we beheld, and the disorder which appear'd in his person. The young man attended not the end of his demand, but precipitately interrupting him: Whatever you be (said he) if you be not of the number of our enemies, succour virtue and valour oppress'd in the person of the great Balamir, who alone and without other Arms than his sword, defends his life against a Troop of Assassins which have assaulted it.

He spoke to the King only these words, and in the same instant quitted him, believing that he ought to go search a greater assistance than we could give him, against a number of men thrice as many as we. The King stop'd some time, to consider the strangeness of this adventure, and the fantastick humour of his fortune, which had conducted him to such an opportunity; but he deliberated not at all what resolution to take, but when Albimer was now ready to open his mouth, and to represent to him that this Balamir, to whom he was demanded to give assistance, and an assistance which he could not give without running too great a hazard of his life, was his greatest enemy and most formidable Rival, stopping him at his first words: Albimer (said he) I know your intentions, but I cannot conform mine; and though perhaps I am so much concern'd in my love, that I could understand without grief the death of such a Rival as Balamir, and perhaps with that my fortune had not led me hither to assist him, yet I am not so ignoble to let him perish, now I have the power to help him; nor could I ever pardon my self of this unworthiness, were I capable to commit it.

Finishing these words, he spurred on his Horse towards the place where he distinctly beheld the fight: I followed him as fast as I could possible; and Albimer, who was likewise armed, speeded after us with a gallant assurance. In a few minutes the King came to the stage stage of this unequal fight; and as soon he saw those things which struck himself with astonishment; in effect, one man alone, but a man of the noblest Air in the world, (if my Prince had not been) clad only with a small hunting Robe, and with no other Arms but his Sword, did not only mingle himself among a Troop of fifteen or sixteen men armed Cap-a-pe, but had by the effects of a prodigious valour, made three or four tumble dead at his feet, wounded many others, and in spite of the number, and the advantage of their Arms, made the Assassins fear in such sort, that the most hardy durst not approach him without trembling. I believe that their number had not been able to have given them a victory over him, had he been defended with Arms; but having nothing on which might preserve his person from those blows they gave, and not having a body impene-trable, though his force was prodigious, and his courage invincible, he was reduced to extream danger: for besides that his cloaths began to be dyed in several places with his blood, his Horse fell dead between his legs at the very instant we arriv'd. Yet he raised himself up with an admirable agility, and resting his back against a Tree, presented the point of his sword to his Enemies, with an assurance which yet made them fear, though it could not have preserved his life at that time, if help had been a little longer delayed.

Pharamond having for some time beheld with admiration these extraordinary effects of his valour, flew like a raging Lion amongst the Troop of Assassins, and by the shock of his Horse opening a passage through the Circle which environed him, with his first charge struck terror into the most confident minds. The first that would oppose himself to his irresistible valour, receiv'd a thrust in his Throat, which made him at the same instant with his blood yield up his soul: at the second blow he made a head with the helmet fall at the feet of Balamir. This terrible beginning stopt their fury, who seemed most eager after the death of Balamir; and by giving that Prince whom they assaulted time to breath, they permitted him to cast his eyes upon my Prince, and take notice of the great help he received: he saw how almost at the same moment a third blow threw down a third enemy, and he that gave it, charg'd the rest with so much resolution as made them forget their design to assault his life, and think of their own defence. If he had had time to dedicate to admiration, he had done it without doubt to that he believ'd due to the great effects of Pharamond's valour; but judging that it was now more just to joyn himself with his defender, than to admire him, he made use of the liberty he gave him to charge his left Arm with a Shield he saw at his feet; and casting himself on a Horse, which without a Master pass'd close by him, he returned to the Combat with his Sword in his hand; and spurring up by the side of Pharamond with his Sword in his hand, made him mark with astonishment, and it may be with some displeasure, the courage of his Rival. I did what was possible for me at such a pinch, to render my self worthy the honour to accompany so great a Matter; and Albimer fought near me with sufficient gallantry: but our enemies, whether they fear'd a greater help, or found themselves too weak to resist the tempest; fell from the Arms of Pharamond and Balamir, made little resistance, but after having a short time maintain'd the fight with infinite disorder, and seeing more of their Companions pressed to the ground under the weight of their gaping wounds, forsook their enterprize, and in the swiftness of their Horses sought their safety. Balamir incens'd by their treachery, and the wounds he had receiv'd; following them, slew some of the slowest; but he soon return'd asham'd to pursue vanquish'd and affrighted men, having more impatience to return thanks to his defender, than to revenge himself of his enemies. He approached him with a demeanour, which equally signified his acknowledgments and astonishment; and by his Majestick port, and that admirable grace he observ'd in all his person, perswaded himself so much to his advantage, that though his Dignity was unknown to him, he could not hinder himself from regarding him with some respect.

Pharamond resolving not to be known by him, had lifted up but a small part of his Viser, so that Balamir could difficultly discern any part of his visage; but that of Balamir, who was unarmed, appeared entire to the eyes of my Prince, and made him behold in the person of his Rival a man of the highest and noblest Air in the world: they beheld each other some time without speaking; and Balamir was about to break silence, to thank Pharamond for the assistance he had given him, when my Prince, who saw, and truly saw with great impatience and trouble, no small quantity of blood on his cloaths, interrupted him at the beginning of his discourse, to demand of him whether he were not dangerously wounded. I am not (said the Prince of the Huns) though I have many wounds; and I hope the Gods will yet lend me life to return a part of what I owe to him who hath so ge- nerously preserved it. You can defend it your self by your own valour (replied my Prince) and both by the proofs which I have seen, and the fame which is spread through the world, I know well that my assistance was not at all necessary. The extremity in which you have found me (answered Balamir) may oppose it self to the modesty of your discourse; and though you had been hitherto the greatest of mine enemies, I will acknowledge till death that I am oblig'd to you for my life. I believe (replied Pharamond) that your enemies themselves owe all that service to your vertue which I have rendred you; and I doubt not at all but that Pharamond whose head you have promised to the King of the Cimbrians, had fought in your defence, had he found you in this danger. I believe things much more difficult from the vertue of Pharamond (replied Balamir) and perhaps he hath enemies who would not refuse to expose their lives for his safety in a like adventure; but though I have promised to fight both against Pharamond, and against all the men in the world in the quarrel of Rosamond, yet I was never so rash as to promise the head of Pharamond; for besides that we ought to act with more modesty against a Prince of so fair a reputation, I doubt not but he will defend his head against all the Power of the earth. If he defends it against you (replied my Prince) he will defend it easily against the rest of his enemies; and by what I hear by publick Renown, I doubt not but those who have so highly engag'd in so bold an enterprize, will run a doubtful hazard.
nerously

These words oblig'd the Prince of the Huns to look more strictly upon my King, and possibly with some suspicion, when we saw appear eight or ten men on horseback, who advanced towards us on full speed. The King no sooner saw them, but he demanded of Balamir if they were his enemies; but the Prince who knew them, though they were yet a good space distant, having assur'd him that they were his friends, and persons who came to serve and assist him: I leave you then with them (said he) since I am no longer necessary to you, and that I am called hence by affairs very important.

Finishing these words, he turned the head of his Horse to depart, when Balamir stopping him by the skirts of his Armour, Wherefore (said he) will you leave me without letting me know to whom I am oblig'd for my life? and when you should be Prince Marcomire, as many appearances make me suspect, you may believe me, that those contentions I have for love, or for glory, with the King of the Franks, should not hinder me from rendring to his brother what I owe to my valiant Defender. I am neither him whom you believe (said my Prince) nor any other person may be known to you; but I hope that we shall see each other in a place where you may be confirm'd in the good opinion you have of your enemies; in the mean time, permit me to leave you, since I am unuseful to you.

And at these words, seeing the persons who came towards us were very nigh, he spur'd his Horse away swiftly. Albimer, the two Esquires, and my self followed him the like pace; and so soon as we got out of the sight of those persons, we pursued under the Conduct of Albimer the way which led us to the house of his Sister.

This adventure (said Constance to Cleomer, interrupting him) makes me at once know what is the fortune of Pharamond, which equally leads him to occasions to offend what he loves, and to serve his enemies; but if this humour of fortune hath surpris'd me, yet the proceeding of Pharamond doth not at all astonish me; for I never doubted him incapable of such an effect of vertue, though truly this action be worthy all those praises can be given to the fairest and most extraordinary.

It was night (continued Cleomer) when we arriv'd at the house of Albimer's sister: but before we entred it, Albimer went to advertise his sister, and to prepare a conveniency for all things, and soon after returned to seek the King; and having caused him to pass through a Garden, conducted him to an apartment separated from the rest of the lodgings, and in which he might remain without being seen by the Domesticks. Those to whom the sister of Albimer could not conceal our arrival, believed by what she told them, that Albimer was returned, but that by reason of his disgrace, and the suspicion had of him, he durst not remain in the house but with infinite secrecy, and contributed as much as they could to conceal our stay.

Brafilda (for that was the name of Albimer's sister) did not only receive my Prince like a person educated in the Court of a King, and caused him to be serv'd in her house with an admirable diligence, but govern'd her self upon this occasion with a conduct extraordinary; and though she consider'd with an infinite fear the danger to which the King expos'd himself, and could not reassure her self against those great reasons she had to fear for him, yet she dissembled all exteriour shews of it, the better to let him find that satisfaction he came to seek with so much peril, and so little wariness: and not doubting but Luciana her sister, who was still near the Princess, and whom she knew well affect'd towards him, and entirely fix'd to the interest of their brother, could better than her self procure procure a part of what he desired, she sent to Lisurgis, to pray her to come and visit her, and entreat the Princess to give her leave for a day; which she easily obtained: and because from Lisurgis to the house of Brasilda, it is no more than an hours journey, we saw Luciana the morrow after our arrival.

This Lady seem'd the most astonish'd in the world, when she saw Pharamond in her Sisters house; and conceived so great a trouble for him, that she could not conceal it: Wherefore, my Lord (said she) whilst all things are fallen out here against a life which you can defend with such admirable valour, and with force not at all inferior to that of your enemies, do you come to give it them, and yield them a victory without trouble, which perhaps they would hardly obtain with the united power of Germany? Yes (answered the King) I come to expose to the anger of Rosamond this life which she detests, and for which you seem so much concern'd; and in the condition to which it is reduc'd by the hatred of the Princess, I expose so little in exposing it, that if its misery were known to you, you would not so much fear its loss. In sum, Luciana, I cannot live hated by Rosamond, nor can I live without seeing her; it is her sight I seek at the peril of this unfortunate life: and if by your assistance I may see her, I will be indebted to you something much more precious than that life you would preserve me. It is not difficult to see the Princess (answered Luciana) but it is difficult for you to see her, or to let your self be seen by her with any security. Ah Luciana (replied Pharamond) let us not take so much care for my security, but let us give some Empire to Fortune for a happiness for which I had not thus expos'd my self, if I had regarded my safety. I would willingly, if you desire it, conceal my self from the King of the Cimbrians, from Briomer, and all such, whose interest like theirs, might encourage them to my loss; but I would present my self to Rosamond; and if she desires my death I shall gladly suffer it. I cannot tell you precisely (replied Luciana) what the Princesses thoughts are concerning you, for she communicates them to no person; but whatsoever they be, I believe she will not be Mistress of your life, if you fall under the power of the Cimbrian King. The Gods will be the disposers of that (replied my Prince) but in fine, you see my resolution; and if I must dye, I had much rather the Princess should give her self that satisfaction she will receive by my death, than owe it to Godegfile, Balamir or Gondioch.

These words overwhelmed us with a mortal grief; and the King seeing that Luciana, as much astonish'd as we, kept a silence like to ours, I doubt not at all (added he) but in committing my self to you in my miseries, I shall expose your house to some disgrace; but I hope I shall dispel all those mists that may threaten it: and besides that I do not desire you should do any thing for me which may render you suspected, if Fortune is too much contrary to me, I will place Albimer, and all his, in an estate, shall not permit them to repent of the affection they bore me.

To these he added many other words, unnecessary to recount you; and in the end, propos'd an hundred questions to Luciana; to which she gave him all the satisfactory answers it was possible for her to give. It was now that he understood those words which I have told you of the Princesses, spoken in the Terras at the sight of Pharamond, and many other things which without her recital had never come to our knowledge: she added to this discourse, that after the death of Theobaldus, the Princess had liv'd in a melancholy estate, which had made her avoid the company of all the world, only that of the Princess of the Sueves; that it was for this reason, that she quitted the City, to pass some time at Lisurgis, where though her Court was very great, she retir'd as much as was possible; and few days pass'd, but she walk'd with the Princess Albisinda, and some attendant Ladies; without other company, in the most shady and obscure Alleys of a great Park, which from the Palace extends it self to the Banks of the Elba: That in this place she often left Albisinda, that she might alone meditate with more freedom, and that at those hours there were few persons who had the privilege to enter into the Park.

'Twas in this discourse of Luciana's that the King believ'd he had found what he sought; and having demanded of her in what manner the Park was fence'd, and understood from her, that near the Alleys where Rosamond did most ordinarily walk, the wood was so thick, that one might easily hide himself from the eyes of persons that pass'd close by; that below the Park there was a little Gate, by which they entred into the Forest; and that from the house where we were, there was a passage to go to that little Gate, without going out of the Forest, and by ways which few persons pass'd, but were well known to Albimer: he demanded of her, if it were not possible going through the Forest to that little Gate of the Park, to enter it by her means, and conceal himself in the thickest of the wood, from whence he might behold the Princess passing, and govern himself as Heaven should inspire him, and the occasions would permit.

Luciana meditated a long time on this proposition; and in the end, she answer'd the King, that in this way to see Rosamond, she found infinite danger, but that she yet saw far more in all other ways she could imagine; and that if he could not be diverted from his design, to present himself to the sight of the Princess, he might as well try this as any other: that the little Gate of the Park was continually shut, but shut in such sort, that it might be opened in the inner side, which she promised him to perform, and leave it so, that with a small push he might thrust it open. At this discourse, which made us all tremble, and which Luciana herself spoke not but with trembling, the King believ'd to have found his repose and entire felicity; and thanking Luciana with an admirable serenity of mind: and the marks of a joy wholly extraordinary, he conjured her to perform what she had promis'd, and prest her in such a manner, that she gave him her word the day following to do him that service.

The King having taken this order for the execution of his design, and being more particularly instructed by Luciana what he ought to do, prick'd by a passion for the knowledge of which he had never till now given any exterior marks, began a discourse concerning Balamir, conjuring her to tell with sincerity, how she believ'd him to stand in the affection of the Princess. It would be difficult for me (said Luciana) *to tell the things which the Princess discourses but to few persons, and possibly to none but Albilinda: but by what I might judge, the Prince of the Huns, by the merit of his person, and by the services he has rendred the Princess, hath attracted no small portion of her esteem and good will: she has given him those marks which she has not hitherto testified to other men; and I seriously believe, that if his fortune would that he should be prefer'd before other pretendants, the Princess would receive the King's command to espouse him, with less opposition than she would many others: but I believe that this is all the advantage he hath over her resolution; and I think not at all, as I have told your Majesty, that she hath any thoughts for him, but those of esteem and good will: he hath in person attended her ever since he chas'd the Burgundians forth of these Territories, and hath still accompanied her to Lisurgis, where she often keeps her Court; but yesterday being a hunting, he was assaulted by a Troop of armed men, and had, as himself says, been kill'd, if he had not been assisted by some unknown persons, to whom he gave a thousand praises, and was conducted back to the Castle with many great wounds, but none judged dangerous: the Princess hath testified an infinite displeasure for his wounds, hath visited him, and caused him to be served with sufficient diligence. And in sum, according to my judgment, and that of the whole world, he is the most to be fear'd of all your Rivals. 'Tis true, that he serves her only with his person, and that not being heir to the King of the Huns, and being himself at present in disgrace with his Father, he hath no Crowns to offer, nor great Armies to lead to the service of the King her Father, like his Rivals, who are all great Kings, possessors of potent Realms; and it hath without all doubt been this consideration, that hath hindered the King from declaring himself in his favour, as I believe he had otherwise done, upon the change of Viridomar. The King here interrupting Luciana, Tell me (said he) if you please, what effects that change of Viridomar, of which you speak, produc'd in your Court, and particularly in the mind of the Princess.*

The Princess (answer'd Luciana) testified little displeasure at it, at least such as could come to our knowledge: that which most touch'd her at that time, was the discontent of the Princess Albilinda, who seeing how Heaven oppos'd all proposals made for the Alliance of their two Royal Families, remain'd for some few days wholly disconsolate. Our King at first highly resent'd the action, but was at length somewhat pleas'd, by the assurance the King of Sueves gave him, of the continuation of his affection, the confirmation of their alliance against you, and by the oath he made never to look upon his Son, but as his mortal enemy; and to testify to the King the truth of what he said, he order'd that the Princess Albilinda should still remain with the Princess Rosamond, for the better assuring of his promises, though all the hopes of the propos'd marriages were extinct.

The King had many other discourses with Luciana: but towards evening he permitted her to return to Lisurgis, this Lady having represented to him, that to prevent those suspicions might be had of her for the future, and to put her self into a condition to render him that service he desired of her, 'twas necessary that that visit should be of no longer continuance. The King pass'd that night with an impatience as great as if the succeeding day had been destin'd to his utmost felicity; and he rose very early in the morning, though he was not to go to the Park of Lisurgis till it were late: the hours that remain'd, seem'd of an extraordinary length; and when that of Luciana's appointment approach'd, he mounted on Horseback, and went to accomplish this dangerous adventure, with as much assurance as if he had been going to take his pleasure in his own Gardens in Peapolis.

You

You see well, my Lord, that this enterprize was ill conceived, both in the beginning and process of it; or to speak better, that it had never any conformity with good reason: I will not therefore justify it, but only tell you, that when men once despise or abandon their lives, all things are easie; therefore the King not being capable to live in the hatred of Rosamond, resolv'd thus prodigally to go and present her that head she demanded, in the sight of all the Cimbrians, since other ways they could not effect it; and it was for this reason, my Lord, that you heard me say in the beginning of my discourse, that Pharamond had been a person truly admirable, if he could have defended himself against a passion, which hath often transported his soul to fury, and carried him to those extremities, which no reason can excuse.

It was then under the conduct of this passion, rather than under that of Albimer, that we cross'd the Forest towards the Park of Lisurgis; and we were come within sight of the Wall, and of the little Gate which Albimer shewed us, when the King alighted, and permitting only my self to follow him, he sent back Albimer and the two Esquires, with his Horses, to the House of his Sister, ordering him not to return till night to the same place, lest if any accident should happen to him, Albimer, for whose life he with reason fear'd, should be surpris'd with the Horses, and be precipitated into a danger from whence he could no more retire: he fear'd not the same for me, knowing well that not being subject to the King of the Cimbrians, I was not expos'd to the same punishment that might threaten Albimer; and it was for this reason, that he suffer'd me to have the honour to accompany him.

The Castle of Lisurgis is built on a Hill, which commands over the River, and the Neighbouring Country. The Gardens are below, and extend to the Banks of the River; and from the Garden there is an entrance into the Park, which for its beauty worthily deserves to be annexed to a Regal Mansion. The Wood is very thick, but parted into several great Allies, the fairest of which runs along the River, and butts at one end to a fair Arbour very near the little Gate; and at the other, to another fair Arbour, from whence the prospect extends along the silver streams of the River, and over a vast meadow. The Gate with an easie thrust open'd, as Luciana had promis'd us; and the King being advanc'd to the end of the Alley, seeing there was no person appear'd, believ'd that he might have the liberty to walk to the other end, and take a little notice of the place, not knowing but that it might prove necessary for him before he conceal'd himself in the wood, as he had agreed with Luciana.

In short, he walk'd to the end of the Alley, though it was very long; entred into the Arbour, which was at the end, and beheld its admirable beauty: but being about to return, he saw the Princess appear in the Alley, into which she entred by another door that butted against the middle of that great walk; and casting his eyes up another Alley which from the height of the Park descended to the Arbour, he saw, though at a great distance, several men stopped. Albisinda was with Rosamond, and only two or three Ladies attending; the rest of their Train being walking in other places, to leave them a more free divertisement, as they were accusom'd.

Notwithstanding all the courage of my Prince, the sight of Rosamond both surpris'd and made him tremble; and his surprisal was so much that he had not leisure to conceal himself as he had resolv'd, and prepare himself for an action so important, it being impossible for him to go out of the Arbour, without being seen by the Princess, whose sight and pace were both directed towards us, or expose himself to the discovery of those men, if he retir'd on the other side. You may judge, my Lord, that it was not the fear of death that made Pharamond tremble, but the fear that seized him at the sight of a power more formidable to him than all things most terrible could be to the most faint-hearted spirits. I perceiv'd easly the commotion of his thoughts, though I were extremely troubled; but in a manner much different from him: and I observ'd the trouble that perplex'd him, though my soul was troubled with a thousand fears, for the danger which threatned his life, or his liberty.

To that fear which had first possess'd his spirit, succeeded other passions; and if he could not defend himself against the joy which transported him at the sight of his adored object, at the same time he felt the merciless grief which tormented him at the remembrance of that cruel hatred which caus'd all his misfortunes; nor was he exempted from the assaults of jealousy for those happineses which seem'd promis'd to his Rivals. These things presented themselves confusedly, and without order, to his imagination; but as he beheld the Princess still advance, and that moment approach which he had so much desired, yet so much fear'd, he had no time to discern what he himself apprehended, or take any resolution; yet Fortune was pleas'd to give him a little time to recall his wandering thoughts, and to bethink himself, by letting the Princess to return when she was come within twenty paces of the Arbour, and continuing to walk with Albisinda.

It seem'd that this little time given him to prepare himself, afforded him some comfort; and he began to breath a little more quietly, though he knew not whether he ought to rejoyce at what deprived him of so beloved a sight, and robb'd him for some minutes of a happiness he had so much sigh'd for. In this uncertainty both of what he ought to do, and what he ought to desire, he held his eyes fix'd upon the Princess, and seem'd to give some repose to his heart by the sighs which issued from his breast. His Love rendred it self already mistress of the other passions it produc'd; or to speak better, insensibly dissipat'd the endeavours of all other, to make him resent that alone. His eyes were not only fix'd upon the Princess, but his heart followed every pace she took; and when she turn'd her face to return towards us, it seem'd that a new fire parted from her eyes, to kindle new flames in his soul.

See there (said he sighing) see there the Divinity of Pharamond! but O gods (added he soon after) it is a Divinity arm'd with Lightnings and Thunders, and a Divinity from whom all our vows extract nothing but an anger under which we must be forced to yield. What matter is it to her (pursued he, in the transportations of his passion) to be environed with celestial fire? is she less adorable? or if her flames are fatal to the unfortunate Pharamond, is his condition less glorious? He made now, whatever opposition he found in himself to it, some few minutes reflection on his strange kind of misery; and not being able to resist, having some compassion of himself, Alas (said he) is there among all mortals a condition like to mine? or can all ages furnish an example of a misery parallel to mine? who besides me, among all men, excites nothing but hatred for so much love? and who besides me can behold, as I at present do, in his beloved object, his pitiless and implacable enemy? Ah Rosamond (added he, with new sighs) you whose sight I have with so much zeal desired, and whose sight at the same time inflames and freezes me with love and fear; can it be, that a body at whose beauty the celestial Luminaries blush, should be possess'd by a heart insensible of pity? or can it be possible that the unfortunate Pharamond should come to seek his death at your feet, without touching your soul with some motions of compassion?

These were his thoughts or words, or words like these, whilst Rosamond was walking with Albisinda; but little after, he saw the two Princesses separate, and Albisinda go towards the other end of the Alley with one of the Ladies on whose arm she lean'd: but Rosamond came towards the Arbour without being followed, and that too at a great distance, by any but Luciana, who without doubt had caused the others to depart, to give the King that conveniency he desired. The Princess coming towards the Arbour, walk'd faster than she had done with Albisinda; and it was this confirm'd the King in the opinion that she had a design to enter: he saw now that it was impossible for him to shun her sight, though he had an intention to do it, without exposing himself to that of the other persons who were in the Alley, by which he might retire, and whom in the same time we perceiv'd to advance towards the Arbour; so that overcoming all those fears which oppos'd themselves to his resolution, and seeing that the Princess was not above fifteen or twenty paces from the Arbour, he went forth to meet her, and cast himself at her feet before she could observe his countenance.

The person of Pharamond, and his behaviour, caus'd some surprize in the spirit of the Princess; and she was about to open her mouth to demand of him what he was, when he having lifted up his head, which he had before bowed to the ground, she saw his countenance, and knew it. All the possible marks of astonishment straight appeared on the countenance of Rosamond; and hastily retiring some paces, Oh gods (cried she) it is Pharamond! The King open'd not his mouth to return answer to these words of the Princess, but beholding her with the countenance of a person wholly astonish'd, Is it possible (added she, raising her voice) that I see Pharamond? Yes, Madam (answered the King) it is Pharamond himself whom you see; his miseries have made him too much different from other men, to be mistaken. And what comest thou to seek, (replied the Princess, suffering her self to fall on a seat she found behind her) what seekest thou, cruel enemy of our blood, in a Country where death is so well due to thee, and where death is prepar'd thee by so many thousands of men who arm themselves against thy life? It is that death I came to seek (said Pharamond with a settled countenance) and since you desire it, I should be unworthy of my glorious destiny, if I should permit you to be beholding for it to my enemies. You in vain arm all Europe against a life you hold in your hand: and since this heart, which was yours from the first moment of your life, is the seat of this odious life of mine, it is just I should come to present present it to the point of so many Swords you turn against it. At these words the Prince^{ſe} ſeem'd to be extremely mov'd; and having for ſome time kept ſilence, I have already ſufficiently explain'd to thee, that it is not to thee that I would be oblig'd for the revenge I owe the blood of my Brother; but ſince thou wilt dye by thoſe ways which deprive me of the glory I expected, thou ſhalt dye.—Yes, he ſhall dye, ſaid a voice we heard from the Arbour we before quitted: and at the ſame inſtant we ſaw Briomer come forth with his Sword in his hand, followed by a Troop of men in the ſame poſture. My Prince was riſen up at his arrival, but he made no proffer to put himſelf in any poſture of defence, though he ſaw him run againſt him with his Sword naked, and with intention to pierce his boſom; which preſenting to him with an undaunted countenance, Strike, Briomer (ſaid he he) and ſince Roſamond deſires the death of Pharamond, give it him, if thou da'reſt ſo great an attempt.

Theſe words accompanied with a behaviour and look which ſeem'd to have ſomething in it more than humane, caſt ſo much fear and ſo much reſpect into the ſoul of the furious Briomer, that it almoſt made him let fall his Sword from his hand, and depriv'd him for ſome time of the confidence he had to execute his deſign: but being ſtung with a paſſion much more violent than what could poſſeſs any other perſon, his firſt fury ſoon return'd; and again liſting up the point of his Sword, he was without doubt reſolv'd to have run it through the heart of my Prince, when one of the Ladies which attended the Princeſs Albiſinda, who was again advanced towards us, running to him with a great cry, puſh'd him with ſo much force, that ſhe made him recoil ſeven or eight paces ſtaggering amongſt his men, who hinder'd him from falling; and before he could return to my Prince, as he did return with more fury than ever, Roſamond, putting her ſelf before him and catching hold of his Sword-hand, Stop, Briomer (ſaid ſhe) and know, that it is not permitted thee to murder a King, and that before the eyes of thy Princeſs, without having received orders for it from my Sovereign and thine; ſince it is by his will, and not by ours, that the life of Pharamond ought to be diſpos'd of; and I declare to thee, that thou ſhalt answer it at the price of thy own.

It might eaſily be diſcern'd by the countenance of Briomer, that the words of the Princeſs, and the ſtop ſhe gave to his deſigns, did ſenſibly afflict him: rage and grief made him utter many ſighs. However, having a great reſpect for a Princeſs that was one day to be his Queen, fearing the effects of her anger, and that of the King himſelf if he diſobeyed her, and judging poſſibly that the condition of Pharamond would be little better by the delay of his death, he moderated the violence of his anger; and contenting himſelf only to take the King priſoner, he environ'd him with the Troop of men which accompanied him, and demanded his Sword: but the King looking on him with diſdain, and taking his Sword from his ſide, Thou art not worthy (ſaid he) to receive the Sword of Pharamond; but I ſhall willingly yield it to the Princeſs; and at theſe words caſt it at the feet of Roſamond. The Princeſs cauſ'd it to be taken up, and at the ſame time ſeeing Cloderic come into the Alley, who was a man among the Cimbrians, of a Birth much more noble than Briomer, though he had leſs power over the heart of the King, whom ſometime before the King had made Governour of Marobuda, having given to Briomer more important Employments, ſhe gave to him the charge of the imprifonment of the King of the Franks, commanding him to conduct him to Marobuda, whiſt Briomer remain'd with her for theſe affairs in which ſhe had occaſion of his ſervice and preſence.

Briomer teſtified no ſmall diſpleaſure at this order of the Princeſs, but he durſt not oppoſe it; and Cloderic, who was particularly oblig'd to the Princeſs for the Government of the City which ſhe had procur'd him, having received with all that reſpect he ought, the Commiſſion ſhe gave him, cauſed the Guards to be call'd, of which a part were at the great Gate of the Park; and whiſt the Princeſs walked towards the other ſide, that ſhe might no more ſee Pharamond, and led Briomer with her, who with ſome reluctance followed her, he cauſed the King to march in the middle of the Guards that encompaſſed him, to the great Gate of the Park, where he had given order for a Chariot to attend, to conduct him to the City.

I had never parted from near my King, but my deſire to dye with him had made me put my hand to my Sword, when I ſaw Briomer endeavour to kill him, although thoſe which accompanied him had fallen upon me, and having diſarm'd and taken me, guard'd me along with the King, who having asked for me, and ſeeing me ſo near him; prayed Cloderic that he would permit me to ſerve him; and Cloderic knowing what was due to his degree and dignity, and who regarded him with reſpect, though he were his priſoner, eaſily conſented to his deſire, and teſtified that he would ſerve him as far as his duty would permit him.

As we were marching towards the Gate of the Park, whither we went shortly, to give the more time to prepare the Chariot, and mount the Guard which was to convoy us, I heard a voice which call'd me by my name, and a voice which seem'd to me very familiar; and turning my head towards that side, from whence I thought it came, I saw, though indistinctly, because of the men that environ'd us, one of the Ladies of the Princesses, who followed us at a small distance; it seem'd to me that it was she, who had so fortunately and courageously defended the King against the fury of Briomer: But having neither the liberty to speak to her, nor to stop a moment, I observ'd, without making any show I perceiv'd her, though I doubted not at all but that she was a person well affected for the safety of my Prince; and it seem'd to me, that I as well knew the sound of her voice. At the Gate we found the Chariot in which the King took his place; and Cloderic having caus'd me to enter after him, seated himself afterwards with two or three men; and the rest, who were a great number, environ'd us, and followed on Horseback to the City.

See now, my Lord, what was the event of an enterprize guided by a passion so much an enemy to prudence; though little different from what I had in truth expected, and not at all from what the King himself had hoped. The swiftness of our horses brought us soon to the City, where the King was shut up in a Castle, ordain'd from its foundation for the imprisonment of considerable personages, environ'd with great Towers, and a very deep Ditch. The King was very well lodg'd, and as well serv'd, but very strictly guarded, being limited to one Chamber, and a little Closet to walk in; having none to converse with but my self and those which guarded him; nor had I much more liberty, it not being permitted me to pass farther than to a little chamber which was assign'd me near his: and this rigour caus'd some trouble in the King for Albimer, to whom he would willingly have sent, if he had had the means, to command him to return into Franconia; not doubting but if he were discover'd, and the Horses and Esquires found at his Sisters, he would infallibly be put to death: yet he believed that Luciana would not be wanting to give a ready intelligence to her Sister of what had pass'd; and this belief put his thoughts in some repose.

I tell you this, my Lord, to let you know his natural disposition, by informing you that he was afflicted with this disquiet, whilst he took no thought for his own safety; nor did he fear for me, though he honour'd me with an affection I had never merited, believing that the King of the Cimbrians having no reason to hate me for the service I did my Master, and my King could not in honour treat me ill.

I have few particulars to tell you of the imprisonment of my King, but only to let you understand, if it be possible, what was the condition of his mind, during his captivity; and to this effect, I must tell you, my Lord, and you will easily believe me, after all those things I have recounted you, that he not only never testified any fear of that death, with which he was so apparently threaten'd, and from which by the unworthy proceedings of the King of the Cimbrians, who demanded his head from all the world, it might be believed that his Dignity would not deliver him, though in all likelyhood amongst other enemies, it might have produc'd a greater effect; nor ever had any desire of liberty, though his imprisonment was so rigorous; but he seem'd entirely satisfied with the testimony he had given Rosamond of the love he bore her; nor was his rest disturb'd at the remembrance of a hatred, which he should appease by his blood. Yet however, he sometimes endeavour'd to persuade himself that his life was not so odious to Rosamond as it was represented, since it was truly her self, who had hindred Briomer from taking it away, and had been so careful to take him out of his hands.

To these thoughts he added several others, which might assist him to flatter himself; and it seem'd to him, that in the very words of the Princess, there were things he might explain favourably; and that in this misery, and the danger which threaten'd his life, her countenance express'd more grief than joy: for some times he entertain'd himself pleasingly with these thoughts; but a little after, all that he found for his advantage being banish'd his remembrance, by quite contrary appearances, and the cruel impression of his misfortunes imprinted in his mind, having defaced all that endeavour'd to struggle with it; Ab! let us flatter our selves no more (said he) with a vain appearance, which ought not to abuse us; nor let us attribute the words or actions of Rosamond, to any abatement of her hatred, her hatred is so much the greater, she not believing that she can execute her revenge so entirely, if she doth not her self execute it without my assistance; this is the greatest mark she can give of the hatred she bears me: and necessarily must she abhor all that comes from me, since to my own death, my own assistance is odious: she desires it less than she would desire it, because she sees I would suffer it with joy, and she would again with impatience seek it, if she saw me fear it. The obstacle she gave to the design of Briomer, came less from her pity than her policy, or from that nobleness to which she was oblig'd: and besides that she was too highly born, to see shed in her presence the blood of a Prince, which himself had yielded to her revenge, she judg'd that the death of a King might draw after it troublesome consequences; nor would she without knowing the intentions of her Father, dispose of an affair of so great importance: That which she hath done, is no more than the ordinary form, nor hath she testified other than prudence in such an accident; and too much wisdom hath she, to shew gladness in her eyes, at an adventure so little common. In brief, I should be no less perswaded of her hatred, should she not desire my death, since she too well knows, it would be more agreeable to me, than that life which she would prolong me.

'Twas with these thoughts that his unfortunate passion did ordinarily entertain him; and to abridge my recital, it was in these discourses or the like, that he pass'd all the time of his confinement: I know not what the success might have been, if his imprisonment had been of much longer continuance: the orders expected from the King of the Cimbrians, keeping all the World in expectation of what should happen; when after six days confinement, and on the night which succeeded to the sixth, a little before the King us'd to betake himself to his rest, Cloderic, who had continually treated him with infinite respect, entred into his Chamber, and told him that he came to intreat him to come forth and attend the Princess, who desired to see him. The King was surpris'd at this discourse more than he had been at all the adventures of his life; and regarding Cloderic with a look which denoted his astonishment; Do you speak truth? (said he) or is it possible that the Princess would see me? Yes, my Lord, (said Cloderic) and she hath commanded me to bring you presently before her. She may dispose of her prisoner, (replied Pharamond) but I shall have too much cause to praise her goodness, if before my death she permit me to see her. And at these words, without farther informing himself of the intention of Cloderic or that of Rosamond, he departed out of the Chamber, descending a little pair of Stairs into a Court, whither Cloderic conducted us: but I was not a little astonish'd to see, that neither in the Court nor on the Stairs, there was any of those Guards that us'd to watch constantly near us; and that a little after we pass'd on, not follow'd by any, to a little Gate, whither he led us, and where there was a Chariot ready, into which he pray'd the King to mount.

The King was much astonish'd at what he saw; and finding no more Guards about him, he demand'd of Cloderic if he were any more a prisoner. No my Lord, (said Cloderic) you are not any longer: but if you please to thank the Princess for the liberty she gives you, you may do it in that place whither she hath commanded me to conduct you. As the grace which she hath done me, in permitting me to see her (said my Prince) is incomparably greater than what I receive by the gift of my life and liberty, you may believe I will run with all joy imaginable, to a happiness so little hop'd for. And at these words mounting the Chariot, having first receiv'd his sword from the hand of Cloderic, who presented it with a noble respect, demanding pardon of my Prince, if for reasons very important he led him without lights; and the Chariot having with an infinite swiftness conducted us to a Court of that same Palace where we had formerly made some stay, and where my Prince lost his repose and liberty; causing us to ascend a pair of Stairs, unknown to us, and pass through a Hall, a little more clear, he led us into a Chamber, where by the brightness of many lights, which darted a splendor equal to that of the morning sun, we saw the Princess Rosamond accompanied only by three Ladies.

At this sight my Prince was more astonish'd and amaz'd, than he had ever been: and whilst he made trial to recal his reason and knowledge, which seem'd utterly lost at that time, the Princess advancing towards him with a behaviour full of Majesty, and accompanied with something supernatural; Pharamond (said she) as thou art not our prisoner by fair War, so it is not just to detain thee, nor to draw from thy imprisonment those advantages we owe only to thy self. 'Twas never from me, without doubt, that thou didst expect thy liberty; and that which I this day do in delivering thee, is little conformable to my just resentment, and will possibly appear less conformable to my duty. But though I may expose my self to the judgment of men, and to the anger of the King my Father, if what I do for thee be known to him, yet I am too much a lover of glory, to suffer him to triumph over thee by thy self, or that he should be Master of thy Dominions and thy life, by an effect of thy will, rather than by the strength of his Arms. Go by the valour which hath rais'd thee above other men: Go and defend thy country against a World of enemies, which come to overwhelm thy Territories, go and defend thy life against so many Princes, whom the hope to possess Rosamond hath rendred thine enemies. Thou wilt defend it well, without doubt, if fortune be not contrary to thee; or if thou dost fall by their Arms, I can without shame then receive a revenge and a victory, I shall hold no longer from thy self.

Rosalind spoke in this manner, and the King who listned to her without being touch'd with other motions than his love, beholding her with those eyes which spoke his passion better than his tongue could do it; "Cease great Princess (said he) to mantle under an apparent generosity, a true cruelty; and since pity bears no part in what you do, content your self with your revenge, without seeking farther glory in the loss of a Prince who dies for you. I might defend possibly with sufficient valour this unfortunate life against which you arm so many enemies, it it were not odious to you; but since you desire my death, I will not at all defend my life against those you shall send to give it me, but will present my breast with too much joy to the swords of Balamir, of Gondioch, and of all those that shall be own'd by you. But if it be true (replied the Princess, with a behaviour which denoted some constraint of her humour) if it be true that thou lovest me, at thou wouldst persuade all the World, and as in despite of my self, I must persuade my self, couldst thou see with so much joy, that Balamir and that Gondioch possessors of Rosalind by the death of Pharamond? Or if thou lookest upon them as thy Rivals, wilt thou abandon to them together with thy life, that prize thou oughtest at the price of thy very life to dispute with them? I cannot dispute it with them (replied Pharamond) since all hopes of it is taken from me; nor shall I see them enjoy it, since it is by my death alone they can obtain it: but I ought indeed to consent, since you desire it, and since you your self so order it. Why dost thou not rather believe (said she with a demeanour extremely passionate) that nothing can be more cruel to me, than this fortune of thy Rivals? for amongst them, I see nothing worthy of me, and possibly none but thy self amongst men could merit Rosalind, if thy ill fortune or perhaps her's had not oppos'd it self: This is possibly a truth I have believ'd I might confess to thee without offending my self; and to this confession I will add, that if it be true thou lovest me, and that thy love gives me some power over thee, I not only desire that thou shouldst live to deprive thy Rivals of their hopes to possess Rosalind, but I order it thee by all the dominion I have over thee.

Finishing these words, she made a sign to Cloderic, to lead forth the King; and at the same instant she passed into her Closet, without permitting her self to be longer seen. The King, whose spirit was repleat with those things he had seen and heard, and who believ'd he had found matter for new reflections, and perhaps subject to make new judgments on his fortune, followed Cloderic without thinking what he did; having abandoned himself entirely to those thoughts which possess'd him, permitted himself in this posture to be again mounted into the Chariot, which cross'd many by ways, and found himself forth of the City (by the power which Cloderic had to cause the Gates to be open'd at all hours) before he perceiv'd himself to be out of the Court. At about a thousand paces from the City, we found horses that attended us; and Cloderic having caused us to mount them with some men to guide us, told the King that he had order from the Princess to accompany him till such time as he were in some place of security; and that if he thought it fit, he would not forsake him till he were forth of the Land of the Cimbrians. The King thank'd him, as much as the importance of the service could merit, and much more without doubt, than he could hope from a man whose life was odious to him: and Cloderic having now liberty to entertain him, told him that the Princess having resolv'd, from the first moment in which he had been arrested, to deliver him from that danger to which he had expos'd himself, had therefore taken him out of the hands of Briomer, and committed him into his. That the rigor which he had in his guard, was to no other end but to deceive Briomer, and blind him from any suspicion he might have of the truth: That the third day, the Princess had found means to send him to the King her Father, to confer with him, as well about his imprisonment as other affairs of State; and in effect to prevent all obstacles his stay might probably have caused: That after his departure, being returned from Lisurgis to the City, and having sent for Cloderic, she had open'd to him (as to a man who was truly her creature) her design to save the King of the Franks, whose life would be in great danger, if the orders of the Cimbrian King were attended, or the return of Briomer, though he had not expos'd himself to death, but for the love he bore her: That as he had a great veneration for the Princess, and was bound to her for all things; he willingly offer'd himself to perform all she desir'd, and stoop his eyes to all things he might fear, either for his fortune or his life, from the anger of the King her Father; and that to render her the service she desired more entirely, he would manage this affair with so much security, that the King could never know she had any part in it; to which intent, he made the Guards retire by a sign'd order of the Cimbrian King's; and observ'd all those other necessary cautions, that he was assur'd, that all the hatred of this action would fall upon him, and the Princess not be in the least suspected.

To this discourse of Cloderic, the King return'd great marks of his acknowledgments, telling him, that since he had been so willing to hazard his fortune for his safety, he might not only escape from the anger of his King by retiring, if he pleas'd, with him into Franconia; but that he would there establish him in such honours, that he should have no cause to repine at those he had lost. Cloderic accepted the retreat which he offered him, believing well that during the Reign of the King of the Cimbrians, there would be but little security for his life, in the lands under his obedience; and the King no longer doubting but he might discover many things to him, pray'd him to give some orders for the security of Albimer, whom he had with his Esquires left at his Sisters house. Cloderic lead us cross the Fields: and because that way he made us follow, was not the ordinary Road, but brought us nigh to the house of Brasilda, he sent one of his men in whom he had an entire confidence, with an order to Albimer and the Esquires, to come to a place by which we were to pass, and which was not far distant from whence we then were.

All things were executed as the King desired, and the Messenger having pursued his way with great diligence, return'd with Albimer and the Esquires to the place appointed, before we arriv'd there. The King was deliver'd from a great trouble, seeing Albimer, from whom he understood, that upon advice which Luciana had given, he had in such manner conceal'd himself and the Esquires, that no person had knowledge of them. Afterwards Cloderic made us pursue our journey more warily, though he believ'd that the Princess being Mistress of Marobuda, and Briomer being absent, no person would endeavour to pursue the King.

As for my Prince, he now fix'd his thoughts entirely on the remembrance of the words and the action of the Princess, and found he had so much reason to comfort up himself that he appear'd to us wholly different from what he had been before his imprisonment, and seem'd not to have preserv'd any of those thoughts which had so much tormented him; he open'd now his soul to other thoughts more pleasing, and which could before find no place in his breast; for he not only believ'd that the hatred of Rosamond was not so violent as it had till then appear'd, but he imagin'd that he had reason sufficient to believe, that if the misfortunes of his life had not oppos'd themselves, he might have been belov'd by the Princess. The words she had spoken, much confirm'd him in this hope; and though from her proceeding he could not draw consequences so favourable as to assure himself of her love, yet she had made him at least know, that she had no inclination to render his Rivals more happy than himself; and that that same Balamir, whose merit made him formidable above all others, was not much advanc'd in her affections, though he might be in her esteem. This knowledge return'd a joy in his spirit, of which it had not for a long time been capable; and returning with his joy all his fierceness into his soul, made him begin to think seriously what he owed to the defence of his Country, the preservation of his glory, and the confusion of his Rivals. I will live (said he) since Rosamond hath ordain'd it, and I will live to dispute with my Rivals even till death, that felicity to which I am not suffer'd to aspire. I shall however be less miserable, if I can hinder them from being happy; and I hope it shall be with the best part of their blood, I shall make those rash ones buy the head of Pharamond: Rosamond doth consent, Rosamond doth desire it; and Rosamond doth command it by all the power she hath over me.

He now made a reflection on those last words of Rosamond; and he found something so charming for him in that claim she had made of her power, and in the obliging manner with which she made use of it, that he believ'd he could no longer with justice complain of his condition. You may believe, my Lord, that Cloderic and my self, who were present at all that pass'd at that interview, were not wanting to set all advantages before his eyes, and relieve his hopes by all the consequences we could draw in his favour.

These and such like discourses spent the time during our journey; and before we entred into Franconia, we found in him a considerable change. The fame of his being taken, was arriv'd before him in the Countries under his Dominion; and as he was belov'd by his people with the most ardent affection subjects could bear their Prince, this cruel news had caus'd a general mourning. The Princess his sister was half dead; Sunnor and the other Princes, having the same moment sent to demand assistance of all their Allies, gathered Forces on all sides; and Charamont, who receiv'd the first report on the Frontiers, where according to his orders he had stay'd, prepar'd all things for War, with a care and diligence diligence admirable. But both the one and the other, receiv'd the good news almost as soon as the ill; and scarce had they resent'd the griet of his imprisonment, but they were comforted with the news of his liberty, and by the sight of their Prince, which transport-ed them with an immoderate joy.

You will content your self, my Lord, that to abbreviate a long recital, I should pass over particulars of little importance; and that I leave your self to judge what so dear and so desired a sight could produce in the minds of Polixena, Suannon, Priam, Basogastus, and so many other illustrious persons, who judg'd their entire felicity to consist in the fortune of their Prince. If they were satisfi'd with his return, they were no less with the marks they receiv'd of his affection, by caresses full of sweetness and tenderness; and their satisfaction was so much the greater, because they believ'd to see in his person a part of that change they had so long desired.

Polixena, to whom the King open'd his whole heart with a tender consolation, understood from his own mouth all that had befall'n him; and she endeavour'd not a little to draw from that adventure the most advantagious consequences he could desire: but he was not a little discontented at the absence of Prince Marcomire, whom he believ'd he should have found in Franconia; and fearing lest some accident was befall'n him, or lest possibly he should again be fall'n into the power of his enemies, he suffer'd for him a perplexity from which he could not free himself, though we represented to him, that he could neither be retaken or slain by the Cimbrians, but that we should have receiv'd some advice of it, either after his departure, or whilst he was amongst them.

The first days were devoted to rejoycings for so happy a return, of which from the highest to the very meanest among the people, the whole Kingdom gave extraordinary demonstrations; and soon after, all things were prepar'd to sustain that cruel War which attended us. As the puissance of so many Kings was threatned to invade us, Pharamond believ'd that the assistance of all his Allies would be necessary; and to this purpose he neglected not to send to all places from whence he believ'd he might receive assistance. And Fortune so order'd that either by the Orders he left at his parting, or by the Messengers from the Frontiers sent by Ibere and Genebaud, all things were extremly forwarded, and a great part of the people already in Arms, and ready to march for his service,

His fair reputation, and so many great virtues, by which he had gained the hearts of all the world, arm'd in his favour, not only those of his neighbours, who had been always joyned in the Alliance with him, and those who had remain'd neuters against him and his enemies in his first Wars, but even those who had carried Arms against him in favour of the Romans as the Latobriges, the Carithinens, the Tulinges, Belannes and Cennauns, and many others, now took up Arms in his quarrel, towards the streams of Rhine and Danube; and on that side of the Sea next the Frisons, the two Provinces of the Cauches joyned themselves to the Franks; so that all the Provinces which are encompassed by the Sea of Rhine, and Visurgues, and all those which extend to the Helvetians, the Lake Leman, and the Mountains which serve as Bulwarks to Italy, gathered together their forces for his assistance.

Yet he believ'd not all this power great enough to bear head against that of so many Kings as came to invade him; he therefore prepar'd to send to King Gunderic, who a little before had made himself Master of Hispania Betica, from whence you, my Lord, once before chas'd him; and to that valiant Agilmond King of the Lombards, whose reputation and adventures are so great, and who with so much valour hath founded a Monarchy in the fairest part of Italy. Remembring, that all these Princes had demanded his Alliance for the common liberty, and had offer'd him all their forces. But in the mean time, he understood that all the people which among the Gauls compos'd that part of France, over which his Ancestors had always reign'd, and who by the death of their King Marcomire, of whom I have spoken to you in the beginning of my Discourse, were fall'n into the power of the Romans, in brief, those very people, the Crown and Dominion over whom did by a long order of succession lawfully appertain to him, and for the Conquest of whom he had prepar'd in his very infancy to pass the Rhine, having now made use of the disorders of the Empire to regain their liberty, had taken Arms, and not only driven the Roman Garrisons out of their Cities, but with a powerful Army came to seek their lawful King, and were already approached the Banks of the Rhine, to call him to the possession of that fair Crown which attended him.

Pharamond, in whom a desire to overcome his enemies was now very strongly establish'd, praised the Gods for this happy encounter, which made his people submit to him at a time when he was not in a condition to endeavour a Conquest, to which he had been called from his his very birth, and had sent them now to his succour when their assistance was so necessary: and not doubting but that to make them in this pressing necessity, he ought to assist them in their passage over the Rhine, he advanc'd towards that River with a part of his Troops; and coming to the Banks thereof in the Country of the Jubons, little distant from this, and very near to the place where the Moselle encreases with its plentiful water the Rhenish streams, he caus'd Bridges of Boats to be made, on which these Gauls, the ancient subjects of his Fathers, or rather the true Franks or French, pass'd the Rhine, and joyning with us, saluted their Prince with acclamations full of joy, conjuring him to come and take possession of the Scepter of his Progenitors.

These people were led and commanded by the Princes of the Royal Family, and by others who willingly submitted themselves to him, though till that time they had refused to acknowledge any other power but their own. The Princes of the Royal Blood were Pharabert, Antenor and Dagobert; and with these came Heribert chief of the Islanders of Gallia Belgica; Sigeric, to whom a part of the Celts did obey, Rithimer, Nicanor, Richer, Betrer, Sovereign Princes of many fair Provinces among the Gauls, and many other illustrious persons, who almost all had the honour to salute you. They were all considerable both by their birth and virtue. The Army which they conducted was compos'd of more than sixty thousand men.

The King receiv'd them with a Royal nobleness, as well by reason of his natural sweetness and innate civility, as for the obligation he had to those persons who came with so much generosity to offer him a flourishing Crown, to the conquest of which, the unhappy estate of his affairs suffer'd him not to employ himself, and for the succour they gave him in so urgent a necessity. But if he were oblig'd to them who came to call him to the inheritance of his Ancestors, you ought to believe him more bound to those, who having never been subject to his Progenitors, as Rithimer, Sigeric and Nicanor, came to submit themselves to this Empire, giving him hope by their example that the rest of the Gauls would do the same. He was not therefore wanting to testify his resentment by all the marks of kindness he could possibly shew; and by so fair a beginning, he gave them reason to hope all sorts of happiness and satisfaction under his Reign; but in the end, he represented unto them those misfortunes which hindred him from repassing the Rhine with them, to go and receive that Crown they presented him, praying them to suffer him to do what he ought to do in the defence of his Country, of his honour and of his life, which an infinite number of enemies had in few days design'd to assault.

Both the French Princes, and the Princes of the Gauls, which had accompanied them, were sensibly apprehensive of the discourse of the King, testifying to him, that it was upon the report, which had reach'd their Countries, of the war which the King of the Sueves carried into Franconia, that they had put themselves in Arms to come and serve him with all their Forces; that not only they would not refuse to perish with him even to the last of their men, but if it were necessary to make greater Levies in their Countries, they assur'd him that they had yet many more thousands of men ready for his service.

The King thanked them, and treated them with a freedom which absolutely gain'd their hearts; and seeing himself strengthened with this powerful relief, he march'd towards that City before named Heleopolis, but which from this time began to bear the appellation of Franckfort, seated upon the Mein, as well as Peopolis, where the Forces of the Saxons, the Carithinens, the Latsbriges, and all the other Provinces which from the Mein extend even to the feet of the Alps, and to the Helvetians, were to rendezvous; whilst Priam and Ibereg gather'd the Forces together out of the Country of the Sicambres, that of the Srisons, the Cauches and other nations, which from Visurgues and the Ocean inhabit as far as Franconia.

In sum, my Lord, to abridge to you this discourse, all the Army rendezvous'd at the places appointed; and the King having made a general conjunction, entred into Franckfort, where he caus'd those that came from the Coast of the Helvetians and Artannum to pass the Mein, and where Priam having conducted those he had levied towards the Coasts of the Sea, he saw himself at the head of more than sixscore thousand Footmen, and above forty thousand Horse.

This diligence was indeed necessary to prevent that of his enemies: for his Forces were scarcely assembled, when those of the King of the Cimbrians appear'd at the Banks of the Mein, and began to enter into the Country of the Nertereans which were subject to Pharamond. With the King of the Cimbrians march'd Godegesile King of the Herules, Ardaric King of the Alanes, Odoacer King of the Basternes, and Amalaric King of the Turingsiens, all four lovers of Rosamond, and all four inflam'd with a desire to conquer, and hopes to merit her by the ruine of Pharamond: their Army was compos'd of more than two hundred thousand men; and the belief that the King of the Cimbrians had, that Pharamond would not be so readily in a condition to sustain this power, had made him to advance without attending the Army of the King of the Sueves, or that of Gondioch, who were to joyn together at the foot of the Mountains of Mellibor, and enter into Franconia by the river of Viforgues, and by the Country of the Gatti.

But though the King of the Cimbrians was followed by four Kings, brave, valiant and zealous after the death of Pharamond, that which was more formidable to him than all the power of the enemy, was the Princess Rosamond her self, whom the King her Father would lead in his Army to animate her lovers by her presence to the ruine of their Rival. It was said that she took this Journey with much reluctance; but she was forced to obey the will of the King her Father, as the Princess Albifinda was forced to yield to the King of the Sueves, and to keep her company.

As Gondioch by reason of the wounds which he had receiv'd from Balamir, and the obstacle which the past enmity did for some time give, was receiv'd the last into this Alliance; so he came last into the war: and the King of the Sueves, though he was animated against Pharamond with a hatred not at all inferior to that of the Cimbrian King, having had by reason of the change of Prince Viridomar his Son, and by other affairs which fell out, very great hindrances, resolv'd to attend Gondioch, who was to pass by the Confines of his Kingdom, and to form with him another body of an Army of more than sixscore thousand men.

A power so formidable might have made Pharamond tremble, if he had been capable of fear: but by the greatness of his courage, he understood without any terrour the knowledge of those preparations, and prepared to answer worthily the opinion which all the world had of him, and preserve generously that high reputation, which he had acquir'd through the whole world. However, as he would neglect nothing in a time wherein all was necessary to his advantage, he would not hinder that the Princes of the Gauls, which were come to his assistance, should send to make other Levies in their Countries, as they had offered; and besides he hearkned to the counsel of his friends, who advis'd him to send to the King of the Lombards, and to the King of the Vandals, as himself had before propos'd.

He judg'd in the mean time, that he ought not to attend the arrival of the King of the Sueves and Gondioch; but since he must fight with the enemies Army, he should do it before, by this conjunction, they were become sufficiently powerful to overwhelm without any resistance any thing durst oppose them: He marched then, though much less in number than they, with a confidence in his valour, and in the justice of his cause, which permitted him not to fear the events of the fight; and he found himself strengthened in such sort, by the command which Rosamond had given him to fight his Rivals, and dispute with them that Fortune to which they ought to raise themselves by his ruines, that he could not think of them, but with a disdain which presaged him the victory. Balamir was the only person he would not dispute, both by reason of the great actions fame reported him to have done, and by the proofs himself had seen of his valour: but besides that he had only his single person to offer against him, he knew that at present he was not in the enemies Army, and that his wounds were not so well cured at the departure of the King of the Cimbrians, to permit him to accompany him.

The enemies had left the River Meine, and the City of Menofgade, on their left hand; and being without much difficulty become Masters of those passages which were guarded by the Troops left by Charamont on the Frontier, they had cross'd almost all the Country of the Nertereans, which they had in all places laid waste, when we arrived very near them, to hinder their advancing farther without fighting. The King of the Cimbrians, though he knew himself the stronger fearing the valour and fortune of Pharamond, by the proofs he had already made of it, would willingly have deferred the Battel till the arrival of the King of the Sueves, and the King of the Burgundians; by whose assistance he hoped to over press us, and irrecoverably ruine us. But the lovers of Rosamond, impatient of occasions to signalize themselves in her service, and not willing that Gondioch, of whose glory they were possibly envious, should have a part in the expected success of that Battel, they press'd him with violence to resolve; and Pharamond, who knew well that if he gave it not now, he should be no more in a condition to do it, and that he had not Forces able to oppose those who would fall upon him, if he did not in part weaken them whilst they were divided, acted with so much vigour and good conduct, that the enemies had not the power to shun the combat, though they had had a design to do it.

It was then in that vast Plain that is between Pheuzarum and the Country of the Nertseans, that these two puissant Armies came to battle, and cover'd the field with the greatest number of combatants, that possibly Germany ever saw in one fatal day. My Prince put now in practice all that he had learnt in past occasions, not forgetting any thing in the order of the Combat, or in the disposal of his Troops, of all that which could be known to the most experienc'd Captains: he had that day divided his Army into four bodies, of which himself commanded the first, the three others being led on by Sunnon, Priam and Pharabert: Ibere, Meroveus, Rithimer, and Charamont, commanded four bodies of Cavalry, appointed to the assistance of the four great ones. I ought to extend my self on the recital of this battle, more than I have done in all others my Prince hath fought, in regard this was the most considerable, for the number of combatants, for importance of events, and for the memorable actions of Pharamond, who did things without doubt beyond belief or very imagination: but the fear I have to prove too tedious to you, by the recital of so many Combats, and the belief I have that this day hath been sufficiently famous to be known to the greatest part of the world, shall make me pass over these particulars which I could recount you, to tell you, that it was not the French and their Allies which fought against the Cimbrians and those of their party, but that it was Pharamond, who combated the Lovers of Rosamond, and who at this time appeared not a mortal man.

Both Armies had already on all sides charg'd each other, and by the admirable order which the King provided among his own, the disadvantage of the number prov'd not disadvantageous to him; when leaving at the head of his body Basogastus and Geneband (whom he had purposely kept by him, to command in his place, when he should be oblig'd to succour some other quarters) he flew through all parts of the Field, to animate with his presence those to whom it was thought necessary, or rather to carry Victory through all: And by the care he took to succour those that were weaken'd, to whom a hundred times that day he led assistance, with a diligence which cost the lives of five or six horses, he serv'd his Army more than a re-enforcement of fifty thousand men could have done. In all his actions, appearing and shewing himself in all parts like lightning, or rather as a Comet bloody and fatal to his enemies, he on all sides call'd with a loud voice to the lovers of Rosamond, bidding them perform their promises. There was perhaps more than one of them this day repented themselves of their presumptuous enterprise, and felt themselves tremble under their Arms at the sight of so terrible an enemy, though they were Valiant, nay more, Enamoured and fought almost in the sight of Rosamond.

Ardaric and Codegesile, with the Herules, and the Alains, maintain'd an equal fight against the Gauls which Pharabert commanded, and that body conducted by Meroveus, which sustained them: and Odoacer on the other side, in the head of the Frisons, against the Salians, and the people neighbouring on the Sea, who were under the conduct of Sunnon: when Amalaric having with some Squadrons of Cavalry which followed him, pierced the Sicambres, who fought in the body commanded by Priam, turning to the other side with a fierce countenance, which he drew from some appearance of Victory, beheld Pharamond with a great body of Cavalry, who flew to sustain the Sicambres, whom he had seen in disorder. Amalaric could not mistake Pharamond, who made himself known from others by too apparent signs: and Pharamond having understood that it was the King of the Turingiens his Rival, spurring his Squadrons against his, and running towards him with a threatening cry, whilst the enamour'd Amalaric advanc'd towards him with an assurance equal to his: when they were so near as to be understood by each other, Amalaric (cryed the King of the Franks) let us see if thy forces are equal to thy great design; and see here the head of Pharamond, which I bring thee. Amalaric answered not to Pharamond, but with a blow of his sword which he let fall on his head, which from thence glancing on his shoulder, gave him a light wound; but the point of Pharamond's prov'd more fatal, which passing under the arm which he had lifted up, pierc'd him quite to the other side, so that he fell depriv'd of life between his horses feet. Both the Franks and Turingiens, though from a different provocation, echoed forth great cries at the fall of Amalaric. And Pharamond, whom at another time, modesty would not have permitted to open his mouth after a Victory, fighting in this against his Rivals with more courage than ordinary, Neither shalt thou give my head to the King of the Cimbrians (said he) nor shalt thou possess Rosamond.

The death of Amalaric, and the sight of Pharamond, had caus'd so much fear in the Turingiens, that instead of charging those they had to oppose them as they begun, they first made a stand, soon after fell into disorder, and in the end abandon'd the Field to their enemies: from hence the King hasten'd to assist where necessity most requir'd; and having chang'd the face of the Combat, and given him the advantage in every place where he shew'd himself, he was conducted by the same Fortune which had made Amalaric lose his life, to the place where Odoacer with his Basternes fought against the Frisons and the Salians: and no sooner did he know him for one of his rash Rivals, who at the price of his head would merit Rofamond, but shewing himself to him, with an aspect full of fury: See here, Pharamond (cried he at a great distance) and see that head thou promisest to give Rofamond. Odoacer had no sooner known him by many formidable tokens, but judging that he had need of all his Arms against such an enemy, he took a Lance from one of his Esquires, and settling himself well in the saddle, he ran against Pharamond, with hopes to pass his Lance through his body. The King oppos'd it with his Shield, on which it broke in a hundred pieces: and my Prince, who was not at all shaken, receiving the blow with a sigh full of disdain; Wherefore (said he) with so mean forces, so great an enterprize? And at the same time turning to Odoacer, who came towards him with his sword in his hand, after he had receiv'd another blow, which did only glance on his Armour, he directed the point of his sword to his enemies's Viscer, and furiously spurring on his horse, made him tumble back over his Crouper, through a cruel wound, vomiting out his blood and soul together.

Thus was he in one only day, and by two blows of his own sword, freed from two of his presumptuous Rivals, who had engaged so lightly in a design so rash: and we were made to hope by a beginning so happy, that the others would have no more favourable success.

The death of Odoacer proved no less fatal to the Basternes, than that of Amalaric; and by the endeavours with which Pharamond and his Troop charg'd them, they were soon forc'd to yield the Victory to our side. But where Pharabert with the Gauls combated against Ardaric and Godegesile, fortune was a little different; and by the Valour of these two Princes, and the advantage they had in number over our men; they made them bend; and charging them yet more vigorously, they were about to yield to a general rout, when a Cavalier arm'd with very fair Arms, and who had not been seen at the beginning of the battle, calling to him some Squadrons of Cavalry which followed him with joy, so soon as he had spoken to their Captains, he stopp'd by his words and example those who were ready to turn their backs; and having encourag'd them by the fair actions they saw him do, he led them to the Combat with so much vigor, that those who before had made them yield ground, were now no more able to stand before them; but Godegesile himself, who in person combated in that place, having receiv'd some wounds from a hand so powerful as made him stagger in his Saddle, was constrain'd to yield, and quit the field with his Goths and Herules. The Valiant person who had put them to flight, carried his assistance against Ardaric with the same success; and strengthened by the arrival of Ibere, who with the Cavalry which he commanded, was come to the same place, he charg'd the Astians and their King with a valour so extraordinary, that as well as Godegesile, he constrain'd him to abandon the Victory.

In the mean time, Pharamond had done overcoming on that side, where the main body of the enemies Army fought under the command of the King of the Cimbrians, and under Briomer; who not permitting his King to expose himself to the greatest dangers, having left him in the middle of a Troop of valiant men, who had nothing to take care of, but the defence of his person, he perform'd all the duties of a General, and acquitted himself both like a valiant and experienc'd Captain. But he in vain made resistance against the Valour and Fortune of the King of the Franks; for he beheld with infinite grief, or rather with some transportations of rage, his first Battalions turn their backs to those that charg'd them, and the Franks with their great King carrying through all parts, disorder, terror and death.

To what end should I enlarge farther? In fine, my Lord, Victory extended it self in our favour, through all parts of the Field, and the whole Plain was in a little time seen covered with dead bodies, floating in blood. Pharamond in his Victory having nothing for which he was more solicitous than the safety of the Cimbrian King, made proclamation through all his Army, to leave him a free passage and retreat, and take as much care for the preservation of his life, as they could do for his own: but he was not long time in this trouble, for by the care he continually took to inform himself, he learn'd in the end, that seeing the general rout of his Army, and being no longer able to stop it, he was retir'd with a small number of his to a little City behind him, which he had some days before made himself Master of, and where he had before the battle left the Princesses.

Pharamond understood this news with no small joy; and finding that care over, he obtain'd

tain'd the fairest and most glorious victory that had for many ages been gain'd in Germany. It had been much more bloody than it was, if the King had not made proclamation that they should spare the lives of the Subjects of Rosamond, or if the night arriving soon after, had not deliver'd them from the fury of those whom their distance from the King permitted not to be partakers of his clemency. The advantages of this Battel remain'd to us so entire, that for ten thousand of ours which were killed, the enemies lost near one hundred thousand; amongst whom might be counted two great Kings, and a great number of their principal Officers: and that formidable Army, which the day before seem'd to threaten and make all Europe tremble, in one single day was reduced to the one half of its strength.

To the joy which the King had for so great a victory, was added another as great as he could possibly receive, by the sight of that valiant Cavalier, who by the assistance he had given to the Gauls, and to Meroveus against Ardaric and Godegesile, had so powerfully contributed to the success of the Battel, and who being presented to the King, who had earnestly demanded for him, was known for Prince Marcomire, whose absence had caused so much grief and perplexity. You may believe, my Lord, that the King shewed all the kindness he could to a Brother so worthy of his affection and esteem, and that he testified a joy so much the greater, by how much he was before cruelly tormented for him. All the Princes, and all other considerable persons, took part in the return of the Prince, and all the world gave him those praises which were due to the great actions he had that day done.

The King was still welcoming him, and informing himself of his adventures, when a great number of considerable prisoners were brought before him, and in the head of the rest he was presented with Eriomer: the sight of this implacable enemy, who had twice carried his Sword to the breast of the King, and from whose hands Rosamond had with so much difficulty rescued his life, gave some joy to Pharamond, and mov'd the Prince his Brother, less patient than he, to anger; but it made the King neither lose his sweetness nor modesty, but receiving him with a countenance which had nothing of an enemy in it: Briomer (said he) Fortune hath been contrary to you, but you ought to pardon the injury she hath done you, since she hath not expos'd you to a greater misfortune, than that of receiving kindness from the man you hate. Briomer expressed his anger by his silence, not answering at all to the words of Pharamond: but the King ceas'd not to care for him, till by his continued civilities he oblig'd him to speak: I confess (said he at length) that you are great and generous: but after an injury you have done me, for which I can never receive reparation, I counsel you to take away my life, if you will assure your own. I shall rather diligently endeavour to preserve it (replied the King with a sigh) and if by my misfortune I have done you any injury, I shall endeavour to make you lose the remembrance, and to gain the friendship of a man who hath so much fidelity for the blood of Rosamond.

Finishing these words, he sent him back with all those had been taken with him, giving them a convoy to conduct them to the place where the King of the Cimbrians was retired, to whom with the prisoners he likewise sent the bodies of the two Kings, with a liberty to take away all those to whom the Cimbrians would give Burial.

Pharamond without doubt might have put an end to the defeat of the enemies Army, if he would have renewed the combat on the morrow: Nor was it so well secured by the City whither the Cimbrian King was retired, but that by siege of that place, it had been easie to force them to come to a second Battel; but he could never dispose himself to it, and protested openly, that whatever should arrive, he would not go to assault the Father of Rosamond, especially in a place where she her self in person was. This consideration, of which he could not repent himself, was the cause of no small damage to him: for the night following, the Army of Gondioch, and the King of the Sueves came to meet, to whom the Cimbrians had sent a dispatch, and having passed the Forest Gabretz, which borders on the Country of the Nertereans, joyned with theirs, and not only made it stronger than ours by fifty thousand men, but fortified it in the person of Gondioch with a Captain, who in good conduct and experience in war yielded to few Captains in the world.

This increase of the enemies power, which however was no more than we expected, made it appear with how much reason the King had given Battel; and because we were forced to remove our Camp, as well by reason of the infection which a great number of bodies which could not easily be interred, might give to our Army, as to encamp our selves where we might live more commodiously than in that place where the want of water permitted us not to stay, we retired towards the Rhine, and pitch'd our Camp in such manner, that both leaving the River as a Bulwark behind us, and enjoying all the conveniences we could receive, we secured Peapolis, Franckfort, and a good part of the Country from the incursions of our enemies.

Hitherto Pharamond had reason to believe, that he had by no action augmented the hatred of Rosamond, and having only stood in his own defence as she had commanded him, she would in all likelyhood persevere in those thoughts she expressed at his parting from her. But Fortune would that the King of the Cimbrians, seized with a mortal grief for the loss of the Battel, or rather not being able to resist the rage which transported him for the ill success of his enterprize, not only stopt his ears to all those consolations which the Princess his Daughter, or his friends endeavour'd to give him, but refus'd to receive any nourishment that day, or so much as suffer that a slight wound which he received by the shot of an Arrow should be dress'd; tormenting himself in such sort, that the day following he was seized with a very violent Fever. And as he disdain'd those remedies they would have applic'd, but persevered in his affliction, and his passion, his Fever became more strong; so that when by the arrival of the King of the Sueves and Gondioch, he might hope to redeem the loss he had suffer'd, he was reduc'd to such a condition, that his Physicians began to fear his life. The Princess his Daughter, and the Kings his Allies, caus'd him to be serv'd with infinite diligence; but all their assistance prov'd vain: for his malady that was grown too matterless for all remedies, took away his life the seventh day after the Battel.

He yielded up his life into the arms of Rosamond; nor dying, took he any oher care but to recommend his death to her revenge, of which he accus'd only Pharamond; threatening her with the fury of the gods, and the detestation of men, if ever she releas'd her self of that promise to pursue him to death. The Princess pouring down tears before him, promis'd to perform what he enjoyn'd, though without doubt she detested that obstinate cruelty which accompanied him to his Tomb. Yet the King of the Sueves, who was present, and whose inclinations were not more tender than those of the Cimbrian King, nor his resentment less violent, engag'd her by new protestations to the union they had made to the ruine of Pharamond.

So soon as the King was dead, she was saluted by the Cimbrians as their Queen, and declar'd Sovereign of the Tentons, Cimbrians and Bohemians, as her Predecessors had been; but her grief was such, both for the loss of her Father, and possibly for those things to which she was engag'd, that for many days she was not sensible of any thoughts but those of deploring her misfortunes. Pharamond was ready to dye with grief when he understood this news; not that he found any subject of affliction in the death of a man who after death it self made war against him, but he judg'd well, that innocent as he was, he was condemn'd to suffer the greatest punishment; and that since by his misfortune he dyed making war against him, and that it was reported that a slight wound he received in the Battel might have contributed, he should be look'd upon by Rosamond, if not as the authour, at least as the cause of his death.

He confirm'd himself more strongly in this belief, when he understood the particulars, and the protestations which the King of the Sueves and he had exacted from the new Queen of the Cimbrians. When the recital was made to him, lifting his eyes to Heaven, and permitting himself to fall on a seat that was near him; Alas (said he) can there this misery rest for me still to prove? and must I wish so much innocency be eternally criminal? Oh Fortune! (continued he a little after, rising and walking leisurely) art thou then so favourable to me in Fights, to be so contrary to me in all those things that concern not my Honour, nor my Glory? Vain glory (continued he) importunate glory, which incessantly flies all repose, and which no felicity accompanies! shall I dedicate my intire life to you, and shall I not see some moments exempt from the cruelty of this merciless Fortune which so persecutes me?

His passion made him utter many things like to these, and he tormented himself all that day, whatever Prince Marcomire, and so many illustrious persons that were about him could represent to him; and on the morning calling Cloderic unto him, for whom he had ever reserv'd a great esteem, he commanded him to go with a Trumpeter to the Camp of the enemies, to speak to the Queen of the Cimbrians, if that Honour might be permitted him (as he might hope, since he was her Subject, and one of those the most considered) and in testifying to her the great share he took in her grief, to represent to her how far he was from rejoycing at the misfortune which caused her to shed those tears; and to offer her anew for victime to the Manes of the King her Father, that life which she had hitherto refus'd, which he had not preserv'd and defended but by her commandment, and which he was ready to abandon more willingly than ever to the Ministers of her revenge.

Cloderic

Cloderic being thus amply instructed from the King, departed from our Camp towards that of the Cimbrians; and as we understood at his return, he not only saw the Queen in that profound perplexity which was observ'd in her habit, and in all her person, in the middle of a great company of Princes and other illustrious persons which environ'd her, and who look'd upon her as their Sovereign, or rather as their goddess; but notwithstanding that grief which possess'd her, he was very well receiv'd, and had all the liberty he desired to discourse with her of what he had in charge. Rosmond wept while he spoke, and when he stopp'd, drying her eyes to return him an answer, Cloderic (said she) of force I must perish, or Pharamond must perish; these are not my inclinations, but it is my cruel destiny which commands it, and it is to my destiny I must yield obedience, and not to my inclinations: Pharamond is not guilty, but he is unfortunate; and though I am not criminal, I am no less unhappy. The gods which oppose themselves to his intentions, are perhaps no more favourable to mine; but since they so visibly have foreseen their will, we must necessarily submit to it. Bid him prepare himself as I am prepar'd, and tell him, that in assaulting his life, as I must assault it, it is my will that he defend it as I have ordain'd him.

Cloderic would have reply'd, but she would not that he should speak any more of Pharamond; though Cloderic believ'd by some outward signs in her countenance, that it was not without doing violence to her thoughts, that she declin'd her self from that discourse; and began another of Cloderic's proper interests, leaving him the liberty to stay with Pharamond, or to return to her Court, where she promis'd not only to re-establish him in his Estate and Offices, but to make his Fortune much better than it had been during the life of the King her Father.

This was what Cloderic reported to the King when he returned to our Camp; and by his discourse he knew not what judgment to make of his fortune, though Prince Marcomire still assured him that he had no reason to despair. On the morrow we understood that the enemies Army march'd directly towards us; and the day following we saw them come very near us, and encamp on the other side of the Segré, which is that little River you may behold from the windows of this chamber, and which taking its course from a little City, which from its name is call'd Segodunum, flows to discharge it self into the Rhine a little below Coken. After their arrival, we understood that all the Kings and Princes, of whose Forces this Army was compos'd, receiv'd their orders from the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, who by the commandment of the King her Father, and by the importunity of the King of the Sueves, was to await the end of the war; and that next to her, the other Kings had yielded the chief command to the King of the Sueves, as well because of his age, and the Forces which he conducted, as because he was the most concern'd, and most fervently fought the ruine of Pharamond.

Behold now, my Lord, what are the Adventures, and what is the present condition of Pharamond; I assure my self that you have found in his Fortune something more strange than what your imagination represented to you; and if you do not judge him the most miserable of all men, yet at least you will confess that his is a kind of misfortune so particular, that scarce the strangest Nations, or the most ancient of ages can furnish an example: His Actions are sufficiently heroick and noble, to give him a great name amongst the most famous men: And you must pardon me, my Lord, if I dare to say, that if his misfortunes had not thrown such obstacles in the ways of his glorious designs, he had not only establish'd himself in that fair Monarchy on the other side of the Rhine, to which he is call'd both by the Oracles of the gods, and the desires and hopes of men, but had possibly followed the tracks of more famous Conquerours, and been mounted by his valour and excellent virtues to a glory equal to theirs.

I confess (said Constance to Cleomer, seeing that he had made an end) that Pharamond is not only capable to exceed all mens hopes, but that nothing among men was ever greater than he. If his qualities were admirable, his fortune is no less prodigious; but though it be more extraordinary than mine, by the strange events which compose it, I see no reason to retract from what I have told him: and I do maintain yet, that my misery is greater than his, since all hopes are lost to me; but according to my opinion, he may yet hope.

Constance added many other words to this Discourse; and that of the Adventures of Pharamond, gave him sufficient matter to entertain a farther conversation with Cleomer, if the Frank, perceiving that the greatest part of the night was spent, and that in the the condition wherein he was, his health might be endanger'd by so long watching, after he had demanded pardon of him for the tediousness of the recital, and receiv'd from his civility the thanks he believed due to the pains he had taken, had not given him the good night, giving him liberty to dedicate to the remembrance of the Adventures he had heard, or to his proper misfortunes, those hours in which by his grief he was often depriv'd of sleep.

The end of the Second Part of
PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

The Third Part.

BOOK I.

He great courage of the King of the Franky made him impatiently suffer the power of his enemies in his own Territories; and though he was much weaker than they in number of men, yet he had without doubt sought occasion to fight them, if he had not respected the presence of Rosamond, who was in the head of them, and whom he durst not assault, though she had commanded him to defend himself. The remembrance of this command, which she had enjoyed with all her Authority, and which after the death of the King her Father she had reiterated by the mouth of Cloderic, joyned to the indignation he bare against his Rivals;

inspir'd him every moment to enterprize something against them, and made him often call for his Arms, to return upon their heads thunders more formidable than those wherewith they threatned his. But then casting his eyes on their Camp, and with them finding out the place where the divine Queen of the Cimbrians lodg'd, that place seem'd to him a place most sacred, which he could not behold without veneration; and having reason'd on all things which were permitted him, he laid aside his design of driving back the enemies Forces with all his, or opposing himself to all the enterprises of his Rivals, resolving only to hold the defensive part, without assaulting an Army which Rosamond in person commanded.

With this resolution he gave all orders necessary to avoid surprises, sending continually parties abroad, to discover the designs of his enemies, and oppose them if he saw necessary, giving orders to fight them in all places where they were any thing distant from Rosamond; and keeping himself continually in a condition to repulse them where-ever they should assault him. To come at him, they were of necessity to pass the Segré, which was scarce fordable, though it were a very little River; or take their march round by Segudunum, a little, but very strong City, defended by a good Garrison which he had placed there, and which might much annoy their passage; besides that they were oblig'd to shut themselves up between the City and a Mountain that was opposite to it, at the feet of which, they were to pass unavoidably, by reason of the difficulty to conduct their Chariots, their Baggage, and their Engines of War cross the Mountain which was sharp and rough.

Pharamond exercis'd his diligence as much as his cruel passion would permit him, as well to preserve a Glory acquir'd by so many famous Victories, as to defend his people, whom his particular quarrel expos'd to the calamities of war, and to oppose the unjust designs of those odious and rash Rivals, who would raise their Fortunes by his Ruines. But in the midst of these martial employs, his love more cruelly made war against him, than either the Cimbrians, the Sueves, or the Burgundians; and that which fear might have wrought in other spirits, for the event of a war so terrible, and which in all likelihood could not be ended but by a horrible effusion of blood: This passion, the enemy of his repose, wrought over his with an effect much more strange, and subjected him to all that grief which a Soul like his was capable to undergo. His wisdom and natural moderation supported him against a part of those transportations, which are ordinary in persons of his age, when assaulted by a violent passion: but that restraint they gave to the most impetuous motions, hindring them from appearing outwardly, did not divert the cruel effect they produc'd within, so that the Soul of that unfortunate Prince was miserably tormented by most sharp and doleful Sufferings; not but that in the midst of the most cruel ones that assaulted him, he found some minutes of consolation, and a very pleasing consolation it was, when he judg'd by the discourse, and by all the proceedings of the Queen of the Cimbrians, that it was not her inclinations that armed her against him; that notwithstanding all the injuries he had done her, he had attract'd her esteem above all other men, and that by the very confession of that divine Princess, if his ill fortune had not oppos'd, he had not only not been hated, but might have had hopes to have been preferred before all Princes in the world. The terms in which she had expressed her thoughts returned dayly to his memory, and the reflection she made on them, had sometimes so much power as to suspend in his Soul the remembrance of all his misfortunes, and give some access to that joy, from which for so long time past he had been miserably banished, but having devoted some few minutes to this flattering thought, in which he found both honour and comfort, he return'd to the sad knowledge of his misery, and though he well saw that he was esteem'd by Rosamond, he well foresaw that he could never be lov'd, that he could never be admitted to the honour to serve her, and that in sum, whatever advantages he might have over his Rivals, either by the events of war, or the esteem of Rosamond, he could never hope to be happy.

Ab vain appearance of felicity, (said he, when he was plunged into these sad considerations) why do you abuse me thus? or why do you not permit my grief to work its full effect, since you are not able to bring any change to my deplorable condition? I will believe, since I owe an entire belief to what those false lips utter, that it is not by her inclination, that Rosamond wages war against me; and I will likewise be perswaded, that if Fortune had not put so cruel difference between us, my Rivals had never had any advantage over me in the esteem of Rosamond. But alas! dost this belief make me less miserable? or can it make me forget, that though the inclinations of Rosamond were wholly favourable towards me, she will never make him happy, who hath spoil'd and laid waste her Dominions, by the loss of so many thousands of her Subjects, who, with his own hand, and before her eyes, slew her Brother; and whom she accuses to be the cause of her Father's death? Though she should forget all these injuries, though she should no longer hate me, nay, though she should love me, durst she, or could she with honour, give before the eyes of all the world, marks of affection to a man, whom the merciless rules of her Duty ought to render odious to her very Tomb? Ab, let us believe rather, as we have hitherto believed, not only that there was never any among all men miserable in a kind of misfortune like to ours, but that all the changes that can arrive in the world cannot add any increase of misery, more than my heart alreadyresents, and that not being able to cease to love, but by ceasing to live, I cannot cease to be miserable, but in my Tomb. He tormented himself ordinarily in this manner, not forbearing in the presence of many of his illustrious Friends, whom he saw concern themselves in his grief, he strove to dissimble it, making use of the greatness of his courage and moderation, to keep lock'd within his own breast the greatest part of what he felt.

After he was departed from the chamber of Constance, to leave him the liberty to understand from the mouth of Cleomer the recital of his Adventures, he betook himself into his Appartment, with the Princes and other great personages which followed him, where he entertained himself some time with them, consulting what orders he was to take to prevent the surprisals of the enemy. He gave charge to Nicanor and Diocles to draw a Line from the Segré to the foot of the mountain; and commanded Gustaldus and Ade-lard to seize on the straits of the mountain with some Infantry, with a design to raise there a little Fort to annoy the enemy, and guard that Post against all attempts. In fine, he conferred with Basogastus concerning the Government of the State, on whose prudence he relyed more than ordinarily, since his passion had clouded a part of his natural light, or at least hindred him from acting with an entire liberty. He advis'd with him so much the longer, because that day he was to return to Franckfort, and thence to Peapolis, from whence he was come some days before to confer with the King, and where he had left the Princess Polixena.

He gave in the end some orders to Charamont, what he would have done that day, and after went to visit Prince Marcomire, whose wounds, though slight, kept him yet in Bed for some days: but because he would entertain himself particularly with him, and that that he would understand things of which he had not time to speak to him but confidentially, since his return, he took an occasion to go alone into his Chamber. He found him in a very good condition, and the Prince told him, so soon as he enquired of his health, that it was only to obey him that he kept his Bed, but that if he would permit him, he would quit it to Morrow. Pharamond desir'd him not to prejudice his health by an unnecessary halt, and being seated by his Bed side, he had no sooner shew'd by his behaviour that he had a design to discourse with him privately, but they who were in the Chamber retir'd.

The King caress'd him with all the proofs he could give him of a most real affection, and certainly, all that affection was truly due to him, not only by reason of his blood, but for a thousand admirable qualities by which he might equal the most accomplish'd persons in the world, and which had appear'd with a fairer splendor if they had not been in part obscur'd by those of so great a Brother. His beauty scarce yielded to the beauty of the fairest Ladies, but though it appear'd a little too delicate for his Sex, there might be seen to sparkle in his eyes a Martial Vigour, and in all his Person something so lively, and so full of courage, that it was impossible to behold him with ordinary thoughts: His Stature and whole frame of person was admirably compos'd, though much inferior to that of the King his Brother, and there might be observ'd a freedom in all his Actions, which gave him the greatest grace in the world: His disposition was very pleasant, and full of admirable sprightliness, but he was less Patient than the King his Brother, though he was not more quickly incens'd than he was suddenly pleas'd. For his Valour, he might not only compare with the most Courageous, but might dispute with the God of War: Nor had he ever fear'd danger in those perils which had made the most hardy tremble, and therefore young as he was, he had signaliz'd himself in many Combats, in which he seem'd to be bred by the death of those Generals which he had slain with his own hand at his first taking Arms, and by a thousand other Heroick Actions, which had got him a most glorious share in the famous Victories of the King his Brother.

Pharamond knowing him in all things worthy that Illustrious Blood from which he was descended, lov'd him with a most particular tenderness, and that love which seem'd to have blotted out of his Memory all things but Rosamond, had not at all lessen'd the affection which he had conceiv'd for a Brother, who had merited so well. He gave him now many particular Assurances, and after some discourse, by which he open'd to him his heart, with all possible freedom, My Brother, said he, You know that since your return, we have not had one hour of time to entertain each other freely, but the Trouble of our affairs, and the Grief I have felt for those Miseries which by the death of the Cimbrian King were added to my Afflictions, have made us defer that which I am to learn of you, concerning those Adventures that beset you since our separation; not but that you have told me something, but it was so confusedly, and that little I have understood, seem'd to me so important, that I apprehended it with a great curiosity, and very much concern. I have prepar'd to devote so much of this day as shall be requisite, if your health will permit you without inconveniency, to make the recital; and because by the little I have known, I judge that you would not willingly communicate to other persons, that which our friendship may oblige you to tell me, I am come alone, as you see, to give you a more entire liberty. It is true My Lord, answered the Prince, I believe I have things to tell you may merit your Attention, and that for the little time I was absent from you, there beset me Adventures very considerable. I have still attended your will and your conveniency to make the recital, and since you desire it to day, I can obey you so much the more easily, my Wounds being in a condition to permit me to undergo a greater Travel than this; nor have I any sickness to obstruct a much longer discourse. At these words Pharamond calling some of the Attendants, and having given them Order to take care that they should not be interrupted, he testified to the Prince, his willingness to hear, and soon after the Prince began in these words:

The History of Marcomire.

I should be difficultly perswaded, My Lord, to recount to you, much more to confess to you those things which by the rules of Prudence ought to be condemned, if I did not know you would be favourable to me, and that you are too conversant with the Passion that hath caus'd them not to pardon the effects it hath produc'd. You have understood Sir, that by the Combat which I fought against Gondemar and his Burgundians, for the liberty of Albisinda, (though at the beginning I thought I had fought for that of Rosamond)

Amund) I was reduc'd to a condition which permitted me not to be glad for any advantage I had over my Enemy, and that after his fall, I scarce had time to stagger, as I may say, to the Chariot of the Princess, and to open my mouth to tell her she was free, but my strength (which was spent by the great quantity of blood which I lost,) forsook me in an instant, and I remain'd without sense and without knowledge, in the Arms of those that came to sustain me. You have known moreover, how the Princess of the Sueves, touch'd with Compassion at the sight thereof, and not willing to leave without succour a man, to whom she believ'd her self oblig'd for her Liberty, laying aside the fear she might have to incense the King her Father, by the effects of her pity and acknowledgment, caus'd me to be laid in her Chariot to conduct me to Egitina, whither she retir'd.

The Chariot drove on a great way, Before I regain'd my senses, and I have been told since, that whilst I lay in that condition, the Princess express'd both by her Countenance and Discourse, great marks of a true grief, forgetting nothing she could do to succour me. We were gone a good part of our way, and the Sun was ready to set, before I return'd to life, when passing near a Fountain, the Princess command'd to stop, and having caus'd some water to be fetch'd, order'd it to be cast several times in my face; those refreshments in the end procur'd the effect they desir'd, for by little and little I recover'd my senses, and open'd my eyes.

As for the present, my Knowledge not being return'd entirely, and my Memory later than my Knowledge; By a light which was yet clear enough to let me easily discern all Objects, I found my self with astonishment among the Ladies, and near a Lady whose beauty attend'd not the return of all my strength, to give me surprize and admiration. I beheld her very stedfastly, and as the effect of fair things is to please in what estate soever they appear to us, I remember I beheld her with delight, and though I could not well discern what I saw, yet in my weakness I felt somewhat that allur'd me in this sight, which agreeably flatter'd and comforted me. I held my eyes firmly fixt on that fair face, and I heard, though very confusedly, the sound of a Voice as sweet as the Air of all the person who desired to know how I did, and assur'd me of my recovery; when with my entire Knowledge, my Memory began to return, and recalling by little and little to my remembrance all that had befall'n me to the moment of my swoounding, I knew in the end that I was near the Princess of the Sueves, and had sufficient strength to discern her from the rest, by the fair marks I discover'd.

With this Knowledge, that of my Duty returning into my Senses, brought with it Respect and Confusion, and seeing with what real concernment that fair Princess employ'd her self to relieve me, I beheld with some shame the pains she took, and the irreverent condition wherein I lay before her: But as my weakness permitted me not to hinder the effect of her goodness, I testified to her at the beginning, by my looks, the regret I suffer'd it with, and a little after I open'd my lips, and began with a feeble voice, and a stammering discourse, to express to her the Confusion of my thoughts, when she impos'd me silence, praying me with a sweetness wholly Charming, not to use any force to my self which might hinder the effect of the design she had to endeavour the preservation of my life: I would yet have replied something, when she oppos'd me with more Authority, and I left to my eyes the care to speak for me, when they likewise fail'd to do me that kindness, and to rejoyce at the pleasing aspect which charm'd them, through the defect of day, which soon after quitted us.

Though in the condition I was, and considering the little time I had, I could not resent the entire effect of the Charms of the Princess Albisinda; it is most certain however, that I had begun to receive a sweet impression which from my eyes insensibly pass'd to my heart, and had sensibly fill'd it with an Idea, which had wholly possess'd me, and made me forget all other things. This was that which made me endure the Darkness with grief, and as truly I was not in a condition well to discern, or reason of what I saw, or what I felt, I lamented the loss of the day, without knowing whether it were the want of its light, or any other cause I ought to accuse: Alas! said I, with a voice feeble and trembling, What darkneses have deprived me of that fair day that shone upon me? Or who robs me of that Heavenly Object that recal'd me from my Tomb? At another time I should scarce have pronounc'd these words so boldly; but as I now was, I had not preserv'd all my Reason, nor all my Discretion, but I spoke without Consultation what my first motion made me utter.

It seem'd that the loss of this pleasing splendor, as well as the loss of my blood, caus'd a new weakness in me; for I fell into a second Swoound, ere the Chariot arriv'd at Egitina, tina, and out of which I came not to my self till after I was put into a Bed, and all assistances necessary given me by experienc'd persons. In effect, I understood afterwards, that this was the first care of the Princess Albisinda: And though she was come to a place, where the death of Theobaldus, whose Corps had been brought thither but some few hours before, put all things in Alarm, Disorder, and Confusion, yet she went not to the Princess Rosamond, whom so cruel an Accident had thrown into an Abyss of grief, till she had taken exact order for all things, without so much as confiding in any of my men, who had followed me, and on whose affection she might have relyed.

I can likewise speak it for truth, that the Princess of the Cimbrians, preserving in the depth of her affliction, and of her displeasure against you, her generosity still entire, not only order'd I should be serv'd according to my quality, and to the service I had done for Albisinda, but defended me by all her Authority against the fury of Briomer, who having lost his reason through the death of Theobaldus, would have extended to your blood that revenge he meditated against you. In effect, I have been inform'd, that it was not without some difficulty, that she hindred him from coming to stab me: And this furious man, incens'd by the obstruction he gave to his design, not being able to remain in the same City with the Brother of Pharamond, departed some few days after to find the King of the Cimbrians.

I was in my bed, between the arms of those persons who look'd to my wounds, and applied things necessary to them: When I recover'd out of my swoond, and that my blood being stopt, and those remedies they had given me having strengthned me, I came to my self, with more vigor and knowledge than I had the first time: I knew those of my men that were about me, and understood by what they told me, the place where I was, and the truth of what had pass'd. I had many great wounds, but by good fortune, none in any dangerous places, and those who took care of them, knowing that my weakness proceeded only from the quantity of blood I had lost, assur'd me that my life was not in any danger, and endeavour'd my Cure with infinite diligence. But instead of thinking of my self, I presently fought with my eyes for the fair Object which had smitten them so pleasingly some hours before, and I sigh'd not seeing it any more, through the pain I suffer'd in its absence: Yet I was forc'd to support it longer than I desir'd, and because the Physicians judg'd that I ought to apply the rest of that night to repose and silence, and all that day which succeeded it, I saw in my Chamber no other than the persons necessary to serve me: but the day following the Princess Albisinda came to visit me; accompanied only by two Ladies, whereof the one had been her Governess, and the other was Wife to the chief Officer of her Court. It seem'd to me that her arrival dissipat'd the Obscurity which was before in my Chamber, and I found Day enough to observe that Celestial beauty which had Charm'd me, and of which I had so dearly preserv'd the Idea. I felt likewise something at the same time which made me forget all my wounds, and by the various motions it rais'd in my Soul, I knew well I was become truly enamoured.

See here, Sir, the Confession which I have to make to you, and Fortune so order'd that having the honour of being your Brother, I should have a share in that destiny, which notwithstanding all cruel Obstructions, should make us love the Daughters of our Enemies, and that I should feel for the Sister of Vindimir, who lost his life by your hands, what you feel for the Sister of Theobaldus, who from you receiv'd his death. This Conformity or Union of Adventures, which seem'd to fix my Fortune to yours with a new Chain, or more particular interest, presented it self at that instant to my thoughts, and strengthned them against the sharpest difficulties, for the glory to encounter such as were common to you.

These were my thoughts, when the Princess having understood that my Fever was not violent, approach'd my bed, and whilst I beheld her with a Countenance wholly passionate, and that by my behaviour, rather than by my Words, I endeavour'd to thank her for the honour she did me, She sat down in a Chair which was brought her, and which was plac'd not at the head of my bed, but in a place directly oppos'd to my sight, and where without any Obstruction I might behold her. And looks were all I express'd my self by: For my Love, though in its infancy, had already gain'd such force, to tye my tongue at the sight of the Belov'd Object, to give me trouble and fear and to produce its ordinary effects.

The Princess for some time kept silence as well as I, but she unlock'd it first, and having demanded the condition of my health, looking towards me with an aspect full of tenderness; I doubt not at all, said she, but that by doing what I now do for you, I shall
expose

expose my self to the reproach of men, and to the anger of the King my Father: but those who shall condemn me for having visited, and for having diligently assisted the Brother of King Pharamond, might more justly blame me, if I abandon'd a Prince, who hath so generously expos'd his life for my defence, and who at the price of his blood hath restor'd me my liberty. And indeed it was at your own proper hands, that I have receiv'd this kindness; but it was from another hand, that we receiv'd the injuries which have been the Causes of the War between our Families, and for this reason I believe my self less oblig'd to the resentment of the Injury, than to the acknowledgement of the Service. However it may be, renown'd Prince, or however I may fear the opinion may be had of me, I come to testify to you the grief I have to see you in the condition you are reduc'd to for my sake, and to assure you of the desire I have to acquit my self of that I owe to you, by taking care of your preservation in a place where possibly all things are not favourable to you.

Albisinda spoke in this manner, and the time I had employ'd to hearken to her, having scatter'd a part of the trouble which my growing passion at the sight of her had rais'd in my mind, I found my self in a condition to answer her better than I hop'd, and beholding her with a passionate aspect; Madam, said I, neither do I believe I have merited your displeasure, nor am I worthy of the acknowledgment your goodness is pleas'd to testify: And as I am not ignorant of the injuries you have receiv'd from a Prince, whom his misfortunes only have made guilty; So the service I have done you is not of so great importance to hope that glorious recompense you afford it. Would to God, added I with a sigh, that it were possible for me to merit it by all the remnant of my blood, or that at the price of something more precious than this life, for the preservation whereof you design to employ your self, I could make you change the opinion you have of the House of the King of the Franks, into more favourable thoughts.

The thoughts I have of your House, replied the Princess, are not perhaps so distant as you think from what you can desire: And though I am not permitted to regard the King of the Franks, but as a man who both slew my Brother, and a Prince whom the will of my Parents had destin'd me for Spouse; Yet I have always been so just, as to discern the offences which flow from an obstinate will, from those which error or misfortune are the cause of: And if I can have this justice for the person of the King your Brother, you ought to judge that in yours, which I cannot accuse of any offence, I consider what I owe to the service you have render'd me, the blood which is both cost you, and the danger to which you have been expos'd.

Alas, said I on a sudden, with a behaviour which denoted a part of the passion I felt, this service, this blood, and this danger, are little comparable to the passionate zeal of a man who would sacrifice himself a thousand times a day if it were possible to the least occasions to pleasure or serve you. I spoke these words with a transportation which I could not master, and I observ'd nothing in her Countenance that could make me judge they were disagreeable: But a little after, making reflection on some words she had said; I know too well, added I, that by our misfortune, Prince Vindimir your Brother encountred his death from the Arms of Pharamond, but I never understood that Pharamond depriv'd of life a Prince that ought to have been your Spouse, as it seem'd to me you said. How, replied Albisinda, are you ignorant yet of this last accident, or have you not understood, that an hour before you fought in our favour against the Burgundians, the King your Brother had assaulted the Cimbrians which conducted us, and before the eyes of Rosamond and mine, slew the unfortunate Theobaldus?

These words in an instant pierc'd my Soul with a mortal grief, not doubting Sir but that this misfortune which the Princess related, was the most terrible you could possibly prove. I express'd it at first by my silence, but at length breaking forth with a behaviour which sufficiently denoted my astonishment: No Madam, said I to the Princess, I never before knew of that misfortune you tell me, but by what I perceive we are much more unfortunate than I ever yet believ'd. I stopt at these words, with so many signs of grief, that the Princess repented to have told me this sad news; but seeing she could no longer remedy it, and believing I was willing to learn more, she recounted to me what had pass'd in that fatal Adventure, even to the least particulars. though not without letting fall some Tears, which she devoted to the memory of Theobaldus, or to the grief of Rosamond, and which I accompanied with mine, by the reflection I made of the persecution you suffer'd by your ill fortune. Ab Pharamond, said I, so soon as she had ceas'd to speak, is this the favourable change you hop'd, or is there any misfortune in the World equal to yours.

I had perhaps said more, and had afflicted my self longer than I did, if in the Grief I found for your interest, the remembrance of my own had not yielded me a great Consolation. I am ashamed Sir to tell it you, but most true it is, that in the reflection I made of the Crosses, the death of Theobaldus might bring you (for no other reason could make me becom a person whom I had never seen, who was your cruel enemy, and of whom I never heard any thing might make me much esteem him) I thought of the love I already had for Albisinda and coming to understand from her lips, as I had already done by the bruit of Fame, that Theobaldus was destin'd to the glory to possess her, I could no longer will it my self, as I ought to have done, considering your interest, for the death of a person who had been my most formidable Rival, and a Rival who might without difficulty have blasted all my hopes; or at least I was not afflicted for any thing else, but that he had not dyed by any other hand than that of Pharamond.

I expressed not at all to the Princess this variety of thoughts which turmoyle'd me, both for your interest, Sir, and for my own; but having endeavour'd to master them by a silence which I kept longer than almost civility granted me to do, I deplore, said I in fine to the Princess, but the death of Theobaldus, and the misfortune of Pharamond; but if it be to the memory of Theobaldus that you give those precious tears, which I see trickle from your fair eyes, there are few men who will not emulate his condition, and who would not buy them at the price of all he hath lost. I owe perhaps those tears to the memory of Theobaldus, replied Albisinda, but if I owe a testimony to the truth, I may say I owe them to my Duty, rather than to my inclination, and that the marriage pretended to be made between Theobaldus and my self, was an effect of our Parents will, and not of our choice. I will likewise say, if I may be suffer'd to speak to you with confidence, that there was a harshness in the disposition of Theobaldus, which ever disliked me; and that after the obedience I owe to the King my Father, nothing had dispos'd me to this marriage, but the desire to atone my self by all ties that I could to the Princess Rosamond, whom I love more than my life. You see, added she in words wholly charming, with what liberty I explain my self to you, there are few persons in the world to whom I confess so much, and I hope that you will not judge ill of this freedom.

To these words she added many others full of civility, and others very obliging; and fearing lest in the condition wherein I was, a longer conversation might impeach my health, she rose up and departed, having done me the favour to tell me that she would every day visit me. This sweet promise comforted in part the sorrow which her departure caus'd; but scarce was she forth of the chamber, when a Lady that was come with her, approaching my Bed, and being seated, after the refusal I had made to hear her in any other posture, My Lord, said she, *You may permit me if you please to give you this visit, and to make you my particular protestations; I have received a favour from you, which I have engraven in the middle of my heart, and I owe you the life of my only Son, who being imprudently mingled among the Burgundians, when you took the City of Marobuda, and being upon the point to lose his life by the Arms of the Franks, was deliver'd by your generosity, and receiv'd from you alone a life, which hitherto hath been more dear to me than my own; the remembrance of so great a benefit renders me entirely yours, and obliges me to offer you all the service you can receive from me or mine, in a strange Country, and in the Territories of your enemies. My name is Imbergida, I had the honour to be Governess to the Princess Albisinda, and am bound to her service the rest of my days; if in this employment, or any other services which are possible for me, you find any occasion to make proof of the power you have over me, you shall see my Lord, that at the hazard of my life, I will endeavour to pay you what I owe you.*

I hearkened to the discourse of this Lady with great attention, and as in the condition wherein I was, nothing could be more favourable to me, nor more advantageous, than such an accident, I praised the Gods with all my heart, and conceived all the joy thereat which I was capable to contain; I neither could, nor would I dissemble it to Imbergida, and breaking silence some time after she had made an end of speaking; I am too happy, said I, to have been able to do you a kindness which will make me deserve your friendship; and though for an action to which I was oblig'd, I ought not to hope an acknowledgment equal to what you testify, permit me Madam to accept the offers you have made me, and to receive your assistances in those necessities I may have of it, attending till time shall give me some occasion to render me more worthy of your diligence.

To these first words we added many others, and before Imbergida departed from my Bed, she gave me so many marks of a sincere affection, that I could not doubt but I might confide in her in all things. It was from her that I understood the design Briomer had against my life, and the endeavours he had us'd to execute it, if the Princess Rosamond, mov'd both by the interest of Albisinda, and by her own generosity, had not oppos'd him with all her authority, and had not in the end oblig'd that furious man to depart the City to meet the Cimbrian King, who as it was reported was entering then into Bohemia:

The cruel designs of Briomer had made me fear my life, in a time wherein I was in no condition to defend it, if my Love, which wholly prepossessed my Soul, had left me a place for other thoughts than those which it inspired, and had not been sufficient to make me neglect things of greater price than this life, which I saw apparently expos'd to some danger. That conversation I had had with Albifinda, in which besides the charms of her Beauty, I had discovered others which had sensibly touch'd me, had absolutely redoubled my passion, and as every moment it gathered new force by the eternal fixation of my thoughts, which I could not divert from her; two days visit wrought upon me, what two years could hardly have done on dispositions more gentle and more moderate than mine.

The morning after Adelard came Sir, to visit me on your behalf, and gave me those marks and assurances of your goodness, that you may well judge no passion could hinder me from being as sensible as I ought of your sorrows, nor divert me from seeking occasions of your consolation, by all those means which my being so near Rosamond might afford. I pray'd Adelard to assure you so, and having sent back with him those men which followed me, I retained only my peculiar Servants. I told not Adelard at all what I had understood of the cruel intentions of Briomer, for fear left by reason of the affection you have always born me, you might suffer some trouble, though they assured me a little after, that I had no reason to fear for my self, whilst Rosamond was at Egitina, who by reason of the respect all the Cimbrians bore her, was absolute Mistress in the absence of the King her Father. I understood that she visited Balaric, and had the same care of him that Albifinda had of me; and it was likewise reported that either out of consideration of his merit, or an acknowledgment she ought to the Service she had receiv'd from him, she testified much more esteem for him, than she had done for all other men, and had receiv'd without disdain the profession of that love he bore her. I confess to you, that the noble things I have heard related of this Prince, joyn'd to what renown had publish'd of his famous actions, begat in me a great desire to see him, and I heard it spoken, that he should testify no small desire to see the Brother of Pharamond, but though we were both in the same City, and very near each other, we were both at the same time wounded, and in a condition which permitted not such an interview.

In the mean time the fair and diligent Albifinda had the goodness to visit me every day, and by those sights and those new Graces I discovered in her person, my love continually augmented; and became in the end so strong that I could difficultly dissemble it: Not but that sometimes to its strength I oppos'd the weakness of my hopes, or that I did not consider with much grief, the little appearance there was I should ever be happy. That implacable hatred which the King her Father bore against you, and your Family, was an impediment I could never hope to remove; and though by time it might have been possible to overcome this difficulty, my Fortune oppos'd it self to my hopes, nor were there any but Kings who might pretend to the possession of Albifinda. I made often reflection on these truths, but the knowledge I had of them was never able to divert, or oblige me so much as to use the least endeavour for my recovery from this passion. And by that inclination we have to flatter our selves, I imagined that I might by considerable services appease in time the anger of the King of the Sueves, and by the assistance of my Sword one day raise my self to a degree equal to that of my potent Rivals; though I doubted not at all, but many great Princes, whom the competitorship of Theobaldus, and the intentions the Suevish King had in his favour, had made conceal their design, would engage themselves in her service, after the death of the Cimbrian Prince.

However it should happen, I neither could nor was willing to struggle with my passion, nor was I longer able to conceal it from Imbergida, who was continually at my Bed-side, and rendred me all the offices I could expect from an affectionate Mother. It was then to her that I entirely open'd my heart, mov'd both by the confidence I had of her discretion and friendship, and by the belief I had, that from her rather than from any other person, I might find consolation and assistance. I was not at all deceived in the judgment I had made, and she received my discourse with marks of so great an interest, that testified her not to be more concerned in the fortune of her son, or of her own; but after she had peaceably hearkened to me, and at the end of that attention made me a thousand protestations of the desire she had to serve me, in despite of all considerations which might oppose themselves, she represented unto me the difficulties I encountered, and certainly did not represent them less than I had apprehended them; but when I saw that she summ'd them altogether in the severity of the King of the Sueves, and that she made me fear nothing on the behalf of the Princess, which was much more to be feared than all the anger of her father, I gave hope and joy an entrance into my soul, and beholding Imbergida with an aspect which surpris'd her: If in my Love, said I, I have nothing to give against but the hatred of the King of the Sueves, or if I could hope that the inclinations of the Princess were not contrary to me, I should not only despise all other difficulties which I might encounter, but from this moment esteem my condition more happy than that of the most fortunate; and if you can, Madam (continued I, taking hold of one of her hands, and locking it in mine in an extasie of affection) give me some hopes of a happiness of which it seems you would not by your discourse leave me hopeless, you will raise me to a condition will merit as much envy, as that wherein you have seen me may deserve pity. I know not, replied Imbergida, with a sigh, if I may be permitted to tell you what I think on this subject, but by the confidence I have in your discretion, and the interest which I take in your repose, I cannot hinder my self from telling you, that according to my opinion, the inclinations of the Princess are rather favourable than contrary to your desires. Yet testify to her nothing of this, though my discourse may make you believe it, for though she be of a nature extremely sweet, she hath a modesty full of scruples, which will ruine your affairs, if she should believe her self guilty of any weakness discovered to you before she be well engaged.

I hearkened to this discourse of Imbergida with much satisfaction, and I was opening my lips to let her know part of what I thought, when the Princess of whom we spoke entred her self into the chamber: to any other but her self I should with difficulty have pardoned this interruption of a discourse in which I was with so much delight employ'd; but at the sight of this divine object all other remembrances vanish'd, and I gave my self entirely to the sight so dear and so desired. My health was at present in a much better condition than it had been some days before, and the Princess who beheld this beginning of my recovery with no small gladness, was no sooner seated, but she testified her satisfaction by words full of sweetness; yet she receiv'd not the answer she expected: for I having hearkened to her discourse with a countenance in which the saw no marks of cheerfulness, Hiberto Madam, said I with a mournful voice, I have been bound to your goodness more than I can utter, nor are a thousand lives like mine employed in your service capable to acquit the least part of what I owe you, but at present permit me if you please to tell you that I am little oblig'd to the joy you testify at the greatest misfortune can befall me. And what misfortune, said the Princess wholly surpris'd, have I testified a joy; since it seems to me that it is only for your recovery I made any appear? Alas, replied I with a sigh, this recovery is cruel to me, the benefit it affords me is little considerable to the price of that happiness it deprives me of; for in short (continued I in passionate words) I shall not only not be any more visited by the Princess of the Sueves, as I should have been in another condition, but it will be no more permitted me to remain with her, or possibly see her during my whole life.

Having said these words, I observ'd blushes arise in the cheeks of Albisinda, but there seem'd yet no anger to dart from her eyes, and less when after a short silence: This all you testify a fear of, said she, is not so great to hinder the joy is owing to the return of your health, but though you should never see me more, I believe you would with a great deal of ease comfort your self for all that. I was about to reply, and it may be to discover more than I had resolv'd, but the fearing the pursuit of that discourse chang'd the matter, to hinder me from continuing it, but it was with a behaviour which gave me some cause to fear that I had attracted her anger. It was thus that I expressed my self to her, without daring to discover my self more openly, and though naturally I want no confidence; yet methought I ought her that respect, that I could not do more without abusing the kindness she had shewn me. I had said enough to let her know what I felt, and I said not enough to give her any just subject of anger, and by letting me judge that she desired not a more entire knowledge, she left me to believe that what she had received had not incens'd her.

I lived in this manner with her, highly satisfied with my condition, imagining that without being able to accuse me, she knew the love I bore her. When my much teared recovery was at hand, I saw my self deprived of a happiness so dear to me, though in a manner different from what I expected: In effect I had but two days left my Bed, when we understood that the King of the Cimbrians was returned to Mazobuda, and on the morrow Briomer arriv'd at Egitina, with an order from the King, which he shew'd to the Princess Rosamond, and by which he that same day caus'd me to be arreited in my Lodgings, and guarded with a severity, that not only the Princess Albisinda had no longer the liberty to see me, but it was not so much as granted to Imbergida or any other person but those appointed to serve me:

Albimer who was at present at Egitinæ, and who was always very affectionate to your interests, having visited me often during my wounds, and altho' me with an infinite affection, saw me yet for some days, and offer'd to do all things which were possible to serve me, but by his assiduity to visit me, he became suspected by Briomer, and the sight of him was deny'd me as well as of all other persons.

The Princess Rosamond testified no small indignation at this proceeding of the King her Father, and told Briomer publicly, that there was no reason to detain a Prince who was not fallen into the power of his enemies but by the service he had done them; but she could not hinder the effect of the King's will; so that after she had witness'd her just distaste to Albisinda, she promised to employ for my liberty all the credit she had with the King her Father; but the Princess Albisinda, all compos'd of sweetness, as she naturally was, broke out into passion, and testifying to Briomer her displeasure with infinite courage: If you had not, said she, disguis'd the truth to the King your Master, he would not have given you so unjust an order, and when he shall understand, that it was not by war, but by fighting for his Service, for the Princess his Daughter, and for mine, that Marcomire remains in his Dominions, covered with those wounds he received for his interest, he will repent without doubt of that you have made him do, and not approve the counsel you have given him. She added to these many other words, which made this fierce Soldier lose a part of the respect he ought her, and oblig'd him to answer her with insolence. The King my Master, said he, will approve all I have done by his order, but the King your Father will not approve without doubt what you have done for the Brother of a man that slew the Prince his Son.

This was all the satisfaction she received from Briomer, and whatsoever endeavours she used to give me advice of things, she could never find the means, and seeing that she could do nothing for my liberty, nor for my comfort, she resolv'd to go to Marobada with Rosamond, to represent to the King of the Cimbrians the injustice he did. I have understood likewise, that Prince Esamir, who was entirely cured of his wounds, whether it were out of complacency to the thoughts of Rosamond, or by the motions of his own Generosity blam'd publicly the proceeding of the King of the Cimbrians, and protest'd he would employ himself to the utmost for my liberty; but he departed thence presently after, to put himself in the head of some Troops which the King of the Cimbrians had sent him, and with which he went to fight the Burgundians, which yet remained in those Territories, and after, having vanquish'd them in several encounters, drove them out in few days.

For my self, Sir, I may speak it with truth, that I supported very patiently my imprisonment; that it excit'd in me more choler, than fear or grief; and, that if it caus'd any grief in me, it was for the loss it made me suffer of the sight of Albisinda, rather than for any other consideration. I testifi'd to those of my Guard a part of my thoughts, with a great deal of liberty, and seeing one day their Captain in my chamber, Tell Briomer, said I to him, and tell your King himself, if you please, that he ought, or might have thought more than once, before he resolv'd on an action so full of ingratitude and indignity; that it is from the Franks he hath received the Crown he had lost, and that he is ill counselled, to draw yet upon himself those enemies, against which he was so ill defended.

I had possibly said more, if I had spok'n to the King of the Cimbrians himself, and if I had not remembred that I was oblig'd to some respect, for the love you bear the Princess Rosamond. I did what possibly I could, to have receiv'd some intelligence from Albisinda, or from Imbergida, but I could learn nothing either from the one or the other: and my imprisonment was so severe, that those men that serv'd me, could not speak to me but in the presence of many persons. Mine that remained with me, had indeed the liberty to come near me, and to serve me, but not to go out of the house where I was detain'd, nor have any communication with other persons, than those whom Briomer had appointed for my Guard.

However at the beginning of my imprisonment, I understood news from those of my Guard, which made me dye with sorrow, which was, that of the war which the Sueves waged in our Country; of the Siege of Peapolis, and the progress of Viridomar; that by the diligence of our enemies Forces, we had receiv'd many losses. I had died with grief certainly at this news, seeing my self miserably shut up, whilst you my Sovereign were fighting Battels, and encountering dangers, in which my misfortunes permitted me not to accompany you; but as on the one side I had found cause of sorrow, I receiv'd on the other some consolation, understanding some few days after, the strange success of that war, the admirable change of Viridomar, and the retreat of the Sueves.

They who made me this recital, made no difficulty to relate to me, the effect that news

news had produc'd in the heart of the King of the Cimbrians, and to tell me that the Princess Albifinda had been sensibly afflicted, seeing her self by that misfortune depriv'd of the hopes to be Sister to Rosamond, by alliance, as she was already by affection: that she was for many days comfortless, and that her grief could not be pleas'd but by the Princess Rosamond, who seem'd but little touch'd at this change of Viridomar, nor had appear'd so at all, but for the love of Albifinda. That the King of the Cimbrians had born it impatiently, and that few days after seeing himself no longer engag'd to the King of the Sueves, he had made Proclamation, that he would give his Daughter and his Dominions to that Prince that should bring him the head of Pharamond: That he was upon the point to have sent back the Princess Albifinda to the King of the Sueves, and to break all alliance with him, but that the King had pleas'd him by a proceeding contrary to that of his Son; protesting that he would never separate from his interetts: That he would till death assist him with all his Forces against their common Enemy; and that if Viridomar did not return to his duty, and renounce the Princess Polixena, and yield himself to Rosamond, according to the first intention, he not only would never own him for his Son, but in all things treat him as his mortal enemy, praying him still to keep the Princess Albifinda with the Princess Rosamond for the assurance of his word, so that the alliance was re-confirmed by these proceedings of the King of the Sueves, to the great contentment of the two Princesses, who by this means, were to stay together till the end of the War, to be made against Pharamond, for which they Arm'd so many Princes, and so many Provinces.

See Sir, the news I understood, which made me in the end infinitely glad, out of the hopes I had that the love of Viridomar to my Sister, might facilitate my fortunes with his, and that he would be favourable to me in my love, to receive from me the same assistance in his: In the mean time I remain'd yet some days in the same Prison, during which, notwithstanding the trouble it was to me, the recovery of my wounds was compleated, and I restor'd to my former health, and entire strength, so that I wanted nothing but liberty for the rest, being well assist'd, and as well serv'd. I understood in the end, and I understood it with an infinite sorrow, that the two Princesses were gone to Marobuda, by the Order of the King, under the conduct of Briomer, who had the charge to bring them thither. This distance from Albifinda, though I drew no advantage from her stay at Egitina, afflicted me more sensibly than all the rigours of my Imprisonment could do, and those that were about me, beheld me more melancholy and sad, than they had ever known me. But I was not long in this affliction, for on the morrow, by an Order which came from the Court, they took me out of the Prison to conduct me thither. I mounted a Chariot which they presented me, with Clotarins, he of all my men, whom I have always most esteem'd, and four of my Guard, who plac'd themselves at the Boots with their Arms: The rest of my people followed the Chariot on Horseback, but without Swords, and the Chariot was environ'd with one hundred men of War, well Mounted and Armed Cap a-pe. He that had the charge of my Imprisonment, marched in the head of them; And in a Country where the King had no more enemies, and where in all likelyhood, no person would endeavour to rescue me, they believ'd a greater Convoy unnecessary.

I found my self in the Country with some delight, and understanding that I went towards Albifinda, though I had no hopes to see her, I followed without reluctancy those that conducted me to the City where she was, and into which I had entred not long before after a manner much more different: we had already pass'd the greatest part of the way, and in less than three hours might have arriv'd at Marobuda: When they that guard-ed me saw a Body of Cavalry appear twice as strong as theirs, which came after us upon a round trot. Their Captain believ'd at first, that it was a re-inforcement sent him, not fearing any Enemies Troops between Egitina and Marobuda; But when they were so near; as they could clearly discern them, they saw that their Arms and their Cassacks were like to those which the Burgundians usually wore. They began to be affrighted at this sight, and stopp'd, to consider what resolution they should take: but at the same time they saw the Enemies Squadron level their Lances, and advance towards them on full speed, with those cries the Burgundians are us'd to make when they begin their onsets: At this sight my Conductors not doubting they were Enemies, and truly knowing themselves too weak for them, lost entirely their Courage, and their Captain seeing that all his men abandon'd him, and sought their safety in their flight, had recourse to his spurs, as well as the others; and fled after the rest on a full career. The Guards themselves, who were in the Chariot, letting down the Boots, endeavour'd to save themselves on foot, by running towards a Wood they saw near us: and the Charioter himself leaping from his seat, ran after the others, so that there remain'd about the Chariot only that small number of my servants, who followed without any Arms.

They who had affrighted my Convoy, made some shew of pursuing them, but it well appear'd, it was without design to reach them; and without killing or taking one, they scatter'd them in such sort, that they were no more to be seen throughout the Plain. I leapt out of the Chariot with my Guards, and my men began to range about me, but not having so much as a sword, we remain'd in the place where we were, with design to attend with patience, what might be the end of this adventure: Our expectation was not long, for a little after, the party of my Deliverers return'd to us, and their Captain more than fifty paces before the rest; his stature seem'd to me in his Saddle the fairest in the world, but I could see but a small part of his visage, because he had lifted up his Viser but a very little to speak to me: He drew near to me alone, leaving his men at a little distance; and being allighted, because he saw me on foot, Prince, said he to me, you are free, but make use if you please of your Liberty, for it is not permitted me to stay longer with you. I receive this benefit, said I to him, with all those acknowledgments I owe it, but if you will make it entire, be pleas'd to tell me to whom I am thus engag'd. "You are not so to any person," replied he, for this assistance was due to you from all who know how to respect a great Merit, and an Illustrious birth: You must permit me not to tell you any more, but shall see me perhaps one day in those places, where you may better know me.

At these words, seeing that Clotarins and my self were on foot, and without Arms he caus'd two of his men to be disarm'd, whose stature was nearest to ours, and whilst we cover'd our selves with their Arms, which were very good ones, he chose the two best Horses of his Troop, and having desir'd me to mount, and given me a guide to whom the Country was known, to conduct me to whatever place I would retire, he bid me adieu, and march'd away with his Troop in great hast. "It shall be only your fault," cried I, "seeing him depart, that I acquit not my self of what I owe you, but at what time soever, and upon whatever occasion you make your self known, you shall see that I have not forgot you. I know not if he understood these last words, but his behaviour gave me as much astonishment, as it gave me joy, so that if I had not fear'd to displease him, I had followed, and had not left him without knowing him, had it been possible.

I march'd some time by the guidance of that man whom he had left for that purpose (whom I could by no prayers nor promises oblige to discover him, be it that truly he knew him not, as he still assur'd me, or that he would with fidelity keep the secret he had order'd him) and who by unfrequented ways, led us towards the Country of the Coldules, but if I followed him, it was only to keep my self at a distance from places where I might be re taken, and to send my men out of the Territories of the Bohemians, to remain alone with Clotarins, and not depart without seeing Albisinda, whom I could not abandon for any consideration of danger.

I meditated on ways to effect my design, not finding any, but those which were very difficult, by reason of the little acquaintance I had at Marobuda to find a retreat: When I heard one call after us, and having turned my head, I saw a Cavalier, who being allighted, and having taken off his helmet, approaching me, came to salute me with infinite respect and submission: It was a young man, of an excellent grace, and who seem'd not above twenty years of age, and I being stopp'd, to hear what he desir'd of me, "I have run after those which conducted you from Egitina," said he, to come and offer you that service you ought to hope from a man that owes you his life, I am the Son of Imbergida, whom you saved out of the hands of your own souldiers at the taking of Marobuda, and being returned yesterday from a voyage I made into Suevia, my Mother made me depart at night, to come to Egitina, and endeavour to render my self near you in any place, or in whatever condition I should find you. I obeyed her with infinite joy, and I shall esteem my self most happy, if I can testify to you my acknowledgments by a service full of fidelity.

I embrac'd several times the Son of Imbergida, whilst he spoke in this manner, and remembering to have seen his face at that time when I did him the kindness for which his Mother and he were so grateful, I gave him all the proofs of an affection I thought due to the Son of a Mother to whom I was particularly oblig'd, and from whom I yet hop'd for good offices, and because he was arriv'd as if he had been sent by Heaven to serve me in the design I had, I stopp'd the Guide who march'd some paces before my people: and having assur'd him of the acknowledgments I had for him, and shewed them in part by a Ring I gave him, I pray'd him to conduct my people out of the Territories of Bohemia, into the Country of the Narisques, where I order'd them to stay in some City of that Country, nearest the Frontier, and not to depart thence till they had receiv'd news of me. I kept only Clotarins with me, telling the rest that I was oblig'd to do thus, because it being probable probable I should be followed, there was great danger lest my equipage should make me be known, whilst marching alone with only two men, arm'd like my self, I might pass without any great peril.

Being thus rid of my people, and that with a very apparent excuse, I turn'd toward the Son of Imbergida, who was remounted on horseback, and having shewed him new marks of kindness, You shall see, said I, the confidence I have in a person well born, as without doubt you are; and since you are the Son of Imbergida, to whom I owe all things, and who persists so generously in an affection for me, it is to you that I will trust my life, and something more precious. Gerontes, for so he was called, having made me again new protestations, and having pray'd me to command what I desired of him, I would fain if you please, said I, go to Marobuda, where we will enter when the Heavens are curtain'd with night, and where I know well they will not at present search for me, desiring you to guide me to the house which your Mother hath in the City, where I know she keeps her retinue, and that you bring me to speak with her, without other witnesses than your self and Clotarius.

Gerontes seem'd astonish'd at my discourse, and beholding me like a man that doubted my intention, Can it be possible my Lord, said he to me, that you will return to Marobuda? There is not, said I sighing, perhaps so much danger as you believe, but however it be, this is a resolution I am resolv'd to execute. Since it is so my Lord, reply'd Gerontes, I am ready to obey you, and I hope I shall this day make you speak with Imbergida, with as much secrecy as you can desire.

After these words, and others which we us'd on the same Subject, we march'd towards Marobuda, by other ways than the ordinary, though in the equipage we were, and the Arms which we wore, with the little appearance there was I should take that way, we might have follow'd the usual Road, without any danger. We had no more time than was necessary, and the day was already ended, when we arriv'd at the Gates of the City, there were no Guards kept since the return of the King, but we pass'd with all liberty to the house of Imbergida. She lodg'd in the Palace, with the Princess Albisinda, but because she was a woman of considerable quality, and had a very great retinue, she had a house (whither her self very often retir'd) for her private occasions.

Gerontes led me into his chamber, without my face being seen by any of the Servants of the house, by reason of the Helmet which cover'd it, and when we were entred, having shut the door upon us, he oblig'd me to disarm my self, assuring me that no person should enter the place where we were. A little after he caus'd something to be brought for our Supper, I not contenting he should make any great preparation, and he received it at the door, not permitting any to enter into the chamber, though we believ'd that amongst the Domesticks there was not any could have known me, but Clotarius and he thought that we could not be too circumspect, and for this reason I was forc'd to receive from them those services which at another time I would not have receiv'd.

After a light repast, Gerontes at my entreaty went to the Palace, leaving us shut up in his chamber, and soon after he return'd with Imbergida. This Ladies surpris was not so great, finding me in the chamber of her Son, as it would have been, if she had not before known I was there, yet when I advanced to salute her, beholding me with all the marks of astonishment, How, my Lord, said she, are you in Marobuda, and whilst the whole Country is in Arms to seek you, do you come to cast your self into the hands of your enemies? You see Madam, said I, that my desire to see you is more powerful over my mind, than the fear of all danger. I would thank you, answer'd she, with a behaviour like to mine, if the fear I have for you would permit me, but in truth that troubles me a little too much, for I have seen at the Palace so many preparations to run after you, upon the report which arriv'd here of your escape, and so many orders to stop you at all the passages, that I cannot as I desire rejoice at your liberty, and the honour I receive by seeing you. You may judge well by that you have told me, reply'd I, that in any other place I should be in less security than in this, and that those who have orders to pursue me, and from whom possibly I have difficultly escap'd, will seek every where rather than in Marobuda, therefore I have no desire to depart, continued I after we were seated, and I confess to you, that it would be more pleasing for me to dye, than to be remote from the Princess Albisinda. For this reason Madam, I require your assistance, as of a person whom I would always consider as my Mother, and if you do not find the means for me to stay some time near the Princess, before my Honour and Duty drive me from this Country, to carry my Sword to the service of the King my Brother, in that war prepar'd against him, I shall be the most unfortunate, and most disconsolate of all men. And in what manner, my Lord, said Imbergida, believe you that I can give you the means? For whilst you would conceal your self from the knowledge of all other persons, by whom you may be in danger, you may well judge that the Princess, whatever esteem she may have for you, will not suffer that you should remain unknown near her. I believe it, replied I, but it is the Princess her self whom we must deceive, and it is in this deceit that I implore your assistance, and demand of you the effects of that friendship you have promised me; this may teach you perhaps not to desire it longer with the miserable, who can be only a charge, and unconveniency to their friends; however I pretend to you, that from the deceit of which I would have you to participate, you shall never receive either reproach or injury, and when we shall be so unhappy to see the effects prove contrary to our hopes, both you and your house shall find a way which shall free you from all you can fear, and perhaps raise you above all you can at present hope. But my Lord, replied Imbergida, what way can I have either to deceive the Princess, without violating the fidelity I owe her? or to deceive the whole world, by letting you remain unknown near her? Propose Sir those that you have imagined, and if it be but the exposing of my Fortune, or my life it self to all those dangers may threaten us, I will gladly do it to do you that service I owe you, and which I have promised you, but do it in such manner, that I may deceive Albinde without betraying her, for to act a Treason, my Lord, and a Treason against my Princess, all the passion I have for your service will never make me consent. For the deceit, answered I, it is not against me that you should use this premonition, you know I love the Princess too well to counsel you to act against her a deceit may be call'd a Treason, but for the means which I have imagined, it is so little ordinary, that I believe you will find in it great difficulties, though it be not without example; For in fine, Imbergida, be pleas'd not to make any wonder at it, I know no other than disguising my Sex, there is nothing in my countenance which may hinder me from passing for a Lady, when in those habits, my hair (for you see we wear it longer than the rest of other nations) is such that it will comply with any dressing; and for my Stature, though it be taller than ordinarily that of women is, it is not, by what is reported, taller than that of the Princess Rosamond: My Face hath not been seen but by very few persons of your Court, the Princess hath seen it but once in her Chariot, then when by the loss of blood I was very pale and extremely chang'd, all the other times she saw it, was in Bed, in a place very obscure, and never in its ordinary condition, so that with the change which the dressing and habits will add, she will scarce find any thing she can observe, and though she should find some resemblance (which may happen by the sound of my voice, rather than by any other way) there are among all persons every day found some things so like, that she cannot be astonish'd. I speak very well your Countries Language, and you may make me pass for one of your kindred come with your Son to see you, and in this quality keep me for some time near you, where I may see the Princess at every turn, as those Ladies which wait on her do. And when one day the truth shall be discover'd, that which possibly may never fall out but by advantageous ways, you may justify the design which you did to acquit your self of what you believed you ought me for the life of your Son, by concealing me in your house, when I had no other retreat from the pursuits of my enemies. I will add yet the hopes we may conceive of Prince Viridomar, if he be truly enamour'd of my Sister, as report hath published, you will believe he cannot be opposite to us, and that in Suevia it self he can deliver you from all may threaten you.

To these words I added many others, which tediousness hinders me from reciting, by which I press'd and tormented in such manner the Spirit of Imbergida, who of her self was as affectionate as I could desire, that though she found many terrible difficulties and affrighting subjects of fear in my proposal, yet she resolv'd in the end to pass over all things, and to stop her eyes against all dangers to serve me as I desired, telling me, that for the Princess she hop'd to obtain her pardon, and for the King whose anger she had more cause to fear if he should discover it, she would avoid it by flying after me into Francia, if she did not receive protection from Prince Viridomar, from whom she could not but hope it, if he were so passionate for the Princess Polixena as they desired; that possibly there might happen changes yet more favourable; but in fine, whatever fell out she was resolv'd to hazard all things to serve me.

Having given me her word, she return'd to the Palace, with promise to return to me again on the morning betimes. And not to detain you with this discourse, by the recital of my disquiet and impatience, on which I could largely extend my self, she came on the morrow, though somewhat later than I expected, and brought with her into the chamber a Lady which belonged to her, in whose discretion she confided, and of whom she must of force make use in this design; she told me presently that she had already spoke to the Princess, of a Niece of hers arriv'd from Suevia with her Son, and had already begot in her a desire to see her, by the recital she had made of her. That things dispos'd themselves to my satisfaction better than I could hope; that that day was appointed for the the Funeral Rights and Honours due to Theobaldus, whose Body they had brought from Egitina, and to solemnize which only the King was come to Marobuda; that he departed the morrow after to go to the Frontiers to a Rendezvous agreed on with his Allies; where it was likewise believ'd the King of the Sueves would be present; that soon after his departure the Princess his Daughter, and the Princess Albisinda, intended to leave the City, to go and pass away some time at Lisurgis, a Royal Mansion, seated on the banks of the Elba, about four hours journey from Marobuda, and that in that place, in the absence of the King, whom she fear'd for my sake, and in a place where the Princess Resamond would be Mistress, she durst attempt things more boldly, and could more conveniently keep me with her, present me to Albisinda, and give me opportunity to see her every day as if I were in her service.

I was resolv'd then by her Counsel to attend till the Princess was at Lisurgis, before I would show my self under the name and shape of Ericlea, who truly was a Niece to Imbergida, and a Niece who having been bred up with her Parents in the utmost parts of Suevia, had never been seen by the Servants which she had now about her. We sweetned thus by little and little the difficulties which had appear'd so great at the beginning, and Imbergida desired me at that time to put on the habit of her Sex, to see how it would become me; and to accustom my self during those two or three days I had to expect, to the end that I might be the more apt, and compose my self better to the Gesture and Countenance of Women. She therefore order'd me to be dressed in those habits which she had caus'd to be brought, having lengthned them for fear they should be too short, but expecting to make me others with more leisure, she clad me with them by the assistance of that Maid which came with her, whose they were, and who being very straight and tall, they prov'd of an absolute proportion and fitness to my Body: In the end they dressed my head, and by the reason of the length and thickness of my hair, they did it easily in the manner as is used by the Ladies of the Cimbrian Court, and put me in such a condition that I had some difficulty to know my self when I came to the looking Glass: and certainly the Change was so great, that there were few persons in the world who would not have been deceiv'd. I know not (said the King of the Franks to Marcomire interrupting him) how Strangers should not be deceiv'd, since I was myself, not doubting but that you were a woman, and that you were that Lady which turn'd Briomer's Sword from my breast.

I confess, continued Marcomire, that I saw my self with some shame in a condition so little conformant to my Courage, though I could flatter my self by the examples of Achilles, of Hercules, and many other great persons of Antiquity, whom a like Cause had oblig'd to like disguisements, and that if my passion had not been very violent, I had cast from me all that Apparel, and reassum'd my first shape. Imbergida and others mark'd well the redness I had in my Forehead, but their thoughts were different from mine, and though they had before condemn'd my design, they were now very much satisfied, and found (if it may be permitted me to praise my self for a quality I ever esteem'd as nothing) not only that I might pass for a Damsel, but for a very fair Damsel. Imbergida told me a hundred pretty stories on this subject, which I could not hearken to without shame: she was a long time at learning me my Gate, Carriage, and those little curiosities of that Sex, and when she was oblig'd to return to the Palace, she left me with the Maid that had dress'd me, who continued to give me the lessons the rest of that day, in which I profited so much to her content, that she assur'd me I should in two days carry my self like the most exact of Women kind.

On the morrow the King departed as he had resolv'd, but not without having caus'd great pains to be taken to post after me to stop me at all the passages, nor without having cast into Prison him who had the charge of my Guard and Conduct, with the Guards who were in the Chariot with me, and many others of those who had fled with so much swiftness from before my Deliverers. I was pleas'd at their ill fortune, not so much for the anger I bare them, as for the danger wherein I should have been to have been known by them rather than by any other Persons, there being few besides who had so often seen my face.

The Day which succeeded to that of the departure of the King, the Princesses departed to go for Lisurgis, and because Imbergida went in the Chariot with the Princess, and that she would not let me be seen by her till we came to Lisurgis, I went into hers, which she had caus'd to be made ready, with Gerontes, and the Maid that dress'd me. I began already to accustom my self so well to the Personage I was to act, that few could mark any fault in my Carriage, and that day I found my self more free, because I had cloaths which were made for my self, and which were so much the sooner in readiness, because they were mourning habits, like to those which all the Court wore for the death of Theobaldus.

We soon came to Lisurgis, where Imbergida knowing well I was not what I appear'd, frighten'd her self at her Lodgings in the Castle to leave me a Chamber free, and that very Night judging it more to the purpose to present me to the Princess by Candle light than by clear day, led me towards her chamber: passing the Anti-chamber, we found Mathilda, who was a Lady of whom I have made mention, Wife to the Chief Officer of Albifinda's House, who came at present to the Princess with an intention like to that of Imbergida, to wit, to present her one of her Kindred that day come to her. As they were almost always together, and very good friends, they presently communicated to each other their design, and after Mathilda had embrac'd me, and Imbergida had done the same Carefs to her Kinswoman. Theodora and I (for so they call'd her) embrac'd, and afterwards look'd one upon another very wistly: She was a brown Damsel, of a stature little different from mine, of no delicate beauty, but of a sprightly and lively Air.

Coming both at the same time, there pass'd some Civilities between us, though I spoke the least I could possible, and it seem'd likewise to me that she had no great inclination to speaking: A little afterwards we entred together into the Chamber of Albifinda, and I soon beheld her with an affection of mind which carried me beyond my self, and but for a fear of discovering the Deceit I acted, enough to have made me commit faults able to discover the person I dissembled. So soon as the Princess saw Theodora and my self enter after Mathilda and Imbergida, I see well, said she, approaching to them, that these are your two Kinswomen you promis'd to let me see, and doubt not at all, but since they are so near allied to you, that I behold them with no small affection. Whilst she spoke in this manner, we advanced at the same time to salute her, and it seem'd to me we press'd forward with desire to receive the Kiss Albifinda was to give us, and that we equally envied each other for to precious a favour. For my part, I found so much sweetness in it, that I saw it with regret made common to another, and methought that casting my eyes at the same time on the Countenance of Theodora, I saw some signs in her of the same thoughts.

After this Albifinda causing Imbergida to draw near her, with Mathilda, and casting her eyes on Imbergida's Countenance, she made her blush so extraordinarily that she was forc'd to demand the cause: Imbergida remain'd some time to recover her self, and after she was somewhat embolden'd, I blush Madam, said she to the Princess, for the fault I have committed, in presenting you a Damsel bred up in a Savage Country, and who hath no more the Air of the Court than a person that never came near it. I may well (said Mathilda) at the same time make the same excuse to her Highness, nor had I been so bold if she had not given me her Command for what I have done. You have nothing to fear, said the Princess to them, nor nothing you need to justify in this matter, if it be not for the dissimulation you have made in speaking so modestly of these two Persons so well compos'd. I answer'd not to this Discourse but with a profound reverence, as Imbergida had well taught me, and as I had seen practis'd: But a little after the Princess having drawn Imbergida apart, Ab! Imbergida said she your Niece is a most beautiful Damsel, and having commanded me to approach the light, she wanted but little of putting me quite out of Countenance, constraining me to cast down my eyes for fear, which without doubt she took for Modesty. She beheld me sometime with an aspect which made me think she had observ'd in my face something that appear'd like Marcomire, but then when I was constrain'd to answer, (though in very few words, and very low) to several Demands she made me concerning my Journey, and concerning the places where I had been bred, her Countenance was cover'd with such blushes, that I infallibly believ'd I should be discover'd: I believe it was to conceal her blushes that she turn'd her head on the other side, and during that time, as it had been out of respect, I fell back some few steps, and retir'd behind Imbergida.

We were in this condition, and I knew not whether I ought to repent me of my enterprise, when the Princess Rosamond came into the Chamber, and by the splendor of many lights, I straight beheld the more resplendent rays of that prodigious beauty. I avow to you my Lord, nor is it out of the compliance I owe to your thoughts, that all the passion with which my Soul was prepossess'd for Albifinda, and all the precaution I had arm'd my self withal, could not defend me from astonishment at the sight of this wonder, which I beheld like somewhat more conformable to a Divinity, than any thing Terrestrial. It is most certain, all that admiration could produce, was at present found in my spirit: but it is true likewise, that I beheld Rosamond no otherwise, than as a resplendent star, which ought not to dart its rays on any thing but Gods, or men like you: and that the beauty of Albifinda, less heavenly and less bright, but full of a sweetness, totally charming, and more proportionable nable to our weakness, preserv'd as I desir'd, its entire empire o're my heart.

Albisinda made us to be taluted by the Princess Rosamond, who treated us as she had done; and honoured me with a Kiss, which any other man but my self would have receiv'd with infinite transportation, and which I wish'd yours with all my Soul. After she had spoken some moments to us with an Air full of Royal Majesty, but however without any pride, she retir'd with Albisinda into her Closet, where they had private discourse till bed time. Imbergida made me retire with Gerontes, and being yet unwilling to give the Princess any subject of Complaint, which she could not well pardon, she accusom'd me to retire at an early hour, that I might not see her in a time wherein my dissembled Sex might have had those privileges which accords not with ours, and that either rising or going to bed I might have seen those beauties which are wholly conceal'd from us, but much less from persons of their Sex: She observ'd it daily with the same diligence and never forgot to make me a sign to withdraw, to spare the Princess that shame, which the remembrance thereof might one day have caus'd had I us'd a full liberty.

On the morrow she led me again to the Chamber of the Princess, whilst she dress'd her self, but it was at a time when she was to be seen as well by other persons as the Ladies that serv'd her, and she receiv'd us with a Countenance which made us judge that our Deceit was not discover'd: though truly she had found in my face, and in the sound of my Voice something resembling that of Marcomire, she could not at all dissemble it: but having taken Imbergida and my self near the Window: Do you not observe, said she, that your Neece resembles somewhat in Face, and entirely in the sound of her Voice Prince Marcomire? These words instead of giving us fear, reasur'd us we were not discover'd, judging well that the Princess would not have spoke in that manner if she had had any suspicion of the truth. We at this time lost nothing of our Countenance, but Imbergida having narrowly eyed me for some time, In truth Madam, said she to the Princess, I never before observ'd what you have now observ'd, but I find that which you say is very true, and that both the Voice and Features of Ericlea, have a great agreement with those of Prince Marcomire. I know not Madam; said I to the Princess, whether I ought to be glad at that resemblance you are pleas'd to give me, for though I have heard that that Prince of whom you speak hath had the good fortune to render you some service, I know that he is of a House odious to yours, and I fear that my likeness to him may bring into your mind the memory of things disadvantageous to me. Marcomire, replied the Princess, is the Brother of a person who hath done us many bloody injuries, rather by our Misfortune than by his Will, but besides that, Marcomire hath no part in them, he hath done me a most important piece of Service, at the price of his Blood; and at the peril of his Life: and you need not fear, added she with a sigh, that your resembling him will hinder me from loving you as I believe you merit.

I answer'd to this obliging Discourse with a profound reverence, and at the same time I saw enter Mathilda, with her Kinswoman, and after her many other persons who hindred the Princess from speaking longer to us in particular, but the rest of that Day, and all following, she did us often that favour, and by my good fortune, having found either in my person, or in my Carriage something that pleas'd her, she began to manifest an affection for me, and in a little time made me know that she prefer'd me before all the Ladies that attended her: Not but that Theodora did dispute with me this eminence as much as it was possible for her, and though the Princess, who found her person well compos'd and her disposition pleasing, did truly esteem her, yet in the end she seem'd to cast a better Countenance on me than on her, and called me oftner to her particular conversation, testifying much more confidence in me. I soon knew both by the countenance and Actions of Theodora that she supported impatiently the advantage I had gain'd over her: but as by the knowledge I had who I was, I judg'd there could be no important Competition between her and me; I laugh'd first at her jealousy, and had some pity of her, but when she began to be importunate towards me, and that I saw this Damself prevent me in those services I would have rendred the Princess, take charge with a kind of zeal of those Commissions she would have given me, to hinder me from executing them, and always maliciously come and interrupt us, when I was in a particular Converse with her, I at first beheld her with some spleen, and in the end began to hate her, if not so much as she made known she hated me, at least as much as I could hate a Woman, and a Woman who endeavour'd by all means to injure me in all that possibly she could; I therefore strove to do the like to her, without sparing her, and took pleasure to cross her in the Designs she had in gaining the heart of Albisinda.

In the mean time the Princesses affection towards me increas'd from day to day, and in a little time my happiness was so great, that at all times when she was not with the Princess Rosamond, she was pleas'd that I should be with her : she called me every day into her Retirements, and into her particular walks, and had that confidence in me to trust me with most she had in her heart. It is true that I forgot not any thing which might serve in the design I had to please her ; that I fought with great diligence all occasions to render her those little services, which though they were not of great importance, might be pleasing ; that I endeavoured to tell her things pleasing to her humour ; and that I employed all the skill I had, and all the knowledge of things I had seen in the world could furnish me with, to seek means to divertise her : with these the passion with which I was encourag'd gave my words and actions an Air wholly different from what might be noted in those of other persons ; and especially Sir, as you know, my voice to be good, and that I was taught to sing with great care, I sung often before her, and sometimes those words which expressed to the full what I felt, and then I accompanied them with a demeanour so passionate, that it had not been difficult to discern how I was touch'd at the heart.

There being at Lisurgis no Lodgings but for the Royal Family, and the most necessary Officers, the Court is never great, and at this time by reason of the absence of the King, and many other causes it was less than it had a long time been, and we pass the time in a very delectable privacy. Albisinda one day walked into the Park (whilst Rosamond had some business which kept her in her Closet) and having only taken with her Theodora and myself, to bear her company for some turns she was pleas'd to make in the Alley, she walk'd a good while leaning on our Arms, and having as long hearken'd to those things I said to divertise her, she made me so many obliging speeches, and did me so many sweet and charming favours, that if they had been done to Marcomire, and not to Ericlea, I had preferred my condition before the most fortunate in the world, so that I could not dissemble my joy (though I saw Theodora enrag'd with spight at it) but fixing my lips to her fair hand which I held, and which I had the liberty to kiss, and pressing it with a transportation in which she might discern somewhat more passionate than the affection of a Damself: Is it possible, said I, that that which is the desire of all the Kings of the earth, is granted to the too happy Ericlea, and that she should rejoyce in a happiness which the greatest Princes in the world would buy at the price of all their Blood? " You speak too much, answered the Princess, for this is all you could say if you spoke to my Sister (so it was that she called the Princess Rosamand.) One may without doubt, replied I, say the same things of the Princess of the Cimbrians; but as she hath her Adorers, you have likewise yours, and though I look upon her as something Divine, if Heaven had granted me to be born of another Sex than yours, and in a degree and esteem amongst men, which would permit me to raise my thoughts either to the one or the other, I protest to you my Princess, by all that I know most holy and most sacred, it should be at your feet that I would fix my life even to my last Sigh. " You are too full of flattery, replied Albisinda, and if this " Metamorphosis could come to pass, you would soon be convinc'd of a falsehood and dissimulation. Would to God (added I with a sigh) that we could make the proof, and that instead of a Damself unprofitable in your service, I could become a Prince worthy both by his birth and merit of the Glory to serve you.

" You should not be alone, (replied Theodora, who had hearkened to our discourse " with an infinite impatience and trouble) to make so advantageous a wish ; but when " we could obtain the effect I believe we should not be more happy, and that in that Sex " we desire we should not be treated so favourably by the Princess as we are in our own. There is great appearance for it, replied Albisinda, but since we are in this question, I shall desire ye to let me understand which of all the Princes which are at present in the world, and whose reputation is come to our knowledge, you would desire to be. " For my part Madam, " (said I, preventing Theodora, who was about to speak) I should be much troubled to " choose, and though there be those whom for their merit I may without doubt prefer " before others, the circumstance of their Fortune permits me not to determine of my " choice. For Prince Viridomar, his great actions and admirable qualities make me very " desirous to resemble him, but the quality for which he is most dear to me, would " hinder me from desiring his condition, that is, because he is your Brother; and by consequence depriv'd of those hopes which are less forbidden to others, and therefore it " is not Prince Viridomar I would be. For Pharamond, if it may be permitted me to " name him amongst others before you, I confess, that the glory of his Actions, and what " I have heard told of his Virtue, would make me cast my eyes on him rather than on " any other Prince in the world, but the misfortune he hath to be odious to your House, " and the despair he hath to aspire to a Glory for which only I would resemble him, permit me not to wish my self Pharamond. For Gondioch, there are certainly things very “ fair and glorious in his life, but by his last Actions he hath defcnd all this Splendor, “ and he hath so unworthily treated both his Mistress and his Friend, that I would nei“ ther be Gondioch nor resemble him. For the Great Constance, whose Renown is “ the valiant Azelmond, King of the Lombards; Gunderic, King of the Vandils; and the “ famous Constantine, King of Great Britain, as there are circumstances in their Fortune “ little favourable to the design I have to fix my life to your Service, so it is not into “ any of them I would be changed; and for Prince Balsmir, whose Glory may compare “ with the greatest; the Gothick Prince Walix, whose Renown is spread so far; Gonde- “ mar, Brother to the King of the Burgundians; and Marcomire, Brother to the King of “ the Franks; and some others who in Valour, Birth and Merit, are not possibly interi“ our to part of these I have named, they want Crowns which doubtless are necessary to “ those who aspire to the Glory to possess you, and therefore not finding any, neither a“ mongst them, nor amongst the first I have named, whose condition seems worthy to “ be preferred before mine, I know not how to resolve what choice to make. But if “ you will permit me to tell you to which of all the Princes which I have named, I should “ wish before all others, the Glory and Happiness I possess, (continued I, kissing her “ hand which I held) I will tell you that the interest I take in the fortune of a man “ whom you have done me the honour to tell me I resemble, the pity I have of him for “ default of a Crown which he wants to raise his thoughts to you, the good will I bear “ him for the service he hath done you, and that which I have heard spoken of his passion “ for you, would make me desire this fortune for Marcomire rather than any other. And “ since the affection you have created in me for him extends to his Brother. I could wish

 “ (if a wish for the Unfortunate may be permitted before you) that Pharamond might “ hope the possession of Rosamond, and that Marcomire might aspire to the Glory to serve “ you.

Whilst I spoke in this manner, Theodora had hearkened to my discourse with an impatience, which by what we could judge, had often oblig'd her to interrupt it, if the respect of the Princess had not withheld her, and when I had done speaking, breaking silence with a demeanour full of vehemence, Madam, (said she to the Princess) As we are Rivals, Ericlea and my self, in the design to gain your precious affections, permit us if you please to oppose each other in our thoughts, and to contradict with liberty a part of what agrees not with our thoughts: Without amusing my self therefore to defend particularly all others amongst whom I might find without doubt as great advantage as she can in those on whom she hath fixed her affection, I will only tell her, that I find her as little reasonable in the inclination she hath for the house of the King of the Franks, as in the aversion she testifies to that of the King of the Burgundians. I never understood that the offences whi. b Gondioch hath committed against his Mistress, which in sum, were only endeavours to conquer her, were of the nature of those she hath received from Pharamond, who before her eyes slew her Brother, and deprived a Prince of his life who was yours, and ought to have been her Spouse: and for that proceeding towards his Friend, of which she accuses him, I never understood Gondioch was guilty like Pharamond of infidelity towards his Friend, or that he endeavoured to deprive him of a Mistress, for the conquest of whom he had taken up Arms for him as a friend in whom he entirely trusted his Fortune. For Gondemar his Brother, I never heard it spoken, that either for his Birth, Valour, or any other estimable quality, he was at all inferior to Marcomire; and therefore not only to oppose the thoughts of Ericlea but to pay to Reason and Justice that which I think I owe them, I could wish that Gondioch were Possessor of the Princess of the Cimbrians, and that Gondemar were so happy as to be permitted by the Princess of the Sueves to the Glory to serve her.

“ If the Princess, (said I, so soon as Theodora had done speaking) will grant me the “ same liberty you have taken, I shall say to justify what I have testified of inclination “ for the house of the King of the Franks, and of aversion for that of Gondioch, that by “ that Renown which spread it self in those places where I have pass'd my life, I have only “ understood that Gondioch was bound to Pharamond for his Liberty, and for his Crown, “ and that it was by serving Gondioch that he fell into a part of those misfortunes with “ which you tax him; and I have heard more, that with whatever passion Pharamond
 “ was inspir'd for the Princess Rosamond, he was content not only to yield her to Gondioch, “ though never oblig'd to him by any benefit, but would have engag'd himself never to “ have seen her during his life, if Gondioch would have restored her liberty, and what he “ had gained in the Dominions of the King her Father, by the Arms of Pharamond: and “ that Gondioch had not only refus'd to Pharamond this little favour he demanded after so “ great obligations, but presently treating him as his mortal enemy, would have seiz'd and

“ detain’d his person in Marobuda, and in all the pursuit of the war seem’d obstinately “ resolv’d to take away his life, though Pharamond continually gave him proofs of the “ friendship and esteem he had yet for him. For Gondemar I will not accuse him of any “ thing, and I believe he may have both merit and valour, but besides that in all things
 “ I hold him inferiour to Marcomire, and less worthy of the fortune I have wish’d him,
 “ I believe that the Princess would not take your part, but consent rather to the happi“ ness of her Defender than Enemy.

If we were two Cavaliers, (said Theodora, regarding me fiercely) I believe we should willingly fight in this quarrel. “ That might be, replied I, and I wish not only that we “ were two Cavaliers, but that you were Gondemar, and I Marcomire, and that we were “ to dispute the glory to save the Princess. If I were Gondemar, and you Marcomire, replied Theodora, the effect of your wish would soon happen, and I assure my self, that we should not have attended so long to end our difference by a combat. “ If the event, said I, “ were to be like to that of the Combat already fought between those two Princes, I be“ lieve you would take time to remember your self. I do not believe, replied Theodora, that either Gondemar or Marcomire can have forgot it, or if that have happened, I assure my self by the recital I have heard made of him, Gondemar is brave enough to renew the remembrance when he pleases. “ if the Princess will permit me, replied I, I will accept “ the defiance for the Prince, whose part I take, and by what I have heard publish’d, I “ hope I shall not be disowned.

We talked in this manner with so much vehemence that it gave great divertisement to Albisinda, and having hearken’d patiently to us, till those words, I have once already seen, said she, the spectacle you propose, but though in that Combat the courage was equal, and the strength of those two Princes little different, the advantage (said she, turning towards Theo- dora) was not on your side; and I will add, that my prayers were not for him, and in that action, I made a great difference between him who fought for my defence, and him who would have made me the Prisoner of Gondioch, which may inform you, that in the choice you have made, I shall not be of your party.

Theodora remained like one Planet-struck at this discourse of Albisinda, and walked a little while up and down before she could return an answer, but soon alter, lifting up her eyes from the ground, where she had fixed them, I cannot but be much dissatisfied, my Princess, said she, that you have given to Ericlea so great a victory over me; it is thus, that innocently injustices are done, when truths are not well known; I have heard it spoken by persons who have seen Gondemar since the Combat, not only that he had no design to make you the captive of Gondioch, but that he was become yours from the first moment he saw you, and enslaved in a captivity which would endure as long as his life.

After the advantage which the Princess had pronounc’d me with her fair lips, methought, that modestly would not permit me to aggravate the misery of the vanquish’d, and therefore I permitted Theodora to speak without deigning to reply, when at the turning of an Alley, we saw the Princess Rosamond appear with her Ladies, who came to seek Albisinda in those walks. So soon as the two Princesses drew near each to other, Albisinda breaking silence, I come my Sister, said she, from hearing the most pleasant dispute in the world, and if the interest you have in’t would have permitted you to have hearken’d to it, I should have been glad you had heard your part; for in fine, never were two Champions more courageous, nor more zealous to maintain a quarrel, than these two Damsels have appeared, (said she, pointing to us) the one for Pharamond, the other for Gondioch.

She would say no more at present, not extending her self upon the interest of Gondemar and Marcomire, in which her own seem’d a little concerned; but as Theodora was the most discontent, she first brake silence, and addressing her self to the Princess Rosamond with sufficient boldness, I assure my self Madam, said she, that if our dispute had been made before you, the event had been more advantageous for me, than now it hath prov’d, and that you would have took my part, if not as most dear, yet at least, as least odious. I see well, answered the divine Rosamond, that you are for Gondioch, but I know not if the assistance you expect’d from me, had been so favourable as you hope; and all that I could have said the most advantageous for your party, is, that Pharamond ought to be odious to me, but that Gondioch truly is; that I hate Pharamond by his misfortune and by my duty, but Gondioch for his fault, and by my inclination; and though concerning the merit of their persons, I will not make any comparifon, the difference I should allow, would never be for the advantage of Gondioch.

I know not Sir, how to express the joy I resent to hear this great Princess express her self so nobly and generously in your favour. The Princess Albisinda appeared highly contented, tented, nor was there any person in the company, but testified a great satisfaction, only Theodora, who even swell'd with spleen and shame.

After that day, the Princess of the Sueves, to divert her self, called us often by the names of those whose parts we had took; and seldom was it that she saw us enter her chamber, but she saluted us by the names of Gondemar and Marcomire; many persons following her example, accusom'd themselves to call us after the same manner, and such a habit was at length got of it, that they called us not oftner by the names of Ericlea and Theodora, than they did by those of Marcomire, and Gondemar. I found in my own thoughts much sport in this adventure, and if I could have imagined that Theodora had been truly Gondemar, as I was truly Marcomire, I had admired this fantastick effect of love and fortune, which having made us encounter in a fight, wherein both the one and the other failed but little of losing his life, two men touch'd with equal interests in the passions of their Brothers, should in the same day, and upon the same occasion, conceive the same passion in their souls, inspire both with the same design, and bring them to live under their true names in a place where they were equally unknown. As I proved in truth; a part of this adventure in the person of Ericlea, I imagined sometimes, that the other might meet in that of Theodora, and this thought enter'd sometimes so strongly into my mind, that it begat in me a jealousy and trouble, and made me consider the actions of Theodora more exactly than I had done before, to find some means the more easily to clear me of the suspicions I had conceiv'd. However it seem'd to me that I had sufficient subject of satisfaction, by the advantages I had over her; and though Theodora by the vivacity of her spirit, by the good grace she had in all her actions, and by an extraordinary merit oblig'd the Princess to consider her more than all the other Ladies that attended her; yet I observ'd, that in the treatment she made us, there was a notable difference, and that though she had a part in those caresses which proceeded from the sweetness and civility of the Princess, her secrets and things of trust began to be confer'd on me alone; yet by this advantage I was not touch'd with all that joy it might have made me sensible of, when I beheld Theodora only as a Lady; but when I began to imagine by many great appearances, that under the habits of Theodora Gondemar might be conceal'd, as Marcomire was under those of Ericlea, I received an entire contentment, and was highly contented with the sweetness of my condition.

The impatience with which Theodora supported my being preferred before her, caus'd my suspicions to augment, and principally, when I saw her observ'd with some dissatisfaction, by persons who took part in her interests. We were one day together, with many other Damselfs, in the chamber of the Princess, and because she would busie her self that day in curious works of Tapestry, she made some be given to all that were in the chamber to work on, and to Theodora and my self as well as the rest. You may judge my Lord, that I found my self in a strange trouble at this accident, not knowing in what manner to behave my self: However I took the Needle, and assay'd to imitate what I saw done, at the hazard of spoiling it, rather than declare my ignorance. I had endeavour'd to make some points in great disorder, when one of the Damselfs of the Princess; who was very near Theodora, having cast her eyes upon what she did, took her work, which she had wrought quite contrary, and showing it her companions with a great laughter, pray'd them to look upon the work of Theodora. She blush'd for some time at this Mockery of the Damselfs, but a little after being embolden'd, I confess, said she, that I am ignorant in this exercise, and that I never yet learn'd it; but if you cast your eyes on Ericlea's work, (continued she, laying her hand upon it) you will see that she is no better skilful than I, and as well merits a part of your laughter.

This report likewise made me blush, but being recovered in a short time, and having snatch'd my work to me in a great chafe, to hinder Theodora from taking it: You shall not have that pleasure, said I, and it shall suffice, that I confess that I am possibly no more skilful than you in this sort of work, without giving you farther satisfaction. "I believe indeed, (said Mathilda, to answer me with a malicious sigh) that Ericlea is no more skilful than Theodora, or rather that the affairs of Marcomire are in no better condition than those of Gondemar. So that their fortune be equal, replied Imbergida to her, you have no reason to complain. "I know not, said I again, whether this equality will content her, but for my part, I shall not be at all satisfied; and I do not believe that Marcomire, whose name they give me, would suffer in his fortune with Gondemar. I believe, replied Theodora, that Gondemar would suffer it less than Marcomire, and since I have so much taken his part, I will consent no more than Ericlea.

This discourse had possibly pass'd further, if it had not been interrupted by persons who entered entred into the Chamber : And I remember Sir, that it was the same day that Prince Ezimir, who was return'd some days before to Marobuda, having driven out of the Territories of the King of the Cimbrians, those Burgundians which remain'd under the Command of Contran, came to Lisurgis, to give a visit to the Princess Rosamond. He was very nobly receiv'd, as well for the esteem which the merit of his person might cause, as out of the acknowledgments which the thought due to his Services. I saw him the same day in the Chamber of Albifinda, whom he came to visit, and I observ'd in his person so many great and heroick things, that next to you my Lord, I believe I never saw any thing which surpass'd him, or possibly could equal him : and though your interest made me look upon him with some distast, as the most to be fear'd of all your Rivals, by the advantages of merit and valour, it could not stop my eyes to those qualities, to which notwithstanding the Competitorship that renders you enemies, you would without doubt give part of your esteem.

I was much confirm'd by the modesty with which I heard him speak of you the day following, in the apartment of the Princess Rosamond, whither I had accompanied Albifinda, and where before Briomer, (who was that day come to Lisurgis) and who boasted to Rosamond of the valour and puissance of the Princes which were engag'd to give your head to the King of the Cimbrians, he condemn'd the rashness of those, who durst promise the head of such a King as Pharamond, in terms full of disdain of them, contenting himself to tell the Princess, that he would certainly fight for her quarrel, to the last drop of his blood, but that he would not promise the head of a man, who knew well how to defend it both against him, and all the men in the world. On the morrow he was led to the Chase by the Officers of the Princess, who was pleas'd to give him this divertisement, and as you understood Sir, he was assaulted by a Troop of Assassins, who having found him without other Arms than his Sword, whilst they were arm'd Cap-a-pe, had without doubt depriv'd him of his life, without the assistance which you gave him, and of which, I, with infinite astonishment, learn'd the particulars from Albimer who was with you. At night he was brought back to Lisurgis extremely wounded, where the Princess, very much afflicted at this accident, receiv'd him with infinite marks of sorrow, and caus'd him to be attended with all diligence imaginable. On the morrow those that dress'd him, assur'd him that his life was in no danger, though the cure of his wounds would be tedious, and the day following it was that you arriv'd at Lisurgis, presented your self before Rosamond, and having escap'd the fury of Briomer, were made Prisoner, and conducted to Marobuda.

I do not at all doubt my Brother, said Pharamond, interrupting Marcomire, but it was to your assistance I was engag'd for my life, and if it were not too unfortunate to be dear to me, continued he embracing him, you may judge how much I should be oblig'd to you. Though my fortune, replied Marcomire, had not conducted me in so favourable a moment, to render you this little service, your life was too dear to the Gods, to forsake it in that necessity : and the Princess Rosamond had done without doubt what you see her do immediately after, and which hindred me from doing any more, for fear of prejudicing instead of serving you : for as I saw that you offer'd your breast to the Sword of Briomer, without testifying any intention of defending your self, if Rosamond had not oppos'd his design as she did, I had cast my self upon him, and strangled him with my hands, if I could have found no other Arms to punish his cruelty.

The Princess rescued you from that danger, and the care she took for your preservation, appear'd not only in that first obstruction of the cruel intentions of Briomer, but in what she did to draw you out of his hands, and put you into those of Cloderic : though I well knew her intention was favourable to you, and that she would oppose all danger which might threaten your life, yet I could not assure my self, but following those that led you away, so soon as I saw them depart, I call'd several times Cleomer, whom I had taken notice to be with you, forgetting entirely the personage of Eriolea, in an encounter indeed sufficiently important to make me lose the remembrance of my interest, when Imbergida, who followed me, coming behind me, and stopping me by my Coats What do you mean my Lord, said she, so low as not to be understood by any person, or what do you hope from this action, but the loss of the King your Brother and your self? Ah Imbergida, said I, my life is of little importance, when that of Pharamond is in danger, that on such an occasion I remember no more Marcomire, though I cannot forget Albifinda. I spoke many other words, by which I made her know, that in the trouble which possess'd me, I could no longer think of Eriolea : but she represented so well the danger to which I should expose you, by making known that your Brother was disguis'd like a Damisel in the Court of the Cimbrian King, where where you were at present Prisoner, and the little service I could do you in the condition I was, and by the noise I made, that she induc'd me to resolve to try ways more favourable to your assistance, and led me backwards towards the Princesses, from whom I had hopes of all assistance, disposing my self however, if they were wanting, to quit that very day the habit I wore, and prepare my self to attempt other enterprizes for your deliverance.

We found the two Princesses yet in the same Alley where this strange adventure happened, and though Rosamond were extremely troubled, she saw me no sooner approach with Imbergida, but turning her self towards the Princess Albifinda, whose disturbance appear'd no less than hers. You see my Sister, said she, that it is not only with words that Ericlea knows how to defend Pharamond, I know not whether in the same occasion Theodora would have done so much for Gondioch. I scarce know well my self, (replied Theodora, who was present at this discourse, and had been at all that had pass'd) whether I should have been so bold, but I believe there are few Damsels so courageous as Ericlea. This Discourse of Theodora, made me well judge, that the action I had done, might have given her great suspicions of the truth, and being willing to say somewhat which might in part smother them, As I expos'd not my self to any great danger, replied I, so I testified no extraordinary courage in what I have done: and I dare say, that though I am in effect more affectionate for Pharamond than for Gondioch, yet I have done nothing for Pharamond, I would not have done for Gondioch in the same necessity: for the life of two Princes, such as they, is too considerable in the world, not to merit a like assistance from all persons who could give it. All the company approv'd my discourse, but though Theodora likewise testified her approbation, she made me guess by her behaviour, she would not let her self be perswaded as I desir'd.

In the mean time we followed the Princesses who retir'd, and when they were in their appartments, Albifinda having caus'd me to be call'd into her Closet, and seeing me alone with her, My dear Ericlea, (said she) *because you are as discreet as you are courageous, I cannot hinder my self from confessing that the Action which you have done to day much augments the Affection I had for you: For though the misfortunes which are come to pass, suffer me not to love King Pharamond, I find so much innocence in the Injuries which he hath done us, and so many admirable qualities in his Person, that I cannot possibly hate him, at least so much as to wish him ill, nor yet to suffer it without displeasure: I make to you this Confession without any Scruple, and to testify to you my entire Confidence, I will tell you in recompence of your handsome Action some News will not be displeasing to you: I will tell you then, that the Life of the King of the Franks, in which you so much interest your self, is not in any danger. That the Princess Rosamond, whose power as you know in the absence of the King is absolute over the Cimbrians, causes Briomer to depart to morrow towards the King, under a pretence which permits him not to find any way to excuse the Journey, and that during his absence, Cloderic, who is a Creature of the Princesses, and whom she can entirely command in all things, will set Pharamond at liberty: It is not necessary that I recommend to you this as a secret, you know it of great importance, and you will judge well that I would not trust it to you if I did not dearly love you, being certainly assur'd that Rosamond hath not reveal'd it to any but my self.*

These words Sir begat in me as you may well judge, all the joy I could possibly receive, and not being able to dissemble it, I fix'd my lips to one of the fair hands of the Princess, and kissing it a thousand times, with a transportation enough to have discover'd me, if she had well observ'd it, "I praise the Gods, said I, and my good fortune, which hath brought me to those occasions to dedicate my Life to the service of a Princess so good and so generous: I cannot hold the misery of Pharamond so great as he without doubt himself believes it, since in the midst of his misfortunes you yet reserv'd for him this noble compassion. I told her in pursute many other words, which express'd the joy I resent'd for the News she had told me, and a little after lifting up my eyes upon her face, with a little more fear and less confidence, than when I spoke of Pharamond, and beholding her with a passionate behaviour, "But my Princess, said I, since you permit me to interest my self in the Fortune of one Criminal, will not you pardon me if I take some part in that of an Innocent, whom you have told me so often I resemble, by whose name you every day call me, and who (to strengthen my self more firm to his interest) hath no less passion for you, by what I have understood, than the King his Brother hath for the Princesses of the Cimbrians? Will you not my fair Princess, that I demand, whether that Marcomire who dies for you, and who hath never offended you: That Marcomire whom you have assisted with your Cares, and honoured with your Visits, whilst his Wounds kept him near you: And that Marcomire, who during that happy time; hath possibly made you know that he adores you, can merit any place in your memory; whether his person be

“not Odious to you, as you have testified to me: whether his Actions have never displeas’d you: Or whether his love could come to your hearing without incensing you, will you not permit him to believe, that your heart is touch’d with some Sensibility, and that he may yet hope a small part in your precious Memory?”

Whilst I spoke in this manner, the Princess lifted up her hand to her Face, to hide those blushes that dy’d her Fair Cheeks, and after she had kept silence a small while, “You are not wise Ericlea, (said she, in a manner wholly languishing) to ask me such strange questions, and I shall perhaps be no wiser than you if I study to answer you seriously: but since I have done so much, and have reveal’d to you the secret of another which should have been kept Sacred, I ought not to be reserv’d in my own, of which I alone am Mistress, and therefore with the same Confidence I have already testified to you, and which I would only repose in you, I avow to you, that neither the Person nor Affection of Marcomire, if he hath truly any for me, are at all Odious to me, and that at the first moment of his sight, I conceiv’d an inclination for him, of which my heart had not till then been capable, that all I have since observ’d in him (as well the qualities of his person, as the proofs of an affection which he hath let me very well know, though he never entirely declar’d it to me) hath confirm’d it in my mind. And in fine, if the misfortunes of our Families, or the hatred of the King my Father, oppos’d not it self to all those favourable thoughts I have for him, I should prefer him before all men in the World. “O too happy Marcomire, (cried I, wholly transported with joy at this Discourse) Why is it not permitted thee entirely to rejoyce at thy Fortune? Or rather why is it not permitted Ericlea that knows it to become Marcomire? “This Metamorphosis, (said the Princess to me sighing,) cannot easily happen nor can I my self with it, for if to the affection I have for Marcomire, were joyn’d that I bear Ericlea, I should without doubt be transported to too great an excess for him. And if, (replied I, very warily,) from under the figure of Ericlea you should see appear Marcomire, would you not preserve all that affection you have both for the one and for the other? As this would be, (replied the Princess,) an Adventure which I never expected, I know not well how I should use it, though I am not perhaps ignorant how I ought to do it, but because it is a thing I ought not to desire, I will not so much as think it can ever happen. These words though pronounc’d with an Air full of sweetness, repress’d my boldness, and stopp’d a violence which carried me insensibly to Discourses enough to have discover’d my self. Albifinda was perhaps surpris’d to see me remain confus’d as I was, and prepar’d her self possibly to demand the cause of some signs of astonishment she observ’d in my Countenance, when Theodore under some pretence which excus’d that liberty, entred into the Closet: it was this time alone I was not displeas’d at the interruption she ordinarily gave to our entertainments, nor could I find my self very much troubled at her arrival.

I pass’d that night in a great perplexity of different thoughts, and besides the inquietude which in despite of the assurances she gave me, I suffer’d continually for you, I found things in my Condition which did strangely moderate the joy which I might feel for the happiness Albifinda declar’d to me. It is true, that in the Confession she had made me of her good intentions for Marcomire, I found some subject to rejoyce at my Fortune greater than I could have desir’d, and that by the reflection I made on those obliging words by which she express’d her self in my favour, I gave my self up to a joy I could not contain: But in the end thinking of her last words by which she had made me judge that the change of Ericlea into Marcomire would not be agreeable, though I found not any thing to counterballance a joy so great and lawful, yet I observ’d wherewithal to cross it with great disturbances, and to employ my Spirit to seek other inventions than those I had propos’d to my self: In sum, my joy gain’d the Victory over all that which could trouble it in things that regarded my Love. And as nothing was so ardently desir’d of me, as to see Marcomire beloved of Albifinda, and that I my self did not propose this happiness, but as a happiness to which I should difficultly aspire, the assurance I had receiv’d from the mouth of this amiable Princess put my Soul in fine in that condition of satisfaction which nothing was capable to discompose but the fear I had of your safety.

Not but that I had an entire Confidence in the words of Albifinda, or that I did not believe that the Princess Rosamond might easily execute what she had resolv’d in your favour, but as that business was a thing of so great value as your Life and Liberty, nothing could assure me against the fear that perplex’d me. As I was in a condition not to enterprize any thing in that Country for your deliverance, and that I thought it to less purpose to remove my self from you to seek assistance in Franconia, I would have sent Clotarius who remain’d with the Son of Imbergida, but that Imbergida represented unto me that I ought to attend some days the effect of Rosamond’s Designs, and that if I saw Briomer return from the Voyage he made to the King, without Rosamond's having executed what she promis'd to Albifinda, I might entertain things after the loss of that hopes which possibly before might give some obstructions to those intentions design'd in your favour.

I passed in this manner some days in great perplexity, though every moment I received from the Princess Albifinda new assurances, and in the end the affair was perfected as she had promis'd, and the Princess Rosamond going one night to Marobuda, with a private Retinue, and in so much secrecy that no person had knowledge of it, executed what she had resolv'd, caus'd you to be set at liberty, and that same night returned to Lisurgis with as much diligence and privacy that her departure was never perceiv'd. I will not tell you my Lord, what was my joy when I understood your deliverance from the mouth of the Princess of the Sueves, but you will I hope do me the favour to believe that nothing in the world was ever able to touch me so powerfully as the consideration of your safety.

When I was delivered from this cruel care, I dedicated my self wholly to my Love, resolving to sacrifice it to the rest of the time I had to stay near Albifinda, which could not be long, by reason of the approaches of a war for which they made so great preparations, and by which I was to be recalled to your assistance, notwithstanding all that my love could do, to persuade me to stay near Albifinda; for this reason I endeavour'd to make use of that time as much as possible, and us'd all my endeavours to gain the heart of my Princess, either for Marcomire, or for Ericlea, or for both together, and the confidence she had given me of the good opinion she had for Marcomire gave me the liberty to speak to her often concerning him, and I lost no occasion to tell her all things I thought expedient to retain her in those favourable thoughts she had of him.

Believe not however my Lord, that I thought only of my self, or that your interest was not as present in my memory as my own; from those private discourses I had with Albifinda concerning the fortune of Marcomire, I pass'd often to that of Pharamond, and as she had permitted me to take his part, and had approv'd what I did for him, I spoke boldly to her for him, and oblig'd her as much as was possible to favour you with the Princess Rosamond: I endeavour'd dayly to understand what place you held in her esteem, and one night having press'd her by that liberty she gave me; I have already told you, said she, that I am not Mistress of the secrets of another as of my own, however I will tell you concerning what you desire of me, that not only Rosamond doth not hate, but that she cannot hate Pharamond, and that if among all men she could ever love any man, she could never have loved but only Pharamond, whom alone she thinks worthy of her, and in comparison of whom she looks upon all others with disdain; however she will act against him all those things to which she believes her self oblig'd by her duty, by her promise, and by the will of the King her Father, but she will act them with a grief which would beget a pity in Pharamond himself, had he the knowledge of it.

These were the most important particulars I could learn, though the better to instruct my self, I had contracted a strict amity with the Ladies of the Princess Rosamond, and particularly with Persinda, who is the most dear to her, and with Luciana, who being Sister to Albimer, I believed real to your interests; nor did I deceive my self in that judgment I made of her, for I found her so well inclin'd towards you, that I fail'd but little of discovering my self to her. Theodora on her part seem'd no less pressing upon Albifinda, but she liv'd with me in a far greater distrust than she had at the beginning, and by many marks made me judge that she had great suspicions of the truth. She thought at that time she had an advantage over me, which she neglected not, the News arriving at Lisurgis that King Gondioch had not only made peace with the King of the Cimbrians, who turn'd his entire hatred against you only, but that by reason of the offers he had made to serve him with all his Forces against you, he had been received as the other pretendants to the hopes of enjoying Rosamond by the head of Pharamond.

This news wrought an ill effect for Gondioch in the mind of Rosamond, and I understood from the Princess Albifinda, that if hitherto the Princess of the Cimbrians had felt a reluctance to love him, she had now conceiv'd a disdain for him, which made her look upon him as the man of the whole world least worthy of her esteem. I understood this particularly in a dispute which Theodora and my self had in her presence, and that of Albifinda: for Theodora believing she had a fair occasion to revenge her self of a reproach I had at another time made her, and not being able to dissemble the dissatisfaction she receiv'd, The time is come Ericlea, said she, that you cannot longer make use of an advantage which you have unjustly taken against me, in the interest of those Princes, of which yet and I have taken the parts; and when Gondemar shall be seen to fight near the King of the Cimbrians, and the King of the Sueves, for their quarrel, and that of the Princesses their Daughters, and Marcomire near Pharamond at the head of their enemies, there will the Princess Albisinda know well, as you desired some days past, how to put the difference she ought between her Enemy and her Defender. I make no doubt, replied I coldly, but Marcomire will fight in the quarrel of the King his Brother, and for the interest and defence of his Country; and that Gondemar will follow his Brother in that glorious enterprise for which he re-assumes his Arms: but I doubt less but that the Princesses which hearken to us will know how to make the difference they ought between a Prince that renders what is due to his honour and to his duty, and him who takes part in the infamy of his Brother. You speak unworthily in my opinion, replied Theodora, of those who are at present employed in the interests of persons to whom both you and I owe respect; but besides that, Gondioch, with his love to the Princess Rosamond, which may authorise all things, hath many great reasons to justify his proceedings against Pharamond, Prince Gondemar is no less oblig'd than Marcomire, both by his honour and his duty to fight in the quarrel of his Brother. For Gondemar (said the Princess Rosamond) he cannot be at all blam'd to adhere to the interests of his Brother, but for Gondioch, we are so much the more bound to him for the assistance he gives us, as we least expected it from him; for I expected the head of Pharamond from any other hand, rather than from that of a man who is bound to him for his Liberty, and for his Crown. The Princess of the Cimbrians pronounc'd these words with a Majesty which depriv'd Theodora of the boldness to reply, and made observable as much confusion on her countenance as there was satisfaction in mine.

In the mean time I began to be cruelly disturb'd at the preparations I saw made for the war, and the indispensable necessity which would force me so soon to absent my self from Albisinda. I heard, as I fancied, those Trumpets which call'd me on all sides, and I beheld my self with much shame under the habits of a woman, whilst all the world was cover'd with Arms; but it was not only the fear of this absence that afflicted me, and I was resolv'd, as other men might resolve, to absent themselves from what they love, flattering my self with hopes of return, as if the access of Albisinda had not been forbidden, and perhaps forbidden for ever to the Brother of Pharamond; for to hope that I could yet again return to her under the habits of Ericlea, there was little appearance, for besides that in all likelihood my deceit would be discovered during my absence, I had reason to fear, that that which might serve me for a little time, and in a solitude like to that of Lisurgis, would not have the same success in a longer stay, and in a great Court, as that of the Cimbrian King's ordinarily was. I had many times a design to discover my self to the Princess before my departure, and it wanted little that the confidence I had in her goodness, had not given me that boldness; but the remembrance of the words she had spoken on that subject, took away all my assurance for such an enterprise, not permitting me to run a hazard by which I might entirely ruine my self.

The disquiet I felt by reason of these troublesome thoughts, often chang'd my humour, and made my distraction sometimes observable in my countenance. I began to be more pensive than ordinarily, and at those hours wherein I could not be free with Albisinda, I sought to be alone, and went usually to walk in the least frequented places of the Garden and Park. I forgot my self one night after the Princesses were returned from walking, yet without thinking what judgment might be made of a Damsel who remained alone, and so late, in that solitude and obscurity, I was so much prepossessed, that I thought not of retiring with the others, but gently treading along the Alleys, I remained till night was well advanc'd. In the end I return'd towards the Castle, and because the chamber of the Princess Albisinda looked out on the Garden; I lifted up mine eyes towards the windows, and not seeing any light, I judged that she already slept.

I beheld for some time the place where all my treasure lay, with those thoughts which are not pardonable, but to persons possess'd like us with a violent passion; and in fine, I found my self importun'd by a motion of love and tenderness to sing under her window some words which I had compos'd the day before, and which I had never yet sung before the Princess; I approach'd therefore, by the knowledge I had of that place, rather than by any clearness of the night, which was extremely dark, to a place directly under the windows, and when I was just beneath them, I lean'd my self against a Palisade, directly opposite to their sight, and began to sing in a tune very passionate.

1.

THe Day star robbing th' Earth of Light doth ease
 It self beneath the Western Shore,
 Leaving to Mortals a Repose and Peace ;
 But that fair Star which I adore,
 In th' Arms of Sleep makes still my Torments live,
 And Joys in that Repose she will not give.

2.

The lovely violence of my Grievs makes me
 Disturb this pleasing silent Night, Whilst Zephyrus breaths with some regret, lest he Should discompose Climene bright :
 But pardon, fairest, day must know no name,
 'Tis only Night must shade my secret flame.

I had scarce sung these first words with a design to continue, when I heard a noise against the Palifade, on which I leaned, and casting my eyes that way, from whence my thoughts made me imagine it came, I saw something white, and notwithstanding the obscurity of the night, I in the end knew it was a woman ; as I doubted not but she had known me for Ericlea, I went towards her, and at my approach to her, I knew that it was Theodora. This encounter infinitely displeas'd me, believing this Lady (interested to observe me by the jealousy she testified, and of whom I had no less suspicions than she could have of me) would find in my action and in my song, sufficient subject to confirm her thoughts. The darkness robb'd both the one and the other of the knowledge of that confusion which this encounter might have made observable in our visages, and after we had some time beheld each other without speaking, Theodora first broke silence, How, Ericlea, (said she) at such an hour as this, and whilst all the world reposes, are you alone walking, and under the windows of the Princess ? I am not alone, replied I, since we are together ; but I should be no less astonish'd than you, to encounter you, if I were of the humour to be astonish'd at small things. But both in you, and in me, replied Theodora, walking thus late, it may be an effect of the love we have for solitude, but such singing under the windows of the Princess Albisinda, seems something strange for a Damsel, and more conformable to the condition of a Lover, than that of the Niece of Imbergida. The love of solitude, neither in you nor in any other person, (replied I, marching forwards, that we might get farther from the window, from whence our discourse might be understood) can never astonish me ; but this jealousy you testify of persons who sing under the windows of Albisinda, is very strange for a Damsel, and more proportionate to the passion of a Lover, than to the tranquillity of persons of our Sex. Damsels like you and I, (replied Theodora) are not ordinary Damsels, nor can it be thought strange, that persons oppos'd in the desire of the same thing, should be capable of jealousy ; I confess you give me infinite cause, and if I believed you of the humour to explain your self to me, as I will explain my self to you, we should soon be out of doubt and trouble.

These words, which she pronounc'd with a voice more resolute than ordinary, and pressing one of my hands with a force much different from that of a Damsel, not only confirm'd me in my suspicions, but turn'd them into a certainty, and had oblig'd me to reply to Theodora, otherwise than as to a Damsel, if I had not judg'd that it was not yet time to declare my self, and that I ought to dissemble a part of what I thought, till a better occasion, yet I did not forbear to tell her, pressing her hand with a force little inferior to hers, Go to Bed, Theodora, I have nothing to explain to you now, but when it shall be time, if what you and I believe be true, I will explain my self to you more than you desire. If you forget, said she, I shall put you in remembrance, and in the mean time you explain to me enough for me to understand what I have to do.

Finishing these words, she retired another way, and I went to seek my chamber, where I pass'd the rest of that night in a terrible discomposure ; I question'd no longer but that I was discover'd, since my secret was in the hands of a person, whom I look'd upon as my Rival, and my enemy, and I judg'd well that though Theodora would not divulge it to all the Court, for the respect she bore Albisinda, at least she would discover it to her self, and break all my designs, and all my fortunes; and moreover, I could but a few days longer defer my departure, for the Troops of the King of the Cimbrians, and his Allies, had already begun to march towards Franconia; I saw therefore by all means it was necessary for me to depart, and I would depart if it were possible, before Theodora, had time to discover me, yet I could not resolve to depart, and depart possibly for ever, without taking leave of Albifinda.

I communicated my design to Imbergida, who died with fear at the recital I made her of what had befallen me, and of what she doubted from Theodora; but having assured her, that before my departure I would dispel whatever she might doubt, I prayed her to advertise Gerontes and Clotarius of what they had to do, to facilitate my retreat. I resolv'd then not to leave Albifinda all that day as well to find time to tell her what I had in my heart, as to hinder Theodora from entertaining her. But I was scarce out of my chamber when I encountered Theodora, and I found her so chang'd, by the grief I observ'd in her eyes, that she was scarcely to be known. She pass'd by without speaking to me, when a thought which came then into my mind, stopp'd me, and seeing that our discourse could not be understood by any person, Theodora, said I, we will explain our selves in few days if you will, and in the meantime I promise I will not discover what I believe of you, if you will do the same with me. I would do it, said Theodora, if our fortune were equal; but since yours is much better than mine, you cannot think it strange if I cross it as much as possible. Consider, said I, that that revenge which would be pardonable in the Kinswoman of Mathilda, will not be honourable in the Brother of Gondioch. As the Brother of Gondioch, (replied she) is an enemy sufficiently terrible for the Brother of Pharamond, I shall have generosity enough to expose him to others.

Concluding these words, she went away, leaving me in a resolution to execute my design, and to hasten my departure as soon as possible. In this thought I went immediately to Albifinda, whom I left not all the morning, not finding any occasion to entertain her particularly, by reason of the great company continually with her, though during that time Theodora came not into the chamber. The two Princesses dined together, and soon after they saw arrive Briomer with an order from the King of the Cimbrians to the Princess his Daughter, to depart in two days towards a City on the Frontiers, which he appointed them, to be there ready to march with him at the head of his Armies into Franconia. This order extremely displeas'd Rosamond, who was not prepared for this expedition, and who had not possibly any design by her presence to animate her Lovers to the ruine of Pharamond. However she told Briomer that she would obey, and Briomer having manifested that the design of the King of the Sueves no less than of the King of the Cimbrians, was not to separate the two Princesses, and that Albifinda was to go the journey as well as Rosamond, they comforted each other mutually, by the satisfaction they had to remain together, and at the same moment they gave their orders to prepare all things ready within two days.

I could not presently judge Sir, whether I ought to afflict my self or rejoyce for your interest, at the journey of Rosamond, but for mine, I was not at all troubled that Albifinda approached towards us, and I hop'd the events of the war might breed occasions to see her much better than if she were returned into Suevia. In the mean time I kept my self still near her, to hinder the access of Theodora, who presented her not self all that day. And when it was a little late, whilst the Princess Rosamond was in conversation with Prince Balamir, who had that day first left his chamber, and who was to stay some days longer at Lisurgis, to complete his recovery; Albifinda went forth to walk in the Garden, and from thence pass'd into the Park, and into the same Alley where you presented your self to Rosamond.

She walk'd here some time with those persons which had followed her, but having observ'd in my looks that I had a great desire to entertain her, leaving the rest in the middle of the Alley, she went leaning on my Arm, to one of those two Arbours which are at the two ends, nor was this that which was nearest to the Garden, but that on the Forest side, and very near that little door by which you entred. But scarce were we in the Arbour, and scarce did I begin to open my mouth to seek pretences for my departure, to which I was so much oblig'd, and to testify to the Princess the grief I had to leave her, when by that little door of the Park, we saw Theodora enter, and advance towards the Arbour with a countenance yet more chang'd than it appeared in the morning, and many marks of sadness, that had they sprung from another cause, they had mov'd no small pity.

I confess to you, her presence made me tremble, as she enter'd into the Arbour, and so soon

ſon as ſhe perceiv'd it, " You have reaſon to fear, ſaid ſhe, ſee here your accuſer, but if " I am yours Ericlex, I am likewiſe Theodora's, and you ought not to complain of me;
 " if I do not diſcover your crime, but with confeſſing my own. See here two offenders
 " Madam, (continued he, caſting himſelf at the feet of Albitinda,) and I hold them equally " criminal, by the belief I have that you have been equally ignorant of the Crime both of " the one and the other. You might have been yet ignorant of it, and I might have ſpar'd
 " you that diſpleaſure this knowledge may give you, if that which I ſee of my own miſery
 " inſpiring me with deſpair, had not robb'd me both of reaſon and diſcretion. The true
 " Brother of Pharamod, and the true Brother of Gondioch, whom you ſee before you, have " equally deceiv'd you under the Shapes of Ericlex and Theodora. Chance without doubt
 " inſpired them with the ſame deſign, their paſſion may have been alike, and poſſibly there " is little difference in their merit, but there hath not been the like in their fortune, for I " have had the ſorrow not only to ſee Ericlex preſerv'd before Theodora, but to ſee Marco-
 " mire gain all ſorts of advantages over Gondemar. I know not whether reaſon or fortune " have given him this victory over me, and as I have not believ'd my ſelf to be his inferi-
 " our, neither in Birth nor Courage, and am aſſur'd that in all that thoſe qualities may make " one ſuffer, and make a paſſion agree, mine hath not at all yielded to his. I have ſuffer'd
 " his happineſs and my own miſery, as much as was poſſible, but in the end my conſtancy
 " and my hope have equally abandon'd me: and ſeeing my ſelf reduc'd to that neceſſity to " dye for you, I had rather loſe my life in ſerving your party, than ſacrifice it here by my " grief to the fortune of my Rival. I ſhall at leaſt have this advantage over him, to fight " in your Quarrel, and if he appears at the head of the Franks, as he ſhall ſee me at the " head of the Burgundians, we will diſpute with our Arms the glory to dye for you. " A" dieu Madam, (continued he embracing her knees,) pardon in the unfortunate Theodora, " the boldneſs of Gondemar, and permit him to hope, that if in his Life his love cannot touch you, he may ceaſe by his death to be odious to you.

Concluding theſe words, he roſe from the feet of the Princeſs, where he had hitherto continued, and letting a Veil fall over his face, which we ſaw cover'd with tears, he departed out of the Arbour, but having made two ſteps, turning his head towards me, Thou mayſt remember Marcomire, ſaid he, that I have not been willing to expoſe thee to the anger of the Cimbrian King, but have reſerv'd all my revenge to the Sword of Gondemar. After theſe words, he ran towards the little gate of the Park, which was very nigh, and diſappear'd from our eyes in a moment.

Though he had ſpoken to me words fierce enough to merit ſome answer, I neither reply-ed to him, nor was in a condition to do it, for when I ſaw him approach the Princeſs, he had ſo fill'd my Soul with fear and grief at the ſame time, that I was incapable of all things. So ſoon as ſhe had begun to underſtand the truth, from the mouth of Theodora, ſhe fell upon a ſeat of Turf behind her, and leaning againſt the branches of which the Arbour was compos'd, had hearkned to his diſcourſe in the poſture of a perſon to whom aſtoniſhment had ſcarce left any knowledge. She remain'd yet in the ſame condition, after the departure of Theodora, and as if ſhe had fear'd to obſerve the confuſion which in all likely-hood ought to appear in my Face: She durſt not liſt up her eyes, but held them fix'd on the earth, with her whole perſon immoveable, little different from a Marble Statue: I well obſerv'd in her behaviour, that ſhe was lively afflicted, and as by the knowledge I had of the ſweetneſs of her ſpirit, I knew as well that ſhe was not able to break forth into violence, whatever reaſon ſhe had to be incens'd: But by this manner of expreſſing her reſentment, without altering her ſweetneſs, ſhe ſtruck me with more aſtoniſhment and fear than others could do by reproaches and threatenng words. To my aſtoniſhment there was ſtraight added a new grief, for having diſpleas'd her, and though I could difficultly repent my ſelf of an action from which I had drawn ſo much advantage, at that preſent I could have wiſhed that, though at the price of my blood, I had never undertook it: I therefore fought for no reaſons to juſtifie my ſelf, but falling at her knees, which I embrac'd with a transportation I could not command, My Princeſs, ſaid I, in the Name of the Gods; and by all that Goodneſs I have proved, abandon not to all your anger a miſerable Creature, to whom you can give no other marks, than what are fatal.

I ſpoke but theſe few words, which I likewiſe pronounc'd with ſome difficulty, and without ſpeaking more, holding faſt her knees, I by my ſilence and by my behaviour, expreſſed my thoughts better than by my diſcourſe I could have done. The Princeſs let me alone for ſome time without teſtifying any apprehenſion of what ſhe ſaw, but a little alter, returning to her ſelf, as from a long aſtoniſhment, ſhe with one hand gently puſhed me from her knees, and with the other liſting a Handkerchief to her eyes either to hide them, to dry thoſe

tears which began to flow thence; Ab! Ericlea, said she, ought you thus to have abused my Innocence, and my Goodness? Ab! Marcomire, wherefore have you deceived me? “I have deceived you my Princess, said I, I confess to my shame, but if I had not deceived you, how had it been permitted me to see you, and if I had not seen you, how had it been possible for me to live? It had been better, replied Albifinda, that you had never seen me, than to expose me to those griefs your sight must cause, and if you had truly lov'd me, you had chosen rather never to have seen me, than to see me at the price of all my honour, and all the repose of my life. “Ah my Princess, (said I, with a motion full of grief) better a thousand lives like mine, were sacrificed to your repose, and to your honour, than that the least trouble, or the least blot, should accrue to the one or the other. How, replied Albifinda, do not you trouble my repose, in exposing me as you have done, to the anger of the King my Father? Or will it not sully my honour when it shall be known to all the world, that I have kept by me in the habit of a Damself, and favoured with my most tender careffes, the Brother of Pharamond? And judge you, if there can be any thing more terrible to me, than the anger of a Father, whose severity all Europe knows, or more fatal to my honour, than the reproach you have cast on it. “The stay which I have made with you, replied I, may yet be unknown to all the world, and Gondemar hath sufficiently testified, that he will not divulge it; but when by my misfortune it shall be known, those who understand the truth, will know well that you have been ignorant of it, and that you have not at all contributed to the deceit. Yes, yes, (replied Albifinda, very hastily) I can inform those that know me, that I have not contributed to it, but it must be by punishing as I ought, and banishing from my sight for ever, a person who hath so unhappily abused my innocent goodness. I have an intention to do so, but I know not whether I shall be able to execute it, and by my misfortune you have but too much known my weakness. You have by a stratagem too contrary to the freedom of my proceeding, drawn from my heart a secret, which no complacency should have ever forc'd from thence; and you as Ericlea, have understood what Marcomire ought never to have known by my confession; this was it made you continue your crime with more presumption, but you may perhaps be deceiv'd as well as I, and you ought not to assure your self in such sort, by what you have learn'd of the thoughts I have for you, as not still to fear the effects of a just resentment, and a resentment which ought not to be less powerful over my heart, than all that it could have resent'd of most favourable for you.

Whilst she spoke in this manner, the tears from her fair eyes stream'd down her cheeks; and through all her countenance she testified so true a grief, that notwithstanding the confidence I had in her goodness, I could not hinder my self from being mortally afflicted. I remained some time without speaking, not being able to resist those effects which drew tears from my eyes as well as hers; but in the end breaking silence as it were by a great violence over my self; Princess, (said I, with a most passionate behaviour) Neither will I justify my self, neither will I murmur at whatever punishment you shall inflict on my crime, and instead of representing to you, that by its greatness you may judge that of my Love, I attend at your feet that destiny you ordain me, and submit my self to it without murmuring, though the loss of my life should be infallibly your Sentence, that is without doubt fixed to the design you have to banish me eternally your presence; but when that death should be accompanied with all could make it terrible, the fear of it shall never hinder me from obeying you, nor from finding sweetness it self in that obedience which should conduct me to my Tomb, if by that obedience I should appease your anger, and preserve to Marcomire in his Sepulcher, that which you have granted him during his life, and whilst he seem'd innocent before you. I will make you however remember to sweeten your displeasure rather than diminish my crime; that I have not so much abus'd your goodness as I might have done if my respect had been less than my love, and that I have taken care my self to deny Marcomire those liberties and advantages might have been granted to Ericlea: And that no remembrance can cause in you any confusion, nor make you repent, but that of having told to Ericlea that Marcomire was not odious to you. I aggravate possibly my offence by recalling to your memory the happiness of a man whose condition is so miserably changed in so few moments; but whence my Princess, can I find a safety if this be not declared to me? And if Marcomire was this morning the most happy of all men, why should he the same day become the most unfortunate, and most desolate, by a fault for which you your self can accuse nothing but his love? I confess there was rashness and imprudence in my enterprise: but in an age of more experience than mine, can there be found wisdom in a passion like mine? And without alledging to you the example of Gondemar, is prudence ever the companion of one so highly enamour'd?

I spoke to her in this manner with a transportation of love which she might easily observe, and to these words I added so many others (which I accompanied with so many tears, tears, as if with the Habit, I had put on the weakness of a woman) that a soul full of sweetness like that of Albifunda could difficultly preserve all her anger, and I denoted in her looks so soon as I durst lift up my eyes, that she was not absolutely determined to ruine me, and that if I knew how to manage those good intentions she had for me, it would not be impossible to appease her: And I can assure you Sir, that I forgot nothing of all that my love could inspire me with, and I perswaded her in such manner, that without giving me a death, she could persevere no longer in her anger, and in her grief, and that both the one and the other were caused by a fault, and a misfortune, much less than what she imagined them, that in the end she permitted me to observe some sweetning in her eyes, and after I had some longer time pressed her, taking away the Handkerchief from before them to behold me; But in fine, said she, what desire you of me, and if I should by that weakness from which you draw so many advantages, pardon the fault you have committed, what do you hope? Do you expect I should still keep you with me under the habit of Ericlea, or that I should still grant you the same favours you have drawn from my abused innocence, and of which the remembrance will make me blush to my Tomb?

No Mizam (said I) I would desire nothing of you which may give you any disturbance, and besides that I aspire not to a happiness I have so little merited, the fear I have to be discovered by a too long stay near you, would make me resolve to take leave of you this very day, and run to those occasions to which you know I am called both by my Honour and my Duty; but in absenting my self from you, I have hopes it shall not be forbidden me to seek the means to see you again, to serve you and to please you if it be possible, which I may hope to do by time, favourable events, and the assistance of Prince Viridomar, no longer an enemy to our house, whatever change there may be in the humour and abatement of the anger of the King your Father: Nor am I my self forbidden to hope, from my Sword and the Arms of the King my Brother, a Crown which is necessary for me to assure for the Daughter of a great King, and that in the end I may raise my thoughts to all things which may contribute to render me happy. See here, my Princess, what is my desire, and what are my hopes in absenting my self from you, and I dare hope it will be permitted me, or would willingly dye if this desire or this hope were forbidden me. No Marcomire (said the Princess in fine to me) no, they are not forbidden you, and in despite of my self, my heart consents to you that which my resentment would willingly refuse you, but abuse not again this goodness, nor render me unhappy by this weakness I testify to you.

I abuse your patience Sir, by this long discourse, and, to conclude it, suffer me to tell you in the end my fortune was such, that I not only appeas'd the Princess, but I constrain'd her to confess that she could not repent her self of the affection she had conceived for Marcomire, and consent to the design I had to undertake all things to render me happy: She was pleas'd that I should do all things possible in those opportunities that offered to assuage the anger of the King her Father, without whose consent she declared I could hope nothing; she approved particularly the thought I had to make use of Prince Viridomar, and doubted not by an equal endeavour to gain him to my part. In fine, all that I could hope from a virtue, which in its natural sweetness is full of severity, was granted me; and she assured me in such manner against the distrust I might have of the fortune of Gontemar, and all others who might have the same pretences, that on that side she put my heart in repose: but she would not that I should stay longer with her, nor present my self once more before her, nor before any other persons under the habit of Ericlea; but she was pleas'd that I should depart that same day to come towards you, permitting me to render you, against her own Party, that Service I owe you, and to seek in the course of a war, wherein she was to be present with the Princess Rosamond, all those occasions to see her which fortune could offer me: She commanded me likewise to assure you, that whatever you might fear for the time past from the Sister of Viridomar, she should not only not oppose to you with Rosamond, but continually take your part, and entertain the Princess in those inclinations which are as favourable to us as fortune is contrary.

I took my leave of her with a grief, which all the happiness which Theodora had procured me, by endeavouring to ruine me, could not hinder; when at the same instant Imbergida appeared at the door of the Arbour, and the Princess having called her, after I had justified her before her as much as it was possible, not only pardon'd her the part she bore in the deceit we had acted, but promised she would love her as much as she had done in time past, nor deprive her of the least part of that confidence she had in her.

But why Sir, should I hold you longer, after some marks of weakness which I could not refrain, I retired with Imbergida, to whom all the rest of that day I gave all the proofs were possible of my affection and acknowledgment, protesting to her, that I would all my life consider her as my Mother, and that in a time more happy I would testify to her in a more ample manner my just resentments. On her part she promised me the continuation of her assistances with Albisinda: And because her Son had conceiv'd an affection for me, which would not permit him to leave me, she permitted him willingly to accompany me in the Voyage, and that he should fix himself entirely to me.

She had already prepar'd what she would say in the Court concerning the departure of her Niece, and I doubt not at all but Matilda had done the same for Theodora: But I had dispos'd the Princess to manifest nothing to her, for fear to disclose a thing that she would have kept as secret as possible. I parted the same Night under the Conduct of Gerontes, who was come to Lisurgis with Clotarius, and marching the Day following by ways known to him, we came in the end into the Country of the Narisques, and to the City whither I had sent my Equipage, but it was not without having taken a great Compass, (out of the fear Gerontes had of encountering the King of Cimbria's Guards at the Passes) which made us spend in our Voyage twice as much time as we should have done had we come the direct way. I was afterwards retain'd at the City of Narisques, by a fall from my Horse, which injur'd me so much, as to stop me for some days: And it was by reason of these delays, Sir, that I came so late to you, and that I came not till the Day of that Battel which you gain'd with so much Glory.

The End of the First Book.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

MArcomire in this manner coucluded his Relation, and Pharamond who had hearkned with infinite attention, and with no less pleasure, when he had made an end, embracing him with a loving tenderness, I aver to you my Brother, said he, that your discourse hath given me a great satisfaction, as well for the recital of your pleasant adventures, as for the knowledge it hath given me of your interest in my fortune, and the mixture of our concerns, which blend themselves in the same quarrel, and against enemies which are common to us both. But if Fortune hath plac'd this conformity in the cause of our passions, she hath put a great and cruel difference in our conditions: And I understand with all the joy that our friendship can give me, that you are as happy in your Love, as I am unfortunate in mine: For in sum Brother, after that obstruction which you have cleared, all others that can oppose your felicity, are not considerable, and if the heart of Albisinda be yours, all the Obstructions the King her Father can raise are easie to support. For the default of a Crown, which in all likelihood is necessary to aspire to Albisinda, you ought not to afflict your self, for besides what you may hope from your Valour, and the assistance of your Arms, the Crown of Franconia cannot be wanting to you, either by the end of my life, which cannot be of long durance if my misfortunes continue, or by the change of my fortune, which permitting me to pass the Rhine, to receive that of the Gauls, to which I am call'd, will permit me to give you that of Franconia, with greater joy without doubt, than you can have in receiving it.

This generous offer of the King of the Franks, touch'd the Soul of the Prince his Brother with a resentment proportionable to the Grandeur of that Benefit he promis'd him, and and killing perforce one of his hands, which he had loas'd in his own, when he had finish'd his discourse, My Sovereign, said he, I doubt not but you may give crowns, and make Kings when you please: All the World already knows, that no force can assure the dignity of your enemies, against the power of your Arms: I would therefore receive from your liberality all that might raise me to the hopes to possess Albitinda, so that I might hold it from your good fortune: But by that misery which you have declar'd, not only the entire Empire of the World would be odious to me, but my life it self insupportable. There is however a great deal of appearance (replied the King of the Franks) that by this way you should sooner mount to the Royal dignity: And though I should hope to overcome those enemies which now oppose us, as I may hope without doubt, if Fortune be not contrary to us: yet you know, my Brother, that I have a power to resist, under which I must yield; and that in the condition to which my deplorable days are reduc'd, they cannot in all likelihood extend to any great length. Be pleas'd to permit me, replied the Prince, to oppose this opinion you have of your fortune, and since you have told me that if the heart of Albitinda be mine, all those obstacles which might appear from the hatred of the King her Father were little considerable, you may think good my Lord, that I tell you that the inclinations of the Queen of the Cimbrians being favourable to you, as without doubt they are, you may hope all things, and so much the rather hope, because she is not at present, like Albitinda, submitted to the will of a cruel Father, but by the death of hers, is Mistress of her own thoughts. I believe, replied Pharamond, in a sad tone, a part of what you tell me, and I would willingly believe to flatter my self, that it is not by her inclination that Rosamond makes War against me: but what other advantage can I draw from this belief, but that of lamenting the misfortunes of a Princess, who with some reluctancy seeks my ruine, and who will not receive that satisfaction I could wish her at the price of my Life, which she would receive without doubt, if I were not as odious to her, as she hath testified to the whole world: For in fine, my Brother, when I could hope not only that she would cease to hate me, but that she could truly love me, you know well to what she is engag'd, both by Oaths, which she cannot violate, and by a Duty, which she will all her life prefer to her inclinations. I believe they may make her forget that which the friendship of Gondich made me do against her Father and against his People. I may likewise expect that they should blot out a part of that resentment she hath against the Murder of a Prince she loved, and who ought to have been her Spouse: and to flatter my self as much as possible, I may persuade my self, that they may sufficiently open her eyes, to make her discern how little I have contributed to the death of the King her Father, of which by the same continuance of miseries, I am unhappily accus'd. But for the death of Theobaldus, whom before her eyes I slew with my own hand, I cannot comfort my self with any favourable thought, for besides that my self heard the promise she made before all the Gods, to pursue my destruction to the last of my days, when that anger which she hath conceiv'd, should be entirely pleas'd by the knowledge she hath of my innocence and grief, and when she should abandon a design to which she is engag'd by her Oaths and by her Promises, You know well that that hope on which the thoughts of all Lovers are fix'd, is forbidden to me alone, and that whilst I see all my Rivals pretend to the possession of Rosamond, I am assur'd with whatever good motion she may be solicited in my favour, she will never espouse him, who before her eyes slew her brother. "The Gods replied Marcomire, may act

"in this fortune as in the merit of men, and as they have made you different from others, by

"so many advantages which your modesty permits me not to represent to you, they may

"as well by events estranged from the ordinary course, force those obstacles which might

"oppose a common fortune, and make them possibly yield to yours. "The Gods may

"do miracles, replied Pharamond, but besides that you may judge how weak that hope is,

"which is founded upon Miracles, the misfortunes of my life are such, that they cannot

"work them in my favour in this Condition, for not being able with all their power to recal

"what is past; they cannot make me not to have depriv'd of life the Brother of Rosamond.

The desolate Pharamond had dilated himself farther on this matter, if the Prince his Brother, who well saw how much he was griev'd, had not perswaded him to talk of something else, by entreating him to tell him what judgment he made of the Enterprize and Actions of Gondemar. "I judge the same thing, said Pharamond, of his as of yours, and

"the conformity is so entire, that it will be very difficult to put any difference: But for his

"Person, besides what renown hath already publish'd of his Actions, I avow to you, that "the recital you have made me obliges me to love him, and that in all his proceedings I find

"so much Nobleness, and such greatness of Courage, that I could with all my soul wish he "might be my friend, and that he were not your Rival. "Though he be my Rival, replied Marcomire, and possibly by reason of his merit the most to be fear'd of all I need fear,

"I confess that I can difficultly hate him, and that the Generosity he hath testified in making

"me known to only Albifunda, in a time wherein he might have revenged himself of me, and
 "expos'd me to a great danger had he discover'd me to other persons, hath begot in me as "great an esteem for him, as I have disdain for the ingratitude of his Brother: And to the "purpose Sir (continued Marcomire regarding Pharamond) Will you suffer your self still "to struggle with those scruples which have made so great a War in favour of your friend"ship? And will you yet preserve for Gondioch that esteem which no less opposes your "happiness than the hatred of Rosamond? "I protest, answered Pharamond, that herein
 "Fortune hath treated me better than I durst hope, and of those two great Obstructions,
 "having taken away that which was not possibly the least in my Spirit, hath comforted
 "me in good part of my misfortune: for the first Actions of Gondioch after our Divisions, "they had not that effect which you have desir'd, and whilst he was only guilty towards "me, of a Design to seize my person in Marobudæ, of the desire he had testified to fight a"gainst me, of the defiance he sent me, of the endeavours he us'd to encounter me
 "in the battel, and in fine, of all things he enterprised in the War we made for the liberty "of Rosamond, I preserv'd still so great a friendship for him, that I could not desire my hap"piness to his prejudice: But since he hath most shamefully sought the alliance of a King
 "who was not my Enemy but for the Service I did him, and that without calling to me"mory his Wounds, and the shame he suffer'd in the Combat against Balamir, he hath "joyn'd with him, and the rest of the Lovers of Rosamond, to assault the head of Phara-
 "mond. I vow, my Brother, that I have difficultly preserv'd the least remaining Confide"ration for him, and that without being troubled, and without any sense of our an"cient friendship, I earnestly desire at present, that which at other times I durst not "desire.

The two Princes entertain'd each other in this manner: when night arriv'd, and the King of the Franks judging it time to go into the Chamber of Constance to Sup with him, was about to depart from that of Marcomire, when Valerius came to pray him on the behalf of his Master, to permit him to dedicate that night entirely to understand without any interruption, the recital of his Adventure, with which he was Charm'd in such manner that he could not suffer a moments discontinuance. Pharamond accorded to Constance what he de-sir'd, testifying however to Valerius that it was with some displeasure that he found himself depriv'd of his sight till the morrow: And a little after being entred into a great Hall, where the Princes, and all the considerable Commanders of his Army were Assembled by the Grandeur of his Courage, he to please them dissipat'd a part of that grief which might be observable in his countenance. And as he made his Greatness consist in the Glory of his Actions, rather than in Formalities, full of a vain Pride, by a custom which he daily practis'd, though different from many other Kings, he caus'd all those illustrious personages of which that fair Company was compos'd to Sup with him, and entertain'd them during the repast, with that charming affability which subjected to him the most fierce minds, and which gain'd the hearts of all that had to do with him.

After Supper he mounted on horseback at the head of that fair Troop, and with five or six hundred horse that followed him, the Night being bright and clear, he went round the Camp, and visited all the quarters as he often us'd to do, to oblige the Officers to acquit themselves exactly of their Charges, and keep themselves in a condition not to be surpris'd by the Enemy: But though he made a great Circuit, yet he return'd a great while before Constance had heard the conclusion, from the mouth of Cleomer, of the recital of his Adventures:
 And therefore bidding good night to the party that accompanied him, he devoted the rest of that night apparently to repose, but in effect to the sad Considerations of his Misfortunes, which were his inseparable Companions.

The next morning he arose very early, but having understood by Cleomer that he had not left Constance till it was extremely late, deferring for some time the visit he intended him, he employed a part of the morning in taking Orders concerning the War, and entertaining his Friends: and when he understood that the illustrious Roman was awake, and might be visited without inconveniency, he went into his Chamber: Constance no sooner saw him approach his Bed, but beholding him with a greater respect, as it seem'd, than he had done some preceding days: "Great Sir, said he, You see me yet in an admiration to which I have dedica"ted the greatest part of the night, and though I had before understood those of your Acti"ons, which made the most noise in the world, the particular recital I have now received,
 "hath given me an astonishment which I cannot express, and a veneration for you, which
 "obliges me to consider you as a man infinitely rais'd above all others. "I might, replied
 "Pharamond, make you this discourse with more reason, at least for one part of it: for from "the other I will not defend my self, and as I remain in the same opinion with you, that "there

“ there are Adventures in my life so strange as to cause astonishment, you may aver with “ me, if you please, that there is much difference between those advantages I may draw “ from some most happy Combats I have fought against the Barbarians, of which there re“ mains no fruit or benefit neither to me nor to my Country, and the glory which envi“ rons you for so many famous and important victories, which in their events have in“ terested the whole Universe, and upheld that Empire which for so many ages hath ruled “ over so many Nations.

I confess to you, replied Constance, that we have this advantage over you, to give our Actions a greater Renown in the world than you can yours; and as the Ruine or Preservation of the Empire interests the whole earth, so it seems that all the world have their eyes fixed on the least things which contribute to it: And moreover, as in our Nation, and amongst the Greeks, there have been in all Ages men more capable than among yours, to rebound the great Actions of their Captains; so it is certain, that their Glory is spread in the world, and transmitted to posterity, with an advantage which others could not find amongst a people whose ignorance or despicable of Letters hath not permitted them to render to their famous men what they might merit. There have been possibly a great number who might equal the most renowned of ours, if Fame had done them justice, whose names are scarce come to our knowledge, but amongst those whom the injury of time could not deprive of being known, to what degree of Glory do you believe might Hannibal have mounted, if he had found amongst the Carthaginians persons capable to have declared to men what they have not understood but by the recital of his enemies? His Reputation would scarce yield to the Chiefest of the Cæsars, and though a Roman as I am, I should give him the advantage of all others for Military Virtues.

“ I believe, replied Pharamond, that you may with justice do it, but as Military Vir“ tues do not alone merit that praise which may be given to great men, those who despise
 “ all others, are worthy of a part of that oblivion in which they remain clouded by igno“ rance, or by the barbarousness of their Nation: And since, to the Glory of their Arms, “ by which the Romans have rendered themselves Masters of the world, they have known
 “ how to joyn those noble Sciences by which they are rais’d so many degrees above barba“ rous people; it is with too much reason that they are become Masters, and that they “ have extended their Rule and Domination over those men who scarce know how to “ discern Empire from Servitude.

Having been born (added Constance) among men whose warlike inclinations make them neglect all other things, it seems to me my Lord, that for any of those Sciences you so much esteem, you have no reason to envy either the Greeks or Romans, and that in this advantage you no less excel other Princes, than in that of your Arms. “ I am possibly inferior to them “ in all things, (replied Pharamond modestly) but it was not the fault of King Marcomire
 “ that I lost not a part of the rudeness of my Country by the diligence he took to educate “ me under persons of your own Country: and moreover I can say in favour of this Nation, “ that it is at present very different from other people of Germany, and that after the time “ of Genebaud, the first of our blood that inhabited it, and who covered the Banks of the “ Rhine, the Meine, and the Salâ with this Colony of Franks, of all the Princes who have “ succeeded him to my self, there was none who did not endeavour to polish the people by “ their examples, and the instructions of many strangers, whom they have called in, and “ stayed here with great diligence, and no less success. We are likewise wholly different “ in the Worship of the Gods from the other people of Germany, and that according “ to the example of the Gauls, from whom we draw our Original, we keep to the ancient “ Institutions of Drus and Samethes, we adore that God they have made us know, and re“ verence that Virgin which conceived him. For Peace, our Ancestors have made very “ excellent Laws to keep the people in Equity, honourable inclinations, and the inno“ cency of the ancient Gauls; and in war it self, we have made them in part apprehend
 “ the good usage of Valour, the justice of Quarrels, and the glory to pardon the van-“ quish’d; so that I dare assure you, that if both the one and the other were known to “ you, you would place no small difference between those people that obey me, and the “ Sueves, the Cimbrians, Turingians, or Burgundians.

I doubt not at all (replied the gallant Roman) but the worthy example of a Prince such as you are, may produce an effect yet more difficult; nor is there any thing which I should not easily hope from those admirable qualities your conversation, and the recital I have had of your Adventures have made me discover in your person: But Sir, to return again to the discourse of your Adventures, which your modesty would needs interrupt, will you not permit me to oppose a little that opinion you have of your misfortune, and that by the knowledge you have received in

In my occasions of the sentiments of Rosamond, I make you confess your fortune is much less desperate than mine? “ Ah my Lord, (replied the King of the Franks) do not flatter me, nor make any comparison between an ordinary misfortune of which the examples are familiar, and a prodigious misery of which no age can find a Precedent, for in fine, when I might find some comfort in the judgment I might make of the intentions of Rosamond, I can hope nothing in my fortune more favourable than what I at present prove, Rosamond may esteem me, but she hates me, since she arms so many thousand men against me, and though she should cease to desire my ruine, or cease indeed to hate me, nay though I should be beloved by her, I can never hope she should render me happy: For you my Lord, you are assured of the affection of Placidia, and though she be not at present in condition to give you the last proofs, Autalpb may dye, and by his death you become the most happy man in the world; but for me, unfortunate am I, far distant from being able to hope any change in my condition by the death of a Rival, or a Husband, though Rosamond should be in the same estate with Placidia, for unless I revive the dead, I can expect nothing from my deplorable destiny.

Constance was about to reply to the discourse of Pharamond, when they saw Valerius enter the chamber, and with him a man of a very noble Air, of about twenty five years of age, and who according to all appearances was a personage of great worth: the King of the Franks looking upon him instantly with an infinite esteem, rose from his place to receive him as he judged him worthy by his noble presence: But Constance had no sooner known him, but raising himself up on his Bed, transported with an affection, which he could not restrain, and reaching him his Arm in a most passionate manner; Oh my dear Artabure (said he) is it possible that I am again permitted to see you? Artabure cast himself into the Arms of Constance, receiving his embraces without reply, so much was he surpris'd to meet with so great a person, but his visage answered for him, by those tears which in a moment cover'd it, and which as soon attracted those of the afflicted Constance.

Being thus mutually touch'd with extraordinary affection, they remained for some time without being able to speak; but in the end Artabure forcing away his astonishment, and his grief, and recoyling two or three paces, to behold the countenance of Constance more wisely than before, Oh! our great Captain, said he, our Upholder and our Consolation, is it possible that the Heavens have once more granted me the sight of you? Yes, generous friend, replied Constance, you behold me again, and you behold me as miserable as you left me in the City of the Tectosages. This discourse brought to the remembrance of both the one and the other, things that plung'd them into a profound grief; when Constance thought of Pharamond, who beheld the interview of these two men with infinite tenderness, and addressing himself to Artabure, Artabure, said he, see there King Pharamond, and I believe by that name, I make you understand him as the man of the whole world most worthy our respects.

At these words Artabure beheld the King of the Franks with that admiration which none that saw him could deny themselves, and whilst he saluted him, and Pharamond received him both as an illustrious friend of Constance, and as a man worthy by his proper merit of sufficient esteem, Constance again breaking silence, My Lord, (said he to Pharamond) in the recital which Valerius hath made you of the History of my Misfortunes, he ought often to have spoke to you of Artabure, and he hath so glorious a part in all that we have done for the service of the Empire, that he cannot be entirely unknown to you. Renown, replied the King, hath already made me know the name of Artabure; and besides what I have understood in the discourse of Valerius, I know well that this is the valiant Artabure, which delivered Rome from the oppression of the Goths, and chased Attalus out of Italy. My Lord, (replied Artabure modestly,) I owe without doubt to that friendship Valerius may bear me, a good part of the honour you have done me by your discourse, but I cannot disown the glory, to have learn'd the mystery of War under the great Constance, and to have accompanied him in a good part of his great expeditions. Both with me, and without me, replied Constance, you have done Actions worthy of eternal memory; few Romans have signalized themselves like you, in an age like yours; but without extending our selves further on a discourse, which by your modesty you would oppose, relate to me my dear Artabure, what is the fortune which reunites us, and by what encounter so little expected, you have again found out the miserable Constance, in a Country where in all likelyhood you could not have searched him?

I will satisfy you, replied Artabure, in all things you desire of me, but the discourse I have to make, to inform you so fully as you desire, will not be so short, but it will require some hours of your attention. And I believe, added King Pharamond, that it cannot be of so little importance, but that the presence of witnesses may be suspected, and for this reason I will retire retire so soon as you shall think fit to entertain your self particularly with Constance.

Artabure answered not to these words, but by looking upon Constance, who perceiving it, broke silence; I know not (said he to Artabure) of what nature that Secret is, into which you design to trust me, but if it hath nothing more important or more particular, than there can be in all things that have pass'd, in which I have any interest, I believe the King of the Franks cannot be suspected with your discourse, if he hath time and patience to lend his attention, for there have happen'd few things either to the one or the other, of which we have not had a mutual knowledge, even to the most secret circumstances. In the discourse I have to make you, replied Artabure, there are certainly some things very particular, and of such importance, to the chief persons of the world, that they ought not to be published, but since you have made the King understand the secrets of your life, that which I have to say cannot be of greater importance, and if he can find any divertisement in the recital of those things I am to recount, I shall give it him with infinite satisfaction, and with a confidence which may oblige me to discover to him greater things.

Pharamond defended himself for some time against this civility of Artabure, but Constance testified in such sort the desire he had to hearken to the discourse of Artabure in his presence, that in the end he contented to his will, moved by the interest he took in all things that concern'd him, either in his own person, or that of his friends; but he was pleas'd first that Artabure should go and repose himself in the apartment which was prepar'd for him, the nearest possible to that of Constance, where he remained till such time as Dinner was serv'd. Constance, Pharamond, and Artabure dined together without any other company, and after the repast, the King having testified that he would entertain himself particularly with Constance and Artabure, gave necessary orders not to be interrupted; Soon after which, Artabure being seated near Constance's Bed-side, began to speak in this manner.

The History of the Emperour Honorius, of Belamira, and of Artabure.

ALL the world beheld as a Prodigy the stupidity of Honorius in the ruine of his Country, and though there was always known to have been more sweetness, or rather more fear in his disposition, than resolution and vigour, and that his weakness was look'd upon with pity, by reason of the strange power he had permitted the presumptuous Stilicon, to usurp over the Empire, and over his own disposition; yet however, in some occasions he had forced himself to testify that he wanted neither courage nor knowledge, necessary for the Government of the Estate, and after that, by the death of that puissant Favourite, he seem'd to have thrown off the yoke which he had so many years lived under, he made some appearances of a courage to shine forth, which had not before been observ'd in him, and gave the people some hope that he would render himself capable to govern them himself, without returning them into a servitude, from whence they were so lately releas'd: But in these deplorable calamities of Italy, which have touch'd with pity the most cruel enemies of the Roman name, and which might inflame to its defence the most faint-hearted resolution, he hath appear'd such to the eyes of all the world, that they could not, nor ought not attribute his forgetfulness of his Country, nor what he did himself, to his natural weakness only, nor hinder themselves from believing that his knowledge was clouded, and his very reason troubled, by some passion or snare, which rendred him incapable to act, or so much as think of succouring infortunate Italy, which he miserably abandon'd to Barbarian cruelty. We have all felt the deplorable effects, and you particularly, generous Constance, by that cruel loss which hath made you so long sigh, and it is just that you understand the extraordinary cause, as you will without doubt by my discourse.

After the death of Stilicon, those which had groan'd under the burden of his unjust authority, began to take breath, and there was great hopes of a change in affairs, as in all likelihood there would be in the condition of many illustrious Personages, and in the Government of the Empire. The Emperour himself as if he were escap'd out of Fetters, after he had so long time worn them, look'd upon himself with joy in a different condition, and made others by his example believe, that the face of things would have a more pleasing aspect. But by the misfortune of the Empire, all those people which were arm'd arm'd against its repose, invaded its Provinces on all sides, and by the particular misfortune of Rome and Italy, the great Constance march'd to the assistance of the Gauls, against Constantine, and by a misfortune which he could not foresee, going to defend distant Provinces, abandon'd his Country in a time when by his presence he might without doubt have diverted its ruine, and those terrible miseries to which a little after it was so unhappily expos'd: I accompanied him in this voyage, and therefore I cannot relate to you, the chief things I have to recount you, but only by the recital after made me, with sufficient truth and exactness.

After his departure, and that of the most valiant Captains, who with their Troops were sent into those Provinces whither necessity call'd them, the Emperour remain'd in great tranquillity at Rome, and by the love he naturally had for repose, endeavour'd to remove from his Memory all things which might disturb his quiet, seeking occasions to divertise himself with Ladies (whom his inclinations made him always love) in Walks, in publick shews, and in all other things which might yield Pleasure and Recreation. The Princess Placidia remain'd at Rome with him, and with her the charming Princess Theodolinda, Daughter to the King of the Huns, and Sister to the famous Balamir, whose Reputation Renown hath so largely publish'd: The Fair Cleomira, Princess of the Tongres, and many other Roman Ladies considerable both for their Birth and Virtue. The most valiant among the Romans were departed to the Provinces whither their warlike occasions severally call'd them, but there remain'd a sufficient number with Honorius to compose a Court worthy of an Occidental Emperour: and amongst these Heraclian, though with little merit, shone in the first degree of favour; he had rais'd himself to what he possess'd by ways which would have been odious to many others, and though in the Death he gave Stilicon, he had possibly done something unworthy of a great Courage, and by that of his Lady dishonour'd himself among vertuous personages, he was however so proud of the service he had done the Emperour, by delivering him from the Tyranny of a too potent Favourite, that he believed by this Action he merited all things, and thought nothing above his ambition.

The event made it afterwards appear, that he was not at all deceiv'd in his hopes, and the Emperour after having testified for some few days, sufficient grief for the misfortune of Stilicon, and his House, to perswade the Romans that he had not given such cruel Orders as had been executed, made it in the end be thought that the Execution had not displeas'd him, when preferring him before many personages illustrious both for their Birth and Services, he gave Heraclian the Government of Africa. In effect, the Dignity of such a Government appear'd to all the World so little proportionable to the merit and former fortune of Heraclian, that many persons found sufficient reasons highly to condemn the Conduct of the Emperour, but it was not presently that he was honoured with this Charge, there happening things which before I ought to recount in their order.

The Emperour in this time often visited the Princess Theodolinda, and as she was a Princess for Beauty and merit so extraordinary that few in the World could equal her, many persons there were that believ'd the Emperour had a great inclination for her. I cannot doubt but that he had an inclination to love her, and that if some other things had not fall'n out, he had engag'd himself more firmly. One day having sent to enquire the estate of her health, and whether he might without inconveniency visit her, Word was return'd, that she was mounted an hour before into her Chariot, and gone out of the Gates of Rome, and as it was believ'd, towards the fair Gardens of Trajan, which are seated upon the Banks of the Tibur, and which since the time of the Emperour whose name they bear, many of his Successors, and particularly the Emperour Theodosius, had diligently endeavour'd to embellish with all those Ornaments Art can add to Nature.

The Emperour having understood that Theodolinda was gone thither, resolv'd with the Princesses Placidia and Cleomira, with whom he at present was, to find her, and with her to divertise himself in those Walks: The Emperour made use of the Chariot of Placidia, with her went likewise Cleomira, and some other Roman Ladies, and in many others followed a great number of persons both of the one and the other Sex: Heraclian who at that time never absented himself from the Emperour, now accompanied him, and with him Flavian, Maximus, Anaxilla, Pontianus, and many others, among whom might be particularly consider'd the young Artius, a Youth of about eighteen years of age, born of an illustrious Family among the Romans, and who in those tender-years had already given marvellous hopes of his Courage, Spirit and Vertue.

Arriving at the Gates of the Gardens they found the Chariots of Theodolinda, and not doubting longer but she was there, this illustrious Company allighted, entred the Gardens, and in search of the Princess of the Huns began to walk in the fair Alleys. After they had visited a part of them, they saw coming towards them the Princess whom they sought, and when she was join'd to the Company, the Emperour gave her his hand, and walk'd a long time with her, and the Princess Flondra: but afterwards the two Princesses giving him to understand that they had something of secrecy to converse of he left them, and causing Heraclian to approach, began to entertain him, and to walk with him towards another side leaning upon his shoulder.
and

As Heraclian was a man of Spirit, and of a humour so much the more pleasing when he pleas'd, being us'd to flattery: the things he spoke to the Emperour divertis'd him in such manner, that he thought no longer of rejoyning with the Company, but had insensibly absent himself a great space from them, and enter'd into one of the most pleasant and shady woods in the world, which was adjoining to the great wall: The beauty of the wood being at present in its rarest season, attracted him more and more, and made him in the end resolve to visit the most solitary and retir'd places of it. The loss of his Train which remain'd not with the Ladies, observing the pleasure he took to entertain himself with Heraclian, followed at a distance, and stopt when they saw him stop, leaving him an entire liberty to speak without fear of being understood or over-heard.

Walking in this manner, he arriv'd at the most retir'd and least frequented part of the Wood, and in a place where one of the great Channels which water the Garden dischargeth it self with a murmuring noise into the Tibur, which with its silver streams washeth the utmost parts of the Wood: From this Stand the Emperour fix'd his eyes for some time on the River: till by chance casting them aside, he beheld not far distant, a woman laid down in a most verdant plat, at the foot of a great Tree, which extended its shady branches over the River, She was rested on her side, her Visage turn'd towards those streams, and her head leaning in part against the Tree, and in part on one of her hands. whilst the other negligently extended upon the grass, appear'd to the eyes of the Emperour, and of Heraclian, of so resplendent a whiteness, that they were astonish'd. I know not whether it was a hand so extraordinarily white, that gave the Emperour sufficient Curiosity to approach nearer to that person, whose simple habits, and all other appearances might make him judge but of a mean fortune. He might advance towards her without being seen, because she had her back turn'd towards him, and he might likewise approach her without being heard, and that so much the easier, because he trod on the grass, and the water falling from the Tibur made sufficient noise to hinder any thing from being heard, which he made by walking, yet it was not so great as to hinder him when he drew near this Woman, from hearing some sighs, and some complaining words, which issued from her lips, and from her breast, and this was that which yet touch'd him with a greater Curiosity for this adventure, but he was more engag'd by the sound of a Voice which had something in it so Charming, that from the outward Organs of his Ears it in a moment pass'd to his heart.

Honorius was seiz'd with so extraordinary an Affection, that he no longer needed the Solicitation of Heraclian, to advance to a place from whence he might distinctly hear the words which a violent passion made this afflicted person from time to time pronounce. It seem'd likewise by their mournful accent that they were accompanied with some Tears, and this thought adjoining pity to the Curiosity of the Emperour, made him redouble his attention, Proud Tibur, said this desolate person, Thou River proud with the Spoils of so many Nations, can it be, that amongst all those miserable persons thou hast drawn into thy servitude, thou never bebeldest any so unfortunate as she who this day miserably groans upon thy Banks, or that the miseries of so many Slaves, which on thy Rives have followed the vanquishers Chariots, should have nothing in them comparable to those that persecute me? Yes it may be, since so it hath pleas'd my cruel Destinies, and this Fortune which hath rendred thee famous by the ruine of so many people, will likewise that I increase thy Waves by these Tears I give thee. Oh my Eyes, added she a little after, Pour out at length the source of a River of Tears, which no length of time ought to stop, and since you are accus'd for a part of my misfortunes, serve no longer to any other use but to deplore them to the last moment of my Life, for you cannot let me behold the Heavens without accusing them of some rigour, at the remembrance of those sad Calamities to which our miserable Fortune is expos'd: Nor turn your looks to Earth, but to see Objectis much different from what you have lamented, and renew by the sight of all such as may be presented to you, the remembrance of that which you have miserably lost, and of the deplorable estate of my Condition.

This afflicted person might possibly have said more, mov'd by the violence of a grief, which troubled her reason, making her express her thoughts by words, and endeavouring by a discourse, which sobbs and sighs every moment interrupted, to make room for a part of what she felt within. if while the Emperour was the most fixed to the attention of these doleful and mournful plaints, another woman whom he had not seen, but who had discovered him from a place a little farther distant, had not risen up and advanced towards her that thus lamented, to advertise her of the presence of the Emperour. This advice made her raise her self up with no small haste, and by this change of posture, having made the Emperour observe the beauty of her person, which was admirable, she strongly increas'd the desire he had to see her face; I believe however, that he had been depriv'd of that satisfaction, if she could have found the means to have avoided his sight, but as with her back towards him, she could not advance but very few paces, either towards the River, or towards the Channel, though she had a design to retire her self from that place, and that she feared to displease the Emperour, who was known by her companion, she was constrain'd to turn towards him, and permit him to see her face against her will. But O Gods! what sight was that? Or by what discourse can I express it to you? That of a Lightning which with surprisal smites our eyes, or at least that of the most beautiful Rayes of the Sun, when dissipating the Clouds, it makes the day serene and fair, might be compared to it, but hath nothing so marvellous. Honorius was dazled, and Heracian remain'd immoveable through an excess of astonishment; it may with truth be said, that nothing could appear to any eye, capable to transport the Spirit with a more just admiration, nor wound the Soul with a blow more powerful, and less foreseen. The eyes of this admirable person, though swollen with tears, in the midst of a charming sweetness, which accompanied all their motions, and an amiable languishment, which rendred them yet more fair, darted a fire which made them no less resplendent than they were sweet, or languishing. The whiteness of her complexion sullies and darkens all that Nature ever made most like to Snow, but it is a whiteness relieved in those places where it ought to be with the most beautiful Carnation in the world; that of her mouth seems to have something supernatural, in that little space it covers; but as her form is no less admirable than her colour, and the whiteness and order of her teeth accompany answerably all her other beauties; in whatever condition she appears, there is no action nor no motion but what is charming. Her face is but very little, but well proportion'd to the delicateness of her stature, and adorned with a great quantity of fair locks, but fair to a perfection of beauty, and such as they should without doubt be to agree with the colour of her eyes; her neck, her hands, and all her person, have beauties which merit a description I am not capable to make, and her whole composition is doubtless such, that Nature never formed any thing more beautiful, though our Age be replenish'd with many beauties truly admirable.

The Emperour stood amazed, or rather wholly lost at a sight so little expected, and turning towards Heracian, on whose shoulder he lean'd, Ab Heracian, said he, What is that I see? Heracian had without doubt answered him to any other question, but at this he was no less astonish'd than the Emperour, having his mind entirely fixed on the contemplation of this fair object, and by his silence and immobility, giving the Emperour leave to give himself with liberty to those impetuous thoughts that assaulted his spirit, this charming, or rather this divine unknown Lady, not daring to retire incivilly from before the Emperour, whom her companion had made known to her, and being as unwilling to have any communication with the world which she fled from, held for some time her eyes fix'd upon the earth, with a countenance which denoted her irresolution, or rather her perplexity; but in the end being determin'd what to do, having saluted the Emperour with a reverence full of submission was about to pass by him, when he moving some paces towards the place whither she directed hers, and forcing that silence which his astonishment had hitherto made him keep, Stop I pray you, said he, and fly not from one whom nothing should make you fly from, and whom nothing can comfort for your departure, if you make it with so much haste. This is not, (continued he, seeing her stop) by the authority which my dignity may give me, that I oppose your retreat; I am already sufficiently convinced, that all dignities lose their right before you, but in that estate in which you appear to my eyes, it is just that I inform my self, whether you are not rather something Celestial than a Mortal person; in other Nations and in another Religion, than that which we profess, they would be ready to erect you Altars; nor can all the respect I have for Heaven but difficultly perswade me that you be born amongst men. However, if you be as appearances make we judge, and that you have made any stay in the Lands of our Empire, what rampart or what cloud could conceal this prodigious beauty from the knowledge of men?

Honorius spoke in this manner in the astonishment which possessed him, or rather in that passion which already ruled over all his Soul, when this beautiful and charming unknown known Lady, lifting up for a moment her looks upon the earth (whereon she had hitherto held them fixed) to behold the countenance of the Emperour, or rather darting a lightning into the eyes and into the soul of Honorius, which inflam'd his very vitals, open'd her mouth with a behaviour which might make the Graces envious; Neither do I flye, said she, from an Emperour full of Justice and Goodness, nor am I born with any advantage over other mortal persons, my misfortunes may possibly cause some difference, a sad, (added she with a sigh) a sad and deplorable difference.

She stopp'd at these words, either out of a pressing effect out of her grief, or out of a design she had not to discover her self further. But the Emperour whose soul was naturally sweet and tender, and already touch'd in its most sensible part, could not observe her action, nor observe those tears which trickled down her fair cheeks, without being wounded with a new arrow, and receiving an assault against which he had not Forces powerful enough to defend himself. Nor could dissemble it, but beholding this marvellous person with those eyes which might make her easily perceive a part of what he felt in his Soul; I know not, said he, of what nature those misfortunes are which you deplore, but if they be capable of any remedy, or if this remedy may be found in the power of the Occidental Emperour, you ought to expect a happy change of your fortune, and believe that I cannot draw from my own any advantage more dear or more agreeable; and in that confidence you may have of the word of Honorius, you may let him understand what is your Name, what is your Country, and what are those misfortunes, and if he be so unhappy as to be unable to bring any comfort, at least you may be assured, that the knowledge he shall receive, shall never be cause of any displeasure to you.

The admirable unknown person, kept silence a short while after the Emperour had spoken these words, but in the end breaking it with a behaviour full of sweetness and respect, I know well, said she, that from the Son of the great Theodosius, and from an Emperour whose virtue and piety is publish'd to the whole earth, miserable persons like my self, cannot but expect protection and assistance; nor is it perhaps a new thing for our house to implore it from those of your Blood; but my Lord, my misfortunes are such, that no humane assistance can help or yield comfort to them, and though a powerful Emperour may restore a ruined Family to its ancient Glory, yet he cannot restore life to the dead, nor comfort me for a loss which I ought to lament to the last minute of my life. My name is Bellamira, my Country is Greece, my Birth is sufficiently noble, but by the cruelty of the Barbarians, who destroyed my native Soil, my unfortunate Parents perished with all their Goods, and of a most illustrious Family there scarce remains one unfortunate person in the world to deplore so many lost.

While she spoke in this manner, the Emperour hearkened to her discourse with a fixation of spirit, that might easily have made Heraclian observe that passion to which he had wholly abandon'd himself, if Heraclian himself, by a destiny equal to that of his Sovereign; had not been already expos'd to sufferings like to his, or had not as well as he, receiv'd in the middle of his heart the fair image of Bellamira. Both the one and the other expected from her lips a farther knowledge of her fortune, and in all likelyhood she had continued to speak, if the Emperour notwithstanding the attention he gave to her discourse, had not observ'd coming towards that place the Princesses Placidia, Theodolinda, and Cleomira, and with them the fair company which he had quitted some time before. Never had the presence of these fair and illustrious personages been other than extremely acceptable to him, but at this time it displeas'd and sensibly afflicted him; that violent passion to which he had already submitted himself, not permitting him to desire witnesses of the conversation in which he was employ'd. He saw however, he could not avoid it if he continued it, and after he had sigh'd for grief, so loud as to be heard by Bellamira, As I cannot judge, (said he to her) that you would make your self known to this great number of persons which approach us, I go to divert the injury which you may receive, and I leave Heraclian with you, to understand more particularly the estate of your fortune, and the means I may have to endeavour your relief or comfort. And at these words, after having commanded Heraclian in his ear, not to forsake her without knowing the place of her retreat, he departed from her wholly astonish'd, and advanced (almost without knowing what he did) towards the fair company which approach'd. He endeavour'd as much as possible to dissemble what he felt, and to conceal the change of his Soul from persons so highly intelligent; but they easily observ'd the trouble which appeared in his countenance, though they were ignorant of the cause, and all the time they were together, it prov'd impossible to recover him into his former serenity and good humour.

In the mean time Heraclian remained with Bellamira both by the command of the Emperour, and by his inclination, which as strongly fixed him; and so soon as the Emperour was a little distant, approaching her with a behaviour that betrayed his want of confidence, and regarding her with eyes full of a fire which denoted that already kindled in his Soul; Divine Bellamira, said he, You have heard the Orders I have received from the Emperour, and you see a man destin'd to your Service, both by his Prince, and possibly by another power not inferiour to his: To obey the Emperour, I would understand from your mouth if you please, in what his authority may be capable to yield comfort to your grief; and to obey another Master, you will permit me to go a little beyond the Orders I have receiv'd, and to offer you not the power of an Occidental Emperour, but the Service of a man who is not possibly despisable. It is not always the most exalted power which contributes to our happiness, and a greatness so bright and resplendent as that of the Emperour of the Romans, is often suffeeted, and almost always under a cloud. I shall know to discharge your trust, if you have any in me, in whatever manner you shall desire; I shall know how to conceal what you would have kept secret, or which possibly you would not depose in the bosom of a man expos'd to the sight of the whole world.

Heraclian, whose passion (acting in this manner in a Soul naturally unfaithful) had already made him betray his Matter, had without doubt been induc'd to say more through that instigation which made him speak, if this charming person had amused her self to hearken patiently to his discourse: but whether she had already conceived disdain for a man so little faithful to his Sovereign; or that she had resolv'd not to discover her self farther, and not to stay longer in a place where she was expos'd to sight more than she had a design to be, she lent him little attention, and breaking silence before he had done speaking; "If I had any other thing (said she) to make the Emperour understand than what I have my self told him, I would tell it you to report it to him, and not to conceal it, not knowing any reason should oblige me to have more confidence in his Servants than in himself: But I neither have any other thing to discover of a Fortune too obscure to merit his knowledge, nor other favour to demand, than that of leaving me a free and peaceable retreat in that Solitude I seek, and to which you may be pleas'd to permit me to retire.

Concluding these words, after she had very civilly saluted Heraclian, but with infinite coldness, she parted from the place where she was, and went towards one of the Gates of the Garden, with so much haste, that Heraclian, who had order from the Emperour not to leave her without knowing the place of her retreat, but who was much less solicted by the Emperour, than by his passion, found some difficulty to execute his design, not daring to run violently after those women for fear of affrighting them, especially since the Emperour and all his fair company were still in the Garden; he made his way however through the Trees with so much speed, that he saw them go out of the Garden by a little Gate, by which there was an entrance into that of a Roman Knight named Saturninus, who had a very fair House there adjacent; and he acted so well in the end, by the diligence he took the rest of the day, that he understood this charming person had no other retreat than that House of Saturninus, which is seated upon the Banks of Tibur, and whose Gardens open into those of Trajan; that she was Kinswoman to the wife of Saturninus, who was a Grecian, whom he had brought to Rome, having married her in Greece, during the first wars with the Goths; and that by reason of the absence of Saturninus, who had for some time been from Rome, the fair stranger remained with her Kinswoman at that House, out of the City, and distant from the sight and trouble of the world, which she willingly fled.

He came that same night to make this report to the Emperour, and he found him so chang'd from what he had been some days before, that so strange an alteration might have begot some pity in him, if his own passion had not wholly employed his thoughts: In effect, the soul of Honorius was by this sole view wounded with an impressiion so deep, that scarce any heart the most susceptible of Love had been so sensibly touch'd in entire years; for indeed as his Spirit was naturally sweet, amorous impressiions are in it formed with much more facility than in any other. So soon as he saw Heraclian, he took him apart, and having led him into a Closet, where he shut himself alone with him, he hearkened with much impatience, and no less disturbance, to what he had to tell him concerning Bellamira. Heraclian easily observ'd in his visage, and in all his action, the violence of that passion which tormented him; but he knew it yet better, when after he had done speaking, and made the Emperour understand, that it was in the house of Saturninus that she at present sojourned, the Emperour having thanked him in an extraordinary manner, and beholding him with an aspect wholly passionate; Heraclian, said he, I am scarce freed from one slavery but I am fallen into another; but as you delivered me from the first, if you comfort me in this, as I hope you will, there is no dignity nor no recompence which you may not assure to. I confess to you, that I love that admirable stranger, or rather that I dye for love of her, and that if I find not some comfort in this passion, my condition will be the most unhappy in the world, for it is certain I have suffered more in these few hours than I have done in all the years of my life; and that the image of this Bellamira, whose name we scarcely know, is fix'd to my remembrance with so much force, that in all likelyhood neither time nor reason will be able to banish it thence.

He added to these words many other, which were patiently hearken'd to, and when he had done speaking, Heraclian broke silence with a dissembling countenance, My Sovereign, said he, Your Sacred Majesty need not doubt but that I am entirely devoted to you, and that in this occasion as well as in all others which have given me the means to testify my fidelity to you, I shall expose all endeavours to your satisfaction and repose. You must see Bellamira, and she must needs be very terrible if she returns not her affection to an Emperor so potent by his Dignity, and so amiable for his person. I ought however to advertise you my Lord, that by what I can judge by the little entertainment I have had with Bellamira, she is a Lady, who either by her inclination, or some reason commanding over her Spirit, hates the society of the world, and seeks only retirement; and there is little appearance that a person who cannot suffer the sight and conversation of a particular man, will expose her self to the great clamour which the affections of an Emperor will make in the world, if we serve not our selves with some stratagem to engage her to suffer it, or if you constrain her not by your authority.

Ah! For my Authority, replied the Emperor, it is not that in such affairs as these I would employ it, and it shall never be cast as a reproach on the Son of Theodosius, that he made use of it against a woman, let us try other ways if we can find them, for that we must not think of. I have been of the same judgment, replied Heraclian, but I find my self much troubled to think of any means to make this Lady endure your love without affrighting her; for as she is a Stranger, and perhaps hath no occasion to stay her at Rome, I fear lest we lose her if we make any noise, or if we do not deceive her by some appearance advantageous to her.

At these words he stopt, remaining a short while without speaking, and in the posture of a person who fought with difficulty in his mind those inventions necessary for his design, and in the end breaking silence; "I know not, said he, if the means I have thought on may please your Majesty, but I cannot find one better to make Bellamira endure your approaches: as I have resolv'd to sacrifice my self entirely to your satisfaction, if you think it fitting, I will feign to be enamour'd of Bellamira, and that I would espouse her; and as I believe her Fortune is very mean, and that it will be possibly a great advantage for her to espouse a man established as I am by your goodness, I do not only believe that she will hearken to us, but in feigning to favour me in this design, and being willing to render her happy by marrying her to a man whom you can raise as high as you please, you may have a free access to her, and you may bestow on me what personage you please, whom I shall accept without reluctance, if you draw thence any satisfaction.

Heraclian spoke in this manner, and to these words he added many like, to persuade the Emperor of the sincere intention he had to serve him; and you may be pleas'd to hear how he made use of this stratagem, and in what manner he abused the easiness of a spirit, the sweetness of which he was well acquainted with. His first design was to be serviceable to his own passion, in feigning to serve that of the Emperor, and to gain to himself the affections of Bellamira, and that at his expences for whom he made show to act. In sum, he was in hopes to receive from the liberality of the Emperor such Riches and Dignities as might dazzle the eyes of Bellamira; not doubting but that to make her sensible by this hope he would raise him to a higher degree than that to which he was already mounted. And as by the disdain which Bellamira expressed at his first discourse, he doubted not but in the end she might advertise the Emperor, and acquaint him with the little fidelity he us'd towards him; he by this device cancell'd all he might fear on that side, imagining, and with much probability, that the Emperor would receive all he should understand of his love by the report of Bellamira, for the effects of a feigned passion which he practis'd for his service.

Any other but the Emperor would have suspected the proposition of Heraclian, but the weak Honorius penetrated not into his malice, and instead of distrusting him, he lookt upon Heraclian as a man faithful and affectionate to his interests, and made him promises so great and magnificent, that he had reason to hope all things, both in his Love, and in his Ambition. The greatest difficulty the Emperor thought of, was the danger to which Heraclian expos'd himself, of becoming truly amorous, whilst he feign'd to be so;

And in this case said the Emperour to him, I shall find my self much troubled, not believing that I can ever have the power to give you Bellamira, though I pretend apparently to a design to make you espouse her. Heraclian, notwithstanding all his confidence and assurance, blush'd sufficiently at this Discourse, to have begot in the Emperour some suspicion, if he had at that time cast his eyes on his Countenance: but having at that present fix'd them other where, he minded not his blushes, and Heraclian breaking silence with a sigh, I confess to you, said he, that the Charms of Bellamira are powerful, but the Fidelity I have for my Prince is capable of a proof much more difficult, and if I were well known to him, he would suspect me rather of Ambition than any other passion. I will do for your Ambition, replied the Emperour, whatever you shall do for my Love, and if I am happy in my Love, you shall have subject sufficient to be satisfied in your Ambition. They had some farther discourse together, and having resolved what they ought to do, as much as the passion both of the one and the other would permit, they left the Closet, and the Emperour soon after went to his repose, but with the Image of Bellamira so engraven in his memory, that for the whole night it would scarce permit him one moment of sleep.

The morrow after having publickly declar'd at his rising, that he had found the Gardens of Trajan so beautiful, that he was resolv'd to walk there often, he went after Dinner, followed only by Heraclian, and those persons whom the necessity of their Charges made continual Attendants on his person, believing that from hence he might enter into that of Saturninus, by the Door which Heraclian had taken notice of, without making this visit observ'd as it might have been, had he gone in another manner.

He walked some time with only Heraclian, the rest keeping at a distance out of respect, and he visited a good part of that Garden, out of hopes he had to encounter once more what he sought: but when he had run over almost all, without seeing any thing appear, he directed his pace towards the Garden of Saturninus, causing Heraclian to guide him to the little Door. I have understood from himself, that all his Dignity could not hinder him from trembling at the opening of it, either out of fear to displease the person he lov'd, or possibly out of fear not to meet with her. They who open'd the Door retir'd with respect to soon as they saw the Emperour, and scarce was he entred, but at the end of the Alley, which butt'd against the Portal, he saw appear four or five Women, among whom he doubted not but to find her whom he sought: She was truly there with the Wife of Saturninus, and though the distance was great, the Splendor of that admirable beauty might strike at greater distance the eyes of a man who before carried its Image in his breast: He easily observ'd that the sight of him had troubled them, and he doubted not but Bellamira had retir'd if she could conveniently have done it, in a place wholly discover'd, and where she could not make a step without being observ'd.

At the name of the Emperour, which the Servants pronounc'd, and at the sight of a Train, which though much less than ordinary, was yet much different from that of another person, the Wife of Saturninus advanc'd some paces before the others to receive him: and Honorius having saluted her with a noble sweetness and civility, told her, That having understand in the Gardens of Trajan, that there were in hers Beauties very considerable, he had had the Curiosity to enter, and walk there for some time. And from these first words, taking occasion to enter into some conversation with her: Not to lye to you, (said he very low, but with a handsome kind of confidence) We have seen yesterday very near this place a part of the Beauties which are in your Garden, and if they caus'd in me admiration, they have created so much love in Heraclian, that he would not leave me in repose till he oblig'd me again to see them, either to make me consent to the advantage he gives them over all that can be most fair in the world, or to oblige me to do him some good Office, if I could find any opportunity.

The Wife of Saturninus hearken'd to this discourse of Honorius with great astonishment: but before she could reply, the Emperour having made a sign to Heraclian to come to her, approach'd Bellamira, who remain'd at some paces distant, with a Countenance which sufficiently denoted the little love she had for that Company: However she receiv'd him like a person not ignorant of the Courtship of the World; and the Emperour accosting her with a respect more proportionate to the Idea he had conceiv'd of her Merit, than to the outward appearance of her Fortune, I know not, (said he, very low, and in a manner which oblig'd all that could understand him to retire,) whether you will pardon what I this day do in coming to seek you, contrary to your intention, but I conceiv'd so much grief for the refusal you made me of serving you with my Fortune for the repair of yours, that I could not hinder my self from coming to complain to you, and to demand of you some satisfaction. I should not have made these offers to a person who perhaps by her Merit is above all that we can offer, if I had not understood from your own mouth that you were unfortunate, and that that changling Goddess, who ought to have submitted her Empire to yours, hath not respectied you. Treat me to day more favourably than yesterday, if you will that I should comfort myself for that trouble, and leave me not in those thoughts which now possess me, that you have not disdain'd those offers, but out of opposition to hints that made them.

In this manner spoke the Emperour, with a Countenance which yet spoke more than his Tongue, and Bellamira who hearkened to him with so much the more trouble, because she was oblig'd out of a respect to hearken to him, breaking silence without lifting up her eyes from the Earth, where she had fix'd them: "My Lord, said she, Your goodnesse found me, and one miserable like my self who is so little worthy of the pains you take to explain them.— You are too worthy, (replied the Emperour, without permitting her to say further,) both of all that I can do, and of all that I can imagine, but I am too unhappy, not to find some occasion to please you: for in any opportunity to serve you, I would purchase it without doubt at the price of what I hold most dear, and next to what I have given you, neither the Empire, nor my Life it self can be very considerable. " Astonish not your self, (continued he, observing some trouble in her Countenance,) at this last effect of your beauty, I doubt not at all, but it is sufficiently extraordinary to gain Slaves in every place, and in understanding that a Roman Emperour is captivated in your Fetters, you understand nothing but what you might well have expected, if you have believ'd that I have seen you, or that I am not insensible.

Honorius accompanied these words with many sighs, and with a behaviour so passionate, that Bellamira could not doubt their truth: besides she had so much reason to be perswaded of the power of her beauty, that there needed no great witness of the effects it could produce. She receiv'd these last words without any other disorder than what the first had caus'd, and beholding the Emperour with a discontented aspect, but however with eyes which pierced his heart with new wounds, My Lord, said she, I am reduc'd by my fortune to a necessity to hearken to what you shall please to make me hear, and though my grief and my misfortunes should be augmented by your discourse, I am not in a condition to desire a forbearance. Had I believed, replied the Emperour, that the knowledge of my Love could cause any grief in you, I had conceal'd it till my death, and I should be the most afflicted of all men, if you can imagine that it was towards you, I would abuse my Dignity, and make use of the advantages it might give me, to make you suffer an affection not pleasing to you. No Divine Bellamira, do not this injury to a Prince, who by all the actions of his life will never oblige you to it, but in permitting me to assail your heart by Love and Services: Receive the word which I give you, never to employ other Arms.

"You may make use of them, replied Bellamira, in some enterprize more worthy of you, and of which the success may prove more answerable: for though my heart is not worth the pains you will take to assault it, most certain it is, you will all your life in vain combat it. "This is most cruelly to foretel me my misery, (replied Honorius, in a very sad tone,) but when the fear you give me, should turn into an entire certainty in my spirit, it would work nothing to my recovery, for my Soul is in such sort abandon'd to the Love I bear you, that I cannot hope an end of it, but only in Death. "I should be much griev'd, replied the fair Stranger, if what you say should be true: for as I am by all sorts of reasons bound to respect you, it cannot be without much grief that I see my self all the days of my life, incapable to answer your Affection. "The grief you have, replied the Emperour, may change your inclinations, and it is from that, rather than from your inclinations that I hope a better fortune than you pronounce me.

He spoke likewise many other words, which I omit to abridge the recital: but though Bellamira answered him with infinite respect, yet she gave him no occasion to conceive the least Hopes, but though his Hopes diminish'd, his Love was doubly augmented by this second sight, and he return'd from the Gardens of Saturninus, possibly as much lost as ever man was. He return'd some days after in the same manner, and besides this visit gave her many others; without being able to know whether all the proofs of his Love produc'd any effect over the spirit of Bellamira. This appear'd so much more strange to those who had any knowledge of it, as it is certain that few other persons would have treated in this manner, and that besides the dignity of Honorius who saw nothing greater than himself in the world, he being young, fair, of a well-compos'd person, of a spirit sweet, gallant and pleasing, liberal and generous, he was capable to make himself belov'd by all persons who had not fought in him Constancy of Spirit, Grandeur of Courage, and those other qualities which compose great men.

In the mean time he was chang'd in such sort by this Passion, enemy to his repose, that the Princess Placidia and all the Court perceiv'd it with no small grief, and though none but Heraclian knew his secret, they search'd so far into the cause of his change, that notwithstanding the diligence he took to conceal it, it was known by many persons. Being naturally liberal, he sent many magnificent presents to the house of Saturninus, but though the Wife of Saturninus receiv'd them from the hand of Heraclian who was still charg'd with them, she made him in the end know that Bellamira accepted them with indignation, and that she durst no longer offer them. Honorius was much afflicted at it, but he knew by the trial he had at the beginning made, what was the Soul of Bellamira who in an estate apparently infortunate, testified a disdain for things which generally enslave the very minds of other persons. The little esteem she made of them, and other marks of Grandeur which he saw in her carriage and in her person, made him sometimes believe that she was of a degree above what she would persuade him, and though he had often heard say that the Wife of Saturninus was of an illustrious blood, and that he could not understand any other of Bellamira than that she was her near Kinswoman, and that the misfortunes of her House had oblig'd her to retire to her, he difficultly could represent to himself, but that she was some other person than she appear'd.

But if the love of Honorius was ill acknowledged by this insensible person, that of Heraclian was receiv'd with so much disdain, that any other patience but his had been overcome, and though at the beginning he acted with her, as with a person whose fortunes he might make, and believ'd to dazzle her with the hopes of his Marriage, he had been so humbled by the little respect she had to his propositions, that he was constrain'd to change his proceeding towards her, and to look upon her as if she had been in the most resplendent and exalted fortune. Yet with this he was happy, that he could speak to her under pretence of rendering service to the Emperour, without the Emperours being able to conceive any pretence, and to tell her what he thought, without fearing the knowledge the Emperour might receive of it: Not but that Bellamira when he was importunate, had often threaten'd him to tell the Emperour, and that in the end seeing him not repuls'd by those threats she was persuad'd to it, by the hopes she had to defeat the persecutions of a man whom she neither lov'd nor esteem'd: But it was for this reason that this adventure seem'd strange to her, and that having pray'd the Emperour to deliver her from the importunity she receiv'd by the Love of Heraclian, and to content himself that she suffer'd his out of the respect she ought him, without exposing her to the persecutions of a man so little faithful to him. The Emperour receiving her discourse with a sigh, See, said he, what is the misery of my condition, and pardon those ways which I am constrain'd to make use of to combat an insensible heart: I could suffer no more than you the testimonies of the Love of Heraclian, if they were true, or if he were not engag'd to this fiction to serve me, out of the fear we have lest the splendour of my greatness and dignity should give you some Suspicion. How my Lord, (replied Bellamira, looking on him somewhat angrily) is the love of Heraclian then a feign'd agreement between him and you, to render the greatness of Honorius more supportable to the meanness of Bellamira? There is nothing great in Honorius in comparison of Bellamira (replied the Emperour,) nor any thing to be thought mean in Bellamira, with a man who is bound to adore her to his death: But it is certain that it is to serve me, Heraclian hath testified a love to you, for fear lest mine should make too much clamour in the world, and you should fear its rumour: Besides, we have believ'd that under the pretence of doing him some good office with you, I should have an access more free to you, and abuse more easily those persons that might take any interest therein. Add to this my Lord, replied Bellamira, that you thought to tempt me with the hopes to espouse Heraclian, and that you have believ'd this Fortune sufficiently great to dazzle and seduce me. I cannot but disown what you say, (replied the feeble Emperour) but must confess, that I could not have consented to the felicity of Heraclian, though he should have been so happy as to have persuaded you, but I must confess to you, that in the posture in which Heraclian is at present, there are few Ladies in the Empire to whom he may not aspire. Know my Lord, (replied Bellamira, with a sigh full of disdain,) not only that Heraclian is unworthy of Bellamira, but that when you your self would grant the same honour to Bellamira which you did to the Daughter of Stilicon, you would possibly find some difficulty to compass it.

She spoke these words with so much majesty, and at that moment there appear'd to the eyes of the Emperour, something so great in all her person, that he remain'd astonish'd and full of confusion, for the discovery he had innocently made of his intentions, so that the rest of the day he was not able to come to himself. But when Heraclian would have approach'd her, and given her the same assurance of his Love, he had already given, beholding him with eyes full of disdain, Heraclian, said she, both in the fiction and the truth you will find equal success: and I counsel you not to trouble your self longer, since the event is not correspondent to your intentions. You may have understood from the Emperour, (replied Heraclian, without (without discomposing himself at this discourse) that I only feign'd to see you, and I doubt not at all that he is well perswaded I do so, but I am strongly assur'd you are not; for besides that you have heard me speak in a time when nothing could be agreed between us, you are so clear sighted as to discern a fiction from the truth. I might possibly do it, replied Bellamira, if I had so much concern'd my self, as to take that pains, but however it be, I counsel you rather to own the feigned than the true, to appear faithful to your Emperour. In any other affair, replied Heraclian, I should without doubt be faithful to him, but in the love I bear you, I acknowledge no Empire but yours, nor other fidelity than I shall preserve for you till my Tomb, and if you doubt it, (added he a little after) I will give so great proofs, that you shall difficultly remain in that error. All those that you can give me, replied Bellamira, will not be more acceptable than those I have already received, and I should chuse rather with Honorius to remain in that error, than clear my self farther from you.

'Twas in this manner she almost continually spoke to him, and it seem'd likewise that she forced her very humour to a disdain, not natural to her, out of the aversions she had for him. He was sometimes reduc'd even to despair, but out of the interest he had to conceal his love from the Emperour, he disssembled his grief as much as was possible; and as his Love made him not forget his Ambition, he found in few days that given to his Ambition, wherewith he might comfort the little progress he had made in his Love; for the Government of Africa being void, by the death of him that possess'd it, the Emperour who at that time gave him the chief place in his confidence, though others might have it in his esteem, preferred him before all those persons of merit he might have found among the Romans, and made him Governour of Africa, against the desires of the whole world. There were few persons in Rome who did not murmur, not only at the pre-eminence given him, above all those who might legitimately pretend, but because the Government of Africa was the most important of all the Empire, and that it had been prov'd few years before, by the example of Gildon, that if that Government fell into the hands of a person ill minded, he had the means almost, with an equal force, to make war upon the Empire.

Heraclian being thus appointed Governour, was oblig'd to pass into Africa, to take possession of his charge, and as the Emperour knew well the little service he drew from him in his Loves, he was willing he should make this voyage to appease some troubles, which as it was said, were rais'd in some of the Provinces. Heraclian departed apparently with the best intentions in the world, but not without having protested to Bellamira before his departure, that he would return to her in a little time, in a condition which would not permit her to despise him. His particular friends knew well however, that notwithstanding his Ambition, he carried a wound in his Soul, of which that was not able to cure him, and only Honorius remain'd in the opinion of his feigned love for Bellamira, and his fidelity to him.

By the absence of his Confident, the Emperour lost nothing of his Love, and though the Princesses Placidia, Theodolinda, Cleomira, and many other amiable persons, endeavour'd by all means to divert him, as they had at other times done, all their endeavours prov'd vain, and he dedicated himself in such sort to Bellamira, that he had no more eyes nor thoughts but for her. He refrain'd sometimes as much as it was possible, from visiting her so often as he desired, out of the fear he had to displease her, and at those times that he did visit her, he us'd all his power to perswade her to retire to the Palace, and accompany the Princess Placidia: but though Bellamira could not find in the world a more honourable retreat, were it either out of a reluctancy she had to converse with the world, or that of retiring her self to a Prince that loved her, or other unknown reasons, she not only would never consent to it, but seeing that she was too much press'd by the Emperour, who out of the love he had for her, abandon'd entirely all care of the affairs of the Empire, and that she could not hinder his dayly visits, contrary to the intentions she had to conceal her self from all the world, she absented her self one day from the house of Saturninus, and carried far from Rome those admirable beauties which had rais'd so much trouble in the soul of the Emperour.

Honorius struck with the departure of Bellamira as with a mortal wound, remain'd wholly lost at the news he receiv'd, and shew'd thereby such marks of his weakness much greater than all those he had made appear in all the accidents of his life. The consolations of Placidia, and all his Friends, wrought no effect on his Spirit, and he told those to whom he could speak with more confidence, that he would no longer live if he could not again see Bellamira. The wife of Saturninus was gone with her, nor could any thing be learn'd from the Servants that were left in the house, who in all likelyhood were ignorant of their departure; but a hundred several messengers beat the Plain on all sides to understand news of them; and in the mean time the afflicted Honorius miserably languish'd in a condition which drew pity from all the world, and which rendred himself incapable of all things.

As he receiv'd neither consolation nor repose, so he was in such manner changed that he was scarce to be known, and all the world already teared that life which he miserably spent in lamentations; when a messenger by fortune brought him the news which he demanded, and which he understood, after he had almost drown'd himself with grief, that the same Bellamira, whose name he had every day in his mouth, and with the remembrance of whom his heart was wholly possess'd, was retired to Ravenna, where she had shut her self up in a House of Virgins, consecrate to the Service of God, which the venerable Ambrosius, whose memory is so glorious among us, had erected some years before, and that she had been received among them by reason of the design she had to stay there for ever, and renounce the world, from which she fled, by a kind of life which would deprive her of all commerce and communication.

Honorius was turmoyl'd at this news with divers different passions, and if the Design of Bellamira touch'd him with a sensible Grief, the Joy he had to understand the place of her retreat dispers'd a good part of it, especially since he despaired not of diverting her from her resolution, and believ'd by little and little to find some charms over her inclinations to augment his hopes; but he counselled not at all with himself what resolution he ought to take, for instead of going to one of the Cities of Italy to see Bellamira, he had run through the whole world to find her, if the ways had been free and open to him.

The report which began to run through all parts of the intention Alaric had to return towards Rome, was not able to divert his design, and though he mantled it under the pretence of a desire to march through Italy about affairs in which his presence was necessary, he departed from Rome without delay, and travell'd to Ravenna with so much haste, that he arrived there in few days, without doubt before the inhabitants of Ravenna could understand his having left Rome. So sudden a departure thence became the subject of much talk; but as the true cause was not known to all the world, so there were few that divined the truth: And as the Emperour would forearm himself against the flight of Bellamira, which he feared more than all things, instead of entring into Ravenna, he allighted at the House where she had shut her self up, which is not within the Walls of the City; but in the Suburbs adjacent.

The entrance into this House was permitted to no person, but as you know, there is nothing shut against Sovereigns in their own Dominions, and by this privilege all the Gates were open'd to the Emperour: So soon as he arrived he presently enquired for Bellamira, and the fear those Virgins had to displease him, or indeed to incense him, obliged them presently to lead him to her chamber: He beheld her with an extasie which it will be difficult for me to represent to you, and he beheld her yet more fair, if it were possible, than she appear'd at Rome; but by this sight he was touch'd in such manner that he had not the power to salute her, but suffering himself through weakness to fall down in a chair which he found near him, he beheld her a long time without being able to speak, and with a behaviour so passionate, that all those who saw him in that condition were sensible of his affliction, and Bellamira her self could not defend her self against some assaults of compassion.

Having for a long time held his eyes (moistned with some tears, which he could not retain) fix'd on her countenance, without opening his mouth to explain himself farther, he at length broke silence, usher'd with some sighs which preceded his words, and forming the last with difficulty, by reason of the interruption the effect of his different passions caus'd; Ab Bellamira! said he, For what reason did you flye from me with so much inhumanity? And why have you abandon'd the miserable Honorius to such cruel griefs? By what misfortune am I become so odious to you, to make you take so dire a resolution? Or what have I done that you should fear the presence of a person that dyes for you? Could you fear that power which might be suspected, being accompanied with a passion which not always permits reason the rule? Or have you fear'd to be touch'd with some pity at the death of a man whom you insensibly must needs send to his Tomb? Ah! Bellamira, neither Fear nor Pity have been the causers of your flight; for as it is not for me that pity can gain any access in your Soul, so it is not from me, it is not from a heart that adores you like that of the unfortunate Honorius, that you have feared any effects of a Sovereignty which he lays down at your feet, and against which you are too well assured, both by his word, and the fear he hath to displease you.

Honorius pronounc'd these words so feelingly, and so worthy compassion; that the heart heart of Bellamira truly felt some tenderness; and as there was no reason could create in her an aversion for a Prince by whom she felt so dearly beloved, she listened to his discourse with pity, and beheld the condition of his Soul with infinite joy: Her eyes gave some marks of it, which she could not conceal; but the Emperour not daring to attribute it to any cause favourable to him, I see well, (said he, expressing himself yet more sadly than at the beginning) I see too well the effect my arrival produces in your Soul: and as you possibly thought that I would come to seek you at Ravenna, you find at the sight of me that subject of grief which appears in your face, and you behold me like a persecutor who comes to trouble your repose by his importunate passion. "But Bellamira, afflict not your self for an evil which is not possibly so great as you believe it, and fear not an importunity to which you may give those bounds you please.

He had said more, if Bellamira had not in the end broke silence, and told him, beholding him with an eye in which there did not appear the least reluctance for him; Attribute not my flight, my Lord, nor that grief you observe in my countenance, to those causes you are pleas'd to give them; neither have I seen any thing in your person which ought not to make me esteem it; nor have I fear'd any thing from a Prince all whose actions are ruled by Piety and Virtue. I will say likewise, that the affection wherewith you have honoured me, instead of the opposition wherewith you reproach me, hath placed in my heart infinite acknowledgments of your goodness; but it is the condition of my Soul, of my life, and of my Fortune, and not my insensibility which I ought to accuse. I have been, (continued she with a sigh) *and am possibly yet but too sensible, that it is that which causes the unhappiness of my unfortunate day, and makes me lead them in an affliction which cannot be ended but by the assistance of Heaven, and the retirement I seek for. It is that my Lord, that unhappy estate of my life which makes me flye, not from you whom I respect, but from all men in general, from an affliction which I cannot suffer, and from a Court, where contrary to the design, and the reasons I had to conceal my self, I have been expos'd to the sight and view of all the world. I will add, that the sorrow I have to see you suffer for a person by whom your sufferings can never be relieved, and whose absence might produce a good effect for your repose, made me precipitate my resolution, and seek my repose in a place where I thought my self fortified against all the persecutions of Fortune; yet you however, my Lord, envy that repose which Heaven would afford me, and you come perhaps to trouble it in a time wherein I had reason to believe you thought no longer of the infortunate Bellamira.*

Yes I come to trouble it, (replied the Emperour, rising from his seat) or at least I come to oppose my self, not only for my own interest, but for that of the whole earth, which you would deprive of what it hath of most fair and most amiable. And do you believe then, my Lord, replied Bellamira, That this design is conformable to the promise you have made me, never to employ your power and authority against me. It is not by my authority, replied Honorius, that I will oppose your design, but by those ways which a Lover is permitted to make use of in this occasion, and by that death which you shall see me suffer before your eyes, if those prove unprofitable. Ah my Lord, added Bellamira, When I quit the World for Heaven, will you dye for that? The life of so great an Emperour is too considerable to all the world to sacrifice it to a loss of so little importance: For those other obstructions you may bring to my resolution, I hope you will make them yield to reason, and to that pity you would your self have to see me eternally miserable, and you will not then have any intention for me, which you cannot reasonably oppose to that Design Heaven hath inspired me with.

"The intention I have for you, (said the Emperour, after some few minutes of silence) hath not yet appeared to you, and I must confess to you, that it was not form'd in my heart so soon as I began to love you; but since so many Virtues which accompany your Beauty, may justify the love I bear you, I am content that my design should be known to you, and that all the world should understand as well as you, that Honorius will espouse Bellamira, if Bellamira disdains him not for her Husband.

This Discourse of the Emperour surpris'd all those persons that heard it, though they doubted not but his love was sufficiently violent to carry him to all things. Bellamira seem'd the least moved, though she blush'd; and having kept her self silent for some small time, "My Lord, said she, you too much honour one that is miserable, whose low degree never permitted her to carry her thoughts to so high a Fortune: But my Lord, I ought not to abuse your goodness, nor take advantage of what an unjust passion makes you act against reason, whilst it rules Mistress in your heart, and which your reason will without doubt make you condemn so soon as she hath regain'd her Empire. I respect too much both your Person and your Dignity, to permit you to commit so great a fault, and it will be so much the greater, because you are yet ignorant whether I am born of a Noble blood, or of a blood with which you may without shame dye your self. I see too well, replied Honorius, that you are born of an illustrious blood, and I have observ'd too much Nobleness and too much Grandeur in all your Actions, and in your person, to believe that there can be any meanness in your birth; but when there should be so, so many wonders both of body and mind would but too well repair that fault, and you would appear worthy of something yet greater than the degree to which I desire to raise you. You may then from hence my Lord, replied Bellamira, judge of the greatness of my miseries, since being able to hope, and by your goodness able to merit so great a Fortune, I am not permitted to accept it. How Bellamira (said the Emperour, crossing his arms upon his breast, and beholding her with a Countenance highly troubled,) Have I then in vain given you this last proof of my love? And cannot the Imperial Dignity which I offer you, change any thing of the disdain you have for the person of Honorius? I should be much pleas'd, said Bellamira, that you would acknowledge at this time, that it is not the person of Honorius I have despis'd: for by the necessity which constrains me to refuse what you offer, you may judge well my Lord, that it is not for light reasons that I have appear'd so little sensible of the affection you have testified me. Ah disconsolate Honorius, (cried he on a suddain, walking in a posture wholly passionate) Lover too unfortunate, what a cruel destiny is thine? Alas! added he a little after, is this all I am to hope from so much love? and come I with so good intentions to seek at Ravenna a mournful death by this last knowledge of my misery?

He after this continued walking in that desolate manner without speaking, whilst Bellamira testified by many marks that she was not insensible of his grief: And afterwards turning himself towards Bellamira, and beholding her with eyes full of tears; As I am not in an estate, said he, to remain any longer time with you, I go in some hours of solitude to seek assistance and succour against that despair to which you have driven me: I protest to you yet once more, that it shall never be but by prayers that I will give any Obstruction to your Design, and I will govern my visits either at Ravenna, or in any other places, as you desire them, and in such manner that I may be the least importunate possible; but if you will not have me run after you through the whole World, and perhaps make me dye by a kind of death which will beget a pity in you, do me the favour to deser the Design hath led you to this House, and fly not from Ravenna, as you fled from Rome. Bellamira, who truly was touch'd with grief, and acknowledgments of the affection he testified, promis'd what he desir'd, and immediately after he departed from that House, to retire to the Palace which was prepar'd for him, but in a condition which mov'd to pity all those that accompanied him.

They who hitherto had admir'd the beauties of Bellamira, and the virtuous resistance she made of the Emperours Love, while his intentions might be suspected by her virtue, admir'd now the greatness of her courage, and the disdain she manifested of the highest dignity, to which any woman could raise her ambition. For Honorius, he was blam'd for the design he had to espouse her, by all those who had not seen Bellamira, but amongst those who could see her, there were few who did not excuse him, or did not believe themselves able to give a like proof of their Love in a like occasion. In fine, it appertain'd only to Bellamira's will, that she was not Empress of the Occident, and it was not only this time that she was importun'd by the Emperour, but every day following: He press'd her with much more affection than I can represent to you, and liv'd daily with her as with a person whom he pretended to espouse, if he could be so happy as to gain her consent. Bellamira after this declaration of his intentions, treated with him in another manner than she had done before, and testified to him as much respect and acknowledgment as she could make appear without testifying a love; but neither this acknowledgment nor respect could at all satisfy the passion of Honorius, and the miserable Emperour consum'd himself in such a languishing manner as mov'd the whole world to compassion.

Though Honorius employ'd not his Authority to see Bellamira, she had not the cruelty to refuse him her sight, knowing well how truly and sincerely she was belov'd, and how that though this was the only happiness granted him, yet he dedicated himself so entirely to it, that he believ'd he could no longer live when he was absent from her. This made him forget in such sort the affairs of the Empire, and all other things in the world, that though he understood at that time the return of the Goths into Italy, and the Siege they had laid to Rome, he seem'd so little mov'd at it as if he had no interest in it: It is true, that by reason of the unexpected return of those enemies, and the distance of all the Troops of the Empire, he was scarce in any posture to remedy it though he had had such intentions: But it appear'd that he us'd no endeavour to do it, nor thought so much as of fortifying himself in Ravenna to resist his Enemies if they should turn that way: However those that were about him took all possible care, and as Ravenna is a very strong place, and well furnished with all things necessary to defend it, by the former diligence of Stilicon, the Emperour seem'd to be in great security.

They who were the most familiar with him, endeavour'd to excite him to some resolution for the defence of his Country, and the relief of that famous City which had rul'd for so many Ages over the greatest part of the world; but he seem'd insensible of their importunities, and when Bellamira her self, who with great grief saw her self accused of his thus abandoning all things, and who had a courage as great and high as his was feeble and daunted, would represent to him what he ought to the degree he held, and awaken in him some virtue by her discourse. Let all perish, said he, if Heaven have so resolv'd: and since I my self must miserably perish, I will see the loss of the whole world, without having any interest in it. It was said however, that he seem'd very much touch'd at the news he receiv'd of the taking of Rome, which surpris'd him so much the more, because he believ'd it in a condition to make a much longer resistance, and that all his insensibility could not hinder him from expressing infinite grief for the misfortune of the Princess Placidia, he lamented it several days before Bellamira her self, and accus'd himself often, not to have preserv'd Placidia for Constance, as he had promised him. His weakness created both disdain and anger against him, in all those that were distant from him, but it begot pity in those who saw it, or at least whilst they accus'd him, they could not refrain from lamenting him. He sent however to demand the Princess Placidia of Alaric, offering large Provinces for her liberty, but the Love of Atalphe caus'd him to reject all proposals that could be made, and all care taken to redeem that great Princess prov'd vain. Oh Honorius, cryed Constance, interrupting Artabure at this discourse) could you abandon Placidia to the Barbarians?

He spoke only these few words, accompanied with many sighs, and Artabure continued his discourse. Honorius said he, lived in this manner continually, fix'd at the feet of Bellamira, not only whilst the Goths having quitted Rome, ravaged Lucania and Campania, but after they had left Italy to embarque themselves on the Thyssene Sea, after the death of Alaric, and so by the Ligustique Sea went to seek the Coasts of Spain, and that Attalus whom they had left, remain'd Master at Rome, where in few days he became so insolent, that he durst take the Name of Emperour, and used the ruin'd, weak and disarm'd Romans, as if he had been truly Emperour. And in the end, till the affairs of Italy being in this estate, I arriv'd with those Troops which had serv'd under you my Lord, (said Artabure to Constance) in the War against Constantine and Jovian, and which you had commanded me to lead back.

Having understood all the misery of my Country before I enter'd it, I resolv'd immediately to succour it all I could, without Attending Orders from the Emperour, who no more acted, but who in all likelihood would approve all I should do for the service of the Empire: I therefore march'd without delay, towards those places where I knew there were any Forces of the Enemies, and preventing their intentions by our diligence, we not only constrain'd them to fight us, but were so happy as to Defeat them in many Encounters: and when Attalus dared to come out of Rome to meet us with his whole Forces, we fought him with the same success, and having cut in pieces all his Army, we drove him from Italy, which he quitted with six or seven hundred Horse, the only remains of his Defeat.

When I saw Italy entirely deliver'd from its Enemies, and the Romans in liberty to repair in some manner the ruines of their City, I resolv'd to go to Ravenna to see the Emperour, and I presented my self to him with the Prince Taxander, Castinus, and many other valiant men, who had no less part than my self in the defeat of Attalus, and in the relief of our Country. I found the Emperour in that condition I have endeavour'd to represent to you, nor could I see him so different from what he ought to have been, without being touch'd with compassion. As he believ'd that I had done something for his Service, and as he had always preserv'd a goodness for me, he treated me better than I merited, and receiv'd Taxander and Castinus with his natural sweetness. The aversion he had to all things but his Love, could not hinder him from speaking to me many things of you generous Constance, and he told me many times that he had no greater sorrow than that of being wanting in the promise he had made you, to preserve for you Placidia: but if it pleas'd heaven to return you to him, he would repair that fault by the greatest proofs of his affection he was able to give you, and such as you should have reason to be satisfied with, at least added he with a sigh, if an enamour'd person can be satisfied with any thing after the loss of his beloved Object.

Having spoke to me of others, he would speak to me of himself, and having drawn me from those who might understand us; I doubt not at all, Artabure said he, but you have condemn'd me as well as all the rest of men, amongst whom I cannot but imagine I am extremely blam'd; I will not say that I am exempt from a part of that blame they lay upon me, and possibly that Passion which hath lost me, had not produc'd the same effect in another Soul that it hath in mine; but however it be, out of the esteem I have for you I am content that you should see the cause, and I assure my self that you will be sorry for me if you cannot excuse me. He perform'd what he had promised, and the next day he made me see Bellamira, contrary to his custom, which was not to lead men to those visits: I say only he made me see her, continued Artabure saying, for a sensible man to see Bellamira, and to love her with an inexpressible passion, is without doubt the same thing. All that I have told you of her beauty at the beginning of my Discourse, is but a light part of what she appear'd to me at this fatal view, and all that which I could imagine by the effect she had produced in the heart of Honorius, would but very imperfectly reach the truth. The astonishment which seiz'd me at so Super-excellent an Object, and which only for some few moments preceded my Love, might easily be observed in my Face, and the Emperour having perceiv'd it by all sorts of marks, conceiv'd no small joy to read in my Countenance a part of what he desir'd, and approaching me with some appearance of Cheerfulness, not ordinarily seen in him for a long time past, And well Artabure, said he, did you ever see beauties parallel to those of Bellamira? And have you not a little more indulgence for my misfortune than you had before the cause was known to you?

I was so astonish'd and surpris'd, either at what I saw, or at what I began to feel, that I had not at present the power to answer him: but when he had commanded me once more to tell him what I thought of Bellamira, My Sovereign, said I with some difficulty, That which I can say to you will but ill express that which appears to me, and my silence may possibly speak better than my words can do. The Emperour was as much satisfied with my Answer as he had been with my Countenance, and turning towards Bellamira, who had understood our Discourse, and to whom he had before presented me: I cannot be displeas'd, said he, to have a man like Artabure justify me in the World, for he hath sufficient repute among men to draw a good part to his opinion. He hath serv'd you so well my Lord, replied Bellamira, as to merit the esteem you testify to him, and all things appear to us in his person conformable to what Renown hath published of him.

This praise so little expected, and so little merited, from the fairest lips in the World, added some confusion to what I had already found in my Soul, and methought that by the prepossession of my Spirit, I difficultly resolv'd on the answer I ought to have made to such obliging words: But a little after, by the will of the Emperour being mixed in their entertainment, I endeavour'd to repair those faults which this new conceiv'd trouble had made me commit, and by a delign we naturally have to please persons which please us, was much satisfied that Bellamira attributed not to stupidity that which proceeded from another cause.

By having the honour thus to be near her, I carried her Effigies into my heart, and at one sole sight it pierc'd so far, that I durst not hope any trace of time should snatch it from me. During the night which succeeded to this fatal day, I entertain'd my self continually with the fair image of Bellamira, and I sought in vain sleep and repose in a War much more terrible to my Spirit than those in which I had accompanied Constance: Yet it was not without some endeavours to defend my self, that I was made a Prisoner to this imperious beauty: for I often plac'd before my eyes, both what I ought to my Emperour whom I saw wholly abandon'd to the love of Bellamira, and the little success I could hope in my love, being enamour'd on a person whom the love of Honorius, with the Crown of the Occidental Empire could not touch with any sensibility. What canst thou offer (would I say) to this proud beauty which despiseth Emperours with their Empires? Or if thou couldst offer her Empires, with what honour canst thou violate that fidelity thou owest to thy Sovereign?

I will not at all amuse you with the recital of the discourse I made to oppose this cruel passion, which assaulted and came to overwhelm all the whole repose of my life, but as it is of little importance, pass it over to come to things of greater concern, and which by reason of their importance, though they happened but lately may possibly be spread by renown as far as you. In sum, I lov'd truly and I lov'd like one wholly lost: and though I seldom saw Bellamira because the Emperour denyed himself as much as possible too frequent visits, and that I was not permitted to enter the place where she was but in his company, this admirable person had in a few minutes done that which others could scarce do in many years, and when I had the liberty to entertain her I found those Charms in her conversation which did but too much finish what her beauty had so well begun. I know not whether my eyes gave her at these times any knowledge of what my Soul suffer'd, but my mouth durst not utter it: for besides the respect I had to the love of the Emperour, I had so much fear to displease her, and so little hopes to be well received, that I could not be so hardy as to open my mouth to give

give her the least knowledge of what I felt: 'Tis true I had few occasions to do it, and much fewer afterwards by reason of an accident which fell out.

Bellamira had often been upon the point to execute the design she had to quit the world, and shut up her self the rest of her days with the Virgins consecrated to the service of that Divinity we adore, amongst whom she had taken her retreat, but the Emperour had continually hindred her, not by his Authority, but by prayers accompanied with tears; and so many marks of a grief which seem'd to approach despair, that this acknowledging Lady could not refuse him many delays he demanded. She was in these terms with him, when Heraclian return'd from Africa (where he had made a longer stay than was necessary to take possession of his Government) and coming presently to Ravenna, presented himself to the Emperour. Honorius who had permitted himself to be seduced by this flattering Spirit, was very glad for his return, and made him great welcomes, which the dissimbling Heraclian receiv'd with apparent marks of as great a passion for his Service: But few persons rejoiced with the Emperour for his arrival; for besides that he was before little lov'd, the splendor of that new Dignity to which he was advanced by the fairest and most important Government of the Empire, had raised a pride in his mind, which few persons could suffer; for my self, I ever but lightly esteem'd him, nor did his Government of Africa make me consider him any whit the more.

The dearest proof the Emperour gave him of his affection at his arrival, was the leading him the same day to see Bellamira; but if Heraclian, in whose heart love had been but too well preserv'd, revisited Bellamira with infinite joy, I am confident Bellamira sav'd him with as much ill will, and gave him but little cause to be satisfied with the reception she made him, both at that time, and upon other following days in which he was permitted to see her. The Emperour believ'd that what he had discover'd to her at Rome of the feigned love of Heraclian, had begot in her mind some resentment against him, and because he was now sensible his designs were too well known to have any need of Heraclian's fiction, he would excuse him towards her, and intreat her for his sake to pardon what was past to a man who had been so affectionate to his Service: When Bellamira, who had had particular conversations with Heraclian, which had discovered but too much, shaking her head with a sigh at the discourse of the Emperour, the innocence of which begat a pity in her; My Lord, said she, I will always pardon to Heraclian rather the fiction, than the truth for my interest; but if you think fit that I give you an advice, which by all sorts of reasons I am oblig'd to give you, beware of Heraclian, for I am much deceived if he be well affected to your service. I see well, (said Honorius sighing) that you cannot pardon him, it must be time and my prayers that must work this effect over your ill opinion. It is then through my own apprehension, replied Bellamira, that I advertise you once more to beware of him, and to pardon me, if both for you, and for me, I cannot hinder my self from fearing him.

Bellamira gave this advice to the Emperour, but he neglected it, not only by his natural negligence, but by reason of an ill-founded imagination which rendred it suspected from the mouth of Bellamira; but it was not long time ere he repented himself, and to abridge my recital, five or six days after the arrival of Heraclian, one morning at the rising of the Emperour, some came to advertise him, that during the night, the House in which Bellamira resided, and which as I told you was seated in a very solitary Faubourgh, had been forced, the Gates broken, and Bellamira with only one Damself taken away by unknown men, who notwithstanding their cries and resistance had by violence constrain'd them to go with them. At this news Honorius was struck as with a Thunderbolt, and remain'd half dead in the presence of those that brought it; for a long time he was not able neither to speak, nor to act in any manner, and his grief was so great, that it permitted him not to express it by complaints; he open'd his mouth at last, either to bemoan himself, or give orders for the assistance of Bellamira, but the trouble of his Soul confounded both the one and the other, his commands were indiscernably mixed with his plaints, nor could it be known whether we should comfort him, or run to the succour of Bellamira.

All those who were most affectionate to him now presented themselves, nor was I one of the last, but Heraclian was not seen. The Emperour presently enquir'd for him, and though no tidings could be heard of him, he could however not so soon suspect him. I was not of the same opinion, but as by the love I had for Bellamira, and the interest she had made me take in all that regarded her; I had already understood that Heraclian was enamoured of her; I no sooner heard of her being forced away, but I accus'd Heraclian, not doubting but he had done it, with intent to carry her to Africa; my grief for this accident, was possibly no less than that of the Emperour, though I made it less appear; and if I shed not tears, nor uttered cries like him, the grief I resent'd within, produced no smaller effect, than if I had as much tormented my self. He observ'd however there was none in the company appear'd so afflicted as my self, and believing to have a great obligation to me for it, Ab Artabure, said he, I see well you are touch'd with my misfortune, nor can you give me a greater mark of the affection you have for me. But why my Lord, said I, do not you remedy this misfortune? Or what should hinder us from pursuing the Ravishers of Bellamira? Ab let us pursue them, reply'd the Emperour, those that love me will do it, and testify their love at a time wherein my life lies at stake.

As I had before resolv'd to do it without his Orders, I expected them no farther, but mounting immediately after on Horse-back with those of my Friends I found ready in any posture to follow me, I went where my Love and my Anger guided me, without knowing what way I should certainly take, to overtake the Ravishers. The difficulty was not small; for as they had acted their design in the middle of the night, whilst the Gates of the City were shut, and that for that reason the Virgins whose House they had forced, could not advertise the Emperour till many hours after, the Ravishers had gain'd so great an advantage before the Pursuers, that there was little hopes or appearance to reach them; I post'd straight to the famous Port on the Adriatick Sea, believing they might be embark'd, but as that Haven had since the time of the war been diligently guarded, and that they had well foreseen the difficulties they should there encounter, they had taken another way by Land, and put me into a strange difficulty to divine what course they followed.

Whilst I pursued them, the Emperour being gone to the House of the Virgins, had understood the particulars of the Rape, and found that it was Heraclian himself by whom Bellamira was forced. Not having seen himself or any of his in this disorder, he had begun to doubt, but being fully cleared, he accused himself for having neglected the advice Bellamira gave him of his infidelity. There were likewise some of the Virgins, who addressing themselves to him, assured him, that Bellamira cried out to them at her departure, and whilst she yet struggled in the arms of her Ravishers. Tell the Emperour that Heraclian forces me to carry me into Africa, and that if he can, he will with Bellamira, deprive him of the Empire. Alas, (cry'd the desolate Honorius at this discourse) that he had deprived me of the Empire, so he had left me Bellamira; he judg'd however that he ought not to devote his time wholly to lamentations, but having made all the Court mount on Horse-back, he mounted likewise himself, and acted much more for the recovery of Bellamira, than he had done for the succour or defence of the Empire.

In the mean time I was already far distant, and by chance having found some persons who had met the Ravishers by break of day, and who placed me in their track, in the way towards Cremona, I followed it easily, though I had a great number of Horse, and I followed them with so much swiftness, that before one part of the day was pass'd, our Horses were almost tired, they carried us however to a Village, where we found fifteen or twenty in the same estate, and where we understood that they were those which Heraclian and his men had left there some hours before, to take fresh ones which there expected them, and by fortune one of Heraclian's men, who had broken his leg by a fall, being overtaken by us in this place, told me after some threats, that from the Port of Genoua, on the Liguistique Sea (where he intended to embarque, to pass into Africa, having found that way more convenient for him, than to coast Italy to Brundisium, by which he might meet with great difficulties) unto that very place, Heraclian had left at equal distances alike number of Horses, that he might change in all, as he had done in that place, and that by this Order he would be embark'd before we could make the third part of the way to Genoua; that he was expected by a great number of armed Ships, fitted for war, and that he had put himself in a condition to sustain all the Forces of the Empire if they should assault him; that all the Coasts were full of Vessels, and that there was never seen so great an Armada in Africa.

I easily believ'd what this man told me, not being ignorant of the Maritime Power of the African Governours; but I was much more afflicted at the loss of Bellamira, than at the great power of Heraclian, and so much the more, by reason of the order Heraclian had taken in his flight, by which I saw it impossible to find any means to succour her, or to follow with Horses wearied and tired, those men who through their whole Journey, had fresh ones to change. I saw then that I must of force return to the Emperour, and that it was only in Africa, that we ought to go seek Bellamira. I went back the way we had come, with the Horses and man of Heraclian, whom I intended to present to Honorius, to the end he should not doubt of the intelligence I was to give him, and because according according to the instructions which had been given him, he had followed the same path with us. I marched no long time before I met with him. I will not recount to you all he did, and all he said in this disaster; it will be difficult for me to represent to you the greatness of his grief, when he understood that there was no other means to recover Bellamira, than by carrying the war into Africa, and that though the success of it should be favourable to him, he could not be assured to find her. He utter'd forth a thousand plaints to Heaven, he wept, he tore his hair, and did all that a most desolate woman could do in the like occasion. As all his friends had beheld with a great deal of grief, the neglect which this love had made him make of himself; so there were few persons in his Court, afflicted to see the cause taken away, and I had without doubt been of their opinion, if love had not ranged me on his party, or had not filled my soul with the most violent grief it could possibly apprehend. Honorius seem'd much concern'd at the marks I gave of it, and gave me such proofs of his repentment, as I not at all merited.

After he had that day extremely tormented himself, when I saw him a little more capable to hearken to me, than he had been for some hours past, My Sovereign, said I, it is no longer time to seek consolation or revenge in complaints, you ought to think of the war, and send into Africa the revengers of your quarrel. Ah Artabure, (said he to me) I shall never more see Bellamira. Though you should never see her more, replied I, the Son of Theodosius ought to resolve against this misfortune; but I hope you may again see her, and that the Heavens will revenge you of that perfidious Traitor, who hath robb'd you of her, if you carry a war into the place of his retreat, and prevent by your Arms the design he hath to do you greater injuries. Alas for greater injuries, replied Honorius, he will not know how to do them: for though he should with my life deprive me of my Empire, he can deprive me of nothing so dear as Bellamira, yet I would however, added he, arm against him all my power, and as I have no man about me more capable of this war, than your self, nor any friend more afflicted at my misfortune, it is to you that I will commit my revenge, the repose of my life, and the safety of the Empire.

These words of the Emperour afforded me infinite joy: for besides the consideration I had of the Honour he did me, I received infinite satisfaction from the occasion I had to go succour Bellamira, and wage war with an unworthy Rival, and unfaithful Subject. I restituted to the Emperour the apprehension I had of the favour he did me, protesting that I would acquit my self with all imaginable fidelity. He had without doubt in his Court persons more worthy than my self, and more capable of so important an employment; but as he knew that I led from among the Gauls a victorious Army, the Officers and Soldiers of which had been accustomed to obey me, both loving and knowing me, and that these same Troops, having chased the Goths which obeyed Attalus out of Italy were yet entirely on foot, he believed that he could not place any man in the head of them whom they would more willingly follow, nor with whom they would so easily accuse themselves.

This business being resolved, and the Emperour having nothing which might longer detain him at Ravenna, we intreated him to return to Rome, to give to that desolate City that consolation it might receive by his presence, and we easily disposed him to it. Fortune likewise so ordered it, that to make his re-entrance the more magnificent, and give some satisfaction to the Romans by so acceptable a sight, Leontius to whom you had given Attalus in charge, when you caus'd him to depart from you, with the rest of the Cavalry, said Artabure to Constance, arriv'd the same day at Ravenna, and on your part presented Attalus to the Emperour. This man, who a little time before had taken on him the quality of the Emperour of the Romans, supporting the change of his fortune with infinite lowness of spirit, prostrated himself at the feet of the true Emperour, attending with no small fear what destiny he would ordain him; many persons counselled the Emperour to make him an example, and to punish him as his infinite boldness had merited; but the Emperour (whose disposition was always mild) had more regard to your intercession, than to the advice of those who would counsel him to rigour, and contented himself to tell them, that he ought too much to Constance, to refuse him the life of Attalus which he demanded, and that with the life of Attalus, he would willingly give him a part of the Empire, to comfort him, if it were possible, for the loss of Placidia.

He spoke many other things, by which he made us understand more particularly the intentions he had for you: and in the end parting from Ravenna, he marched towards Rome, where he entred some days after, leading Attalus as it were in triumph, and exposing him to the sight of the Romans, by whom he had some days before made himself be respect'd in the quality of Emperour: This was the greatest pain he suffer'd, and few

few days after he was sent to the Island Liparis, and there confin'd during life. I tell you these things succinctly, because I know well they are come to your knowledge: nor will I extend my self farther on the entrance of the Emperour into Rome, nor on other things which pass'd at a return in which he might have seen with infinite grief the horrible marks of the Gothick cruelty, if he had been capable of other grief than what he apprehended for the loss of Belamira, and by which he comforted himself as I believe, for that of Flacidia, which he had else impatiently supported.

In the mean time, to acquit my self worthily of the employment with which he had honoured me, and obey the inclination I had to succour Belamira, I sent to rigg all the vessels which were in all the coasts of Italy, and to make them Rendezvouz at Brundisium, where we intended to imbarque, and whither I made all the souldiers march with the greatest hast possible, by reason of the fame spread abroad of the puissant arming of Heraclian, who cover'd as it was reported all the Seas of Africa with his Vessels. Many persons judg'd that I ought not to precipitate any thing, nor march to the War against this unfaithful person, but with a Power not at all inferiour to his, and those who gave this advice, wanted not reasons to uphold it: but I agreed with that of many others, who held and that with sufficient prudence that the Forces of Heraclian, how great soever, were neither joyned together, nor well disciplin'd; that he might have a great number of Vessels, but that they were in several places, and neither well arm'd nor well fitted for War: and that if I should fall upon him with the Arms of his Master, before he had time to assemble them, better arm them, and exercise them for War, the expedition might have a better effect, than if I gave him leisure for greater preparations.

I believ'd then that the good success of this enterprize depended chiefly in the diligent execution of it, and in this belief I hastned as much as possible to put all things in order to march against Heraclian. I was seconded by many other persons well affected to the service of the Emperour, and particularly by Castinur, Arcobinde, and the young Ætius, of whom for the marvellous hopes conceiv'd of him, I have already made you some mention, and in the end, by their diligence and my own, we assembled together more than three hundred Vessels at Brundisium, and caus'd our Troops to imbarque in a good condition, and fairer resolution. At the head of this Armada I rowed towards Africa with a favourable wind, and I went to seek Heraclian, who not only believ'd himself Master of the Sea, but out of the disdain he had of the weakness of Honorius, publish'd openly his thoughts of aspiring to the Empire. It is most certain, that in the posture wherein affairs were, if Heraclian had been an able man of War, or a man as capable of a great execution, as he had shew'd himself of a great enterprize, he had rais'd those disorders in the Empire would difficultly have been remedied. In effect, possibly since the time of Xerxes there hath not been seen on the Sea a Naval force parallel to his, nor had ever any Roman Emperour covered the Deep with so many Vessels as were now seen under a deputed Governour of Africa. Many persons have reported in the world that he had five thousand, and those who have given him the least, have assur'd that he had more than four thousand, but they were divided through all the coasts of Africa, and out of a thought he had that the Emperour would not in a long time be in a condition to send against him any Army that durst assault him, he permitted them to wander in disorder, whilst he remain'd at Carthage fix'd to his love, and in vain employ'd to undermine the heart of Belamira. I believe it was this passion which in part distract'd him, and that the Heavens, enemy to Traitors, would make use of it to his ruine, and permit his thoughts to be so disturb'd with it, that he could not profit himself of his advantages, nor do all that mischief he might have done, had he employ'd his forces as any other would without doubt have done. I understood with infinite content that they were separated in many places of Africa, and not being willing to give them the time to assemble them, I made towards the nearest with intentions to fight them, and that with so much diligence, that in few days I discovered them, knew them, and assaulted them.

As I will not my Lords draw this discourse to too tedious a length, I shall not tell you all the particulars of the Engagements on the coast of Africa: You shall only understand that we were vanquishers in this first, in which we sent more than forty Vessels to the bottom, took more than twenty, and gave chase to the rest in such manner that for a long time they could not reunite: But some days after having understood that another Lieutenant of Heraclian's came with three hundred Sail, to joyn with him whom we had before defeated, we made towards him, boarded him, burnt good part of his Vessels, and defeated him with an advantage yet more entire than that of the first. It is true that we could draw but little glory from these Victories, and must confess that Heraclian having gathered together a world of men without chusing them, only to fill his Vessels, and to compleat a number rather than fight, they scarce made any light resistance, and so soon as the least fear had seized them, they knew neither Orders, nor Officers, but fled with full sails without maintaining any fight. This begot in us so great a disdain for them, that without any regard to their number, we went to seek them through all the coasts of Africa, and without any difficulty defeated all those we could engage.

In fine, Heraclian awaken'd, and believing himself yet strong enough to vanquish us, set sail from Carthage with more than five hundred Vessels, and came to meet us then when we were about to go seek him at Carthage, with a confidence drawn from the disdain we had for his men, and for himself, which hindred us from fearing the advantage the number of men might give him over us: Nor were we any whit deceived, though by reason of the difference of the Forces, and the presence of Heraclian, this Battel was somewhat more doubtful, and much more bloody than the others. But in fine, we were Vanquishers as we had been in the former, and Heraclian seeing his Vessels either sunk or dispersed, fled with a very small number, and regain'd Carthage with an admirable hast. He knew he had Forces on Land with which he could yet oppose us; that the City was in a condition to endure a long Siege, if we durst assault it; and that which he considered not the least, was that he had left Bellamira under the Guard of his most affectionate friends.

After this defeat of Heraclian all his Vessels were dispersed on all sides, and of that terrible number which he had sometime before, there scarce remain'd one on the Sea in a posture to fight. We praised the Heavens for these Victories so easily obtain'd, and with an entire hope of the success of this War we rowed directly towards Carthage. I understood that Bellamira was there, and with the desire I had to serve my Sovereign and my Country, my love importun'd me to pierce with our Arms into the very bosome of Africa: we expected in all likelihood to find yet more resistance, but while we approached Carthage, Heaven and Fortune fought for us, and facilitated our Victory, by an assistance which we expected not, and of which the recital will give you some astonishment.

After that Heraclian had taken away Bellamira, and with so much diligence as I have told you led her into Africa, he had employed all manner of endeavours to sweeten that aversion and disdain she had for him, but he had laboured in vain; and this virtuous and courageous person drawing from this last effect of his infidelity, farther subject to despise him, had continually look'd upon him with a disdain as great as possibly she could bear to the meanest or worst of men. Heraclian however was not daunted, but as he truly lov'd her with a violent passion, and wanted nothing of spirit and address in any thing he would apply himself to, he had forgot nothing which was probable to produce the effect he desir'd, in a mind less firm than that of Bellamira: He had continually treated her with all appearances of a great respect, and saving only liberty which he had never offer'd her, and which she had never deign'd to require of him, knowing well she should have in vain demanded it, there was no civility but was rendred to her. He likewise used towards her this submission without reluctance, and without dissimulation: for as he had known those excellent virtues with which her admirable beauty was accompanied, by all sorts of marks he judg'd her descended of an illustrious blood, and by the refusal she had made of the Dignity to which the Emperour would have advanc'd her, regarding her as something more great than that she had disdain'd: he had truly a design to espouse her, and acted with her as with a person who expected to possess her by honourable ways. But in this design he was no less odious to Bellamira than in all others, and when he made the proposition (which was on the Sea between Genova and Carthage) beholding him with eyes full of disdain, There is some appearance, said she, that if I must have espoused either Honorius or Heraclian, I should have preferred Honorius before Heraclian: but there is very little said she, that I will become the Spouse of Heraclian, having refus'd to be Spouse to Honorius. It will not be without example, replied Heraclian, to see a person like Heraclian prefer'd, who hath courage, spirit, and birth sufficiently illustrious, before a man like Honorius, who by his faintheartedness is rendred unworthy of the degree he holds in the world, and is expos'd to the disdain of all the earth. You ought possibly, replied Bellamira, to speak with more respect of your Sovereign: but though he were not so, and that you were equal to him in birth and dignity, this equality should not turn the balance in the difference I make between you. You would judge otherwise, replied Heraclian, if you were less prepossessed with an aversion I have not possibly merited; but I hope that time will banish it from your thoughts, and make a more favourable opinion succeed: but if the Imperial Dignity can bring any change in my condition with you, I am not perhaps so far distant from it, that I may not aspire to it with no small likelihood. Heaven, said Bellamira, gives not always favourable events to wicked intentions, nor can I believe you can mount so easily to the Dignity of your

Mister; but when this change shall happen, it will not excite any in my heart for you, nor would you be more considerable to me than you are, should you be Emperour of the whole world.

He never received more favourable answers, nor was it known that her captivity wrought any effect on her courage, and when he was come to Carthage, where he saw himself with an absolute power, and that in all likelihood she had little means to defend herself against his will, he found no change in hers; and though Bellamira had a spirit sweet and moderate, which permitted her not to transport her self to threats and invectives, in all her moderation she was unshaken, and the amorous Heraclian lost in the end his hopes, that time or the proofs of his love might bend her. This knowledge which he receiv'd with infinite grief, rendred his spirit more fierce than it had hitherto appeared, or rather the true inclinations of Heraclian which hitherto he had endeavoured to dissemble, were now discovered in their natural colours, and as in his soul he had no virtue, which could oppose those motions his passions inspir'd, it was so much the easier subjected to them, because it found no succour to which to retire. It was now that he banished submission and respect, and that he began to talk like a Master, to a person whom her ill fortune had submitted to him, and whom all sorts of reasons ought to have made him respect. But this change of proceeding was not at all favourable to him, and the couragious Bellamira was no more mov'd by his threats, than she had been touch'd by his prayers. The spirit of Heraclian hourly sharpen'd by this resistance, and being one day transported to threaten her, and to tell her, that after she had so long abus'd his patience, she ought to fear all things from a man who could do what he pleas'd; Bellamira beholding him with an admirable constancy, You may kill me (said she) for having deprived of life the wife of Stilicon, you are not ignorant how to rid your self of a person of my Sex. I will not kill you, replied Heraclian, but I will seek my satisfaction by those ways which my fortune permits me, since you refuse it me by that you ought to accept.

Bellamira notwithstanding all her courage, trembled at this threat, and looking upon him who made it, with eyes in which her constancy could not hinder some tears from appearing, I hope, said she, that Heaven will defend me against you, and that instead of abandoning me in so cruel an extremity, it will make you feel the effects of its justice in my favour, and for my protection. We shall see, (said Heraclian, departing from her chamber) if either Heaven or men can give you any assistance; but if in few days you change not your resolution, you shall find whither mine will carry me. The unfortunate Bellamira sigh'd with grief at these cruel words of her enemy, and spent, by what I have understood, the rest of that day in tears and prayers, imploring the assistance of Heaven as most necessary for the defence of that honour which was a thousand times dearer to her than her life. She was likewise constrained to do that for its preservation, which she had hitherto refused for all other considerations, and the desire she had to hold Heraclian in that respect, which should hinder him from coming to those extremities he had made her fear, oblig'd her to act a violence on her inclinations, and dissemble a part of the aversion she had for him. She withheld her self for some days from giving him such fierce replies as she had been accus'tom'd, and forced her visage to appear less severe than it had for some time accus'tom'd to be. Heraclian knew this to be the effect of his threats, and would not be abus'd by this feigned sweetning of Bellamira, but persisted to make her know, that he would be happy in some manner or other. He dissembled however a part of his design, till such time as he understood we came against him, that we had defeated his first Squadrons, and that we marched against the others. But when in fine he was advertis'd of the other advantages we had gained, that his Fleet was dispersed without hopes of reassembling, and that he doubted no longer but we would fall upon him, the necessity to which he saw himself obliged to fight us, hardened his resolutions to the utmost, and carried him with an extremity of violence against Bellamira, so that there wanted but little but that before his departure he had snatched by force, that which she would so dearly preserve; he was however withheld by an effect of the Majesty of this admirable person, which stopp'd his fury for that time, and having at his departure uttered threats much more cruel than those that had made her so much fear, I depart, said he, to go fight against those enemies you arm against me, and I depart without having drawn any advantage hitherto of that power I have over you, but believe not to triumph over my indulgence, by the event of the Combat, whatever it may be; but be assured that whether Vanquisher or vanquished, you shall see me return with those resolutions no considerations can or shall divert.

He quitted her with speaking these words, not attending an answer, having left her guarded by those men in whom he had an entire confidence, and whom he had interested by

by all their fortunes, to be faithful to him in this occasion; he had a design to have led her with him on the Sea, but in fine was diverted from it by many considerations, and as he had resolv'd to flye and retire to Carthage, if he were overcome, he chose rather to leave her, than to expose her to the danger of the Combat, and the uncertainty of an event, by which he might lose her in his Ship, much easier than in the place where she was. He put himself then to Sea, came toward us, gave us Battel, which as I have told you he lost, after a Combat more resolute than any of the former, though not sufficient to gain us any great glory from the Victory. So soon as he saw his Forces sunk or dispers'd, he fled as he had resolv'd, and with an admirable swiftness regained the Port of Carthage. Being little loved in his Government, and fear of his Authority only having made the Africans arm in his favour, the Inhabitants of Carthage saw him return alone, and in disorder, without much sorrow for him; and if they had not feared the Troops which he had yet in the City, and in the Field, they had possibly given more visible marks. But the poor Bellamira, though she understood his defeat with infinite joy, saw him return with a fear that almost depriv'd her of life, and remembering the cruel resolution he had pronounc'd at his departure, she remain'd astonish'd, immoveable, and like one forth of her self at his arrival.

Nor was it without reason that she feared, and that she trembled, the danger being possibly greater than what she had conceiv'd to her self. In effect, this wicked person had scarce given some Orders at the Port, and at the City, to prepare things for defence, and those such Orders as denoted the disorder of his Soul, and the trouble which possess'd it, but full of fury which perplex'd him more than ever, now that the ill state of his affairs ought to have inspir'd him with other designs, he went to find Bellamira, she grew pale, and trembled from head to foot seeing him enter, nor had she the power to remove from her place, by reason of the fear which had gain'd a predominancy in her soul, and possibly the marks she gave of it were favourable to her, and by making Heraclian believe she was shaken in her resolutions, she made him omit the effects of his own till the morrow. In summ, were it for this reason, or others unknown to us, seeing that the night was already far advanced, and himself appear'd wearied with the travel he had that day suffer'd, he contented himself to tell Bellamira in a terrible manner, and with a voice which had something in it of fatal, that he gave her yet that night to resolve her self, but that he would not deprive himself longer of what the uncertain events of war might rob him of for ever, nor make those enemies laugh at his innocence, who already triumph'd over his ill fortune; In fine, that arrive what could, the day following he would be possessor of Bellamira.

Having pronounc'd her this cruel sentence, he left her as it is said to resolve her self, and went to give the rest of the night either to repose, or to the disposal of those affairs his ill fortune had cast upon him. The comfortless Bellamira remain'd in her chamber in a condition which it will be difficult for me to represent to you, and letting her self fall into the Arms of that Damsel which had been taken away with her, there stream'd down a river of tears from her fair eyes, and spoke things would have mov'd to pity the feeblest Monsters of that Africa wherein she saw her self expos'd to so great misfortunes. Having lamented her unhappy condition as much as her great courage would permit her, she endeavour'd with that Damsel to seek some means to save her self during the night, not doubting but that if she could escape out of that detested House, and conceal her self in some place of the City, she might yet hope some assistance from the ill estate of Heraclian's affairs; but she saw her self depriv'd of this hope by the order Heraclian had taken for her guard, and approaching her Anti-chamber; instead of some women of Carthage which Heraclian had given her to serve her, she saw Heraclian's Guards lying at the door, and understood that for that night he had set them in the place of the women whom he had caus'd to retire. Bellamira would needs tempt these Guards, out of the hopes of a great recompence she promis'd them, to save her, but the fear they had of Heraclian's anger, rather than any ill will for Bellamira, had made them reject the proposition; she visited then the windows of her chamber, but she found them barr'd, and saw her self in the end reduc'd to hope for no assistance but Heavens in the danger which threatned her. It was then to Heaven that she had all her recourse, and casting her self on her knees, with that Damsel which shed tears with her, she dedicated the night almost entirely to prayers, and would not disrobe her self, nor cast her self on the Bed, though the Virgin often importun'd her.

This cruel night passed in this manner, and on the morrow, scarce did the Sun appear, but she saw Heraclian enter her chamber; there wanted but little that this sight had not carried a death into her Breast, or had not at least depriv'd her of that courage which was necessary for her in this occasion; but in the end she fortified her self by the assistance of a power that she had not in vain invoked, and seeing Heraclian approach with a countenance which denoted but too well his detestable intentions, and with a disorder which permitted him not to explain himself; Heraclian, said she, Though you come into my chamber at an hour which may make me fear your visit, I will hope, that by the assistance of the Divinity which we adore, that night which you have given me to take my resolution, may have wrought some change in yours, and made you consider the shame, and possibly the ruine to which you expose your self by that enterprize you have made me fear: You know well that your Army is defeated, that your victorious enemies are coming towards Carthage, and that in all likelyhood the Emperour, whom you have so cruelly offended, will be ere long in a condition to revenge himself of the injuries you have done him; I dare however hope, nay I dare, Heraclian, promise you a pardon for all; and I have so much confidence in the Emperour's goodness towards me, as to engage something greater for you; make advantage of this means you have both to preserve your life, and your fortune, and lose not this occasion by those crimes which will permit you no more to hope it. Consider moreover, that I am a Virgin, born of a blood sufficiently illustrious to merit respect, a Virgin who hath nothing merited of what her ill fortune makes her suffer, and a Virgin whom you cannot unworthily assault without drawing the Arms of Heaven against you.

Bellamira was about to speak more, when Heraclian interrupting her, If it be by these words, said he, that you would let me understand your resolution, you shall understand mine by those effects which you will pardon in time; nor will you be the first fair person hath forgiven offences of this nature. I prefer this pardon to that of Honorius which you offer me, and when I shall have satisfied my love, let Heaven dispose of my destiny. Finishing these words, he called two of his men, who at a sign he made them, took the Damsel which was with Bellamira, and though she cryed out, and struggled in their arms with all her force, they carried her out of the Chamber, and shut the door after them.

At this action Bellamira not doubting but she was lost, sending a cry to Heaven, and lifting up her eyes thither, Divinity which I adore, said she, assist me, and at the same time seeing Heraclian come towards her with a fury against which all her forces were not capable to defend her, she recoyled to the corner of the chamber, to which seeing him yet approach, in a posture which permitted him not to take much heed of himself, she threw her self to the guard of his Sword which she saw by his side, and drew it out of the sheath with so much hast, that Heraclian had the point against his breast before he perceived the action, and when he would have defended it, the courageous Bellamira plunged it into his bosom to the very hilts, and made him tumble at her feet, weltring in a River of his own blood.

At the cry he made at his fall, and at the noise he made beating himself against the floor, whilst the pangs of death seisd him, those of his Attendants who waited in the Antichamber to serve him in his wicked intention, and who possibly should have joyned their forces with his to have overcome the resistance of Bellamira, if he could not himself do it, open'd the door in haste, and advancing into the middle of the chamber, they saw the despairing Heraclian tending to his end, and rendring his last sighs, and some paces distant from him the courageous Bellamira holding yet in her hand his Sword dy'd with his Blood, and presenting her self to them in a posture to oppose what injury they might do her, with the same courage that had so well serv'd her in so dangerous an occasion; besides, that it was difficult for any humane eye to support those looks of hers in their ordinary estate, it seem'd that the action she came from executing, the extraordinary passion with which she was animated, and that posture in which she appeared to them, terrible in her charms, yet charming in the midst of her terrours, had not only given a new splendor to her admirable beauty, but had added something of Supernatural and Divine to what Nature had placed wonderful in her person, and made her eyes dart rayes like celestial fires, which permitted none to behold her as a mortal person. In sum, she appeared such to those which entred first, and to those which followed after them into the chamber, that they remained wholly dazled, and wholly astonished, without daring to approach her, and without having the assurance to approach Heraclian, to give him any assistance, had he been in a condition to receive it.

Bellamira attributing this respect which withheld them, to the assistance of Heaven, to which she believ'd she owed all things, and not to the power of her beauty, continued in the place where she stood without being mov'd, and pursuing those inspirations that had so well served her; If you come, said she, to revenge the death of Heraclian, you may kill me with your Arrows without approaching me, but the first that daunts near me shall lose his life by this same Sword, which by the assistance of Heaven hath defended my honour. These words pronounced with a voice in which, as well as in the beauty of their natural Charm, there appear'd a Charm extraordinary, seconded so well that effect which her beauty had produc'd, that those men remain'd immovable, looking one upon another, and consulting by their looks what resolution they ought to take. I know not however if in the end it had not prov'd fatal to Bellamira, or if she had not been in some danger among men who might be dazled, but not truly touch'd with beauty and virtue, if Maximinus, he who next Heraclian, had over them and over all Africa the chief Authority, had not at that time enter'd the Chamber. Though he had understood, and understood with truth the accident which had fall'n out, yet he could not but appear as much astonish'd as the others at the sight of this spectacle: he remain'd immovable, and uncertain in what he ought to do, when he heard to cry behind him on all sides that the Enemy appear'd, and that the Army of Artabure approach'd the Port of Carthage. This news strook the utmost fear into that man who by his countenance appear'd already affrighted, and Bellamira who understood it as well as himself, finding place to hope, maugre the danger that menaced her: Maximinus, said she, If you will accept the pardon of Honorius I offer it you, as I have in vain offered it to Heraclian: or if you desire the death of a Virgin, who hath saved her honour by that of her Enemy, you may easily satisfy yourself, but if you have intentions like to those of Heraclian, either by this hand, or by that of a greater Defender you shall perish as well as he.

I know not whether Maximinus was touch'd, either by the respect he ought to the beauty and virtue of Bellamira, or by the hope of the pardon she promis'd him, in a time wherein he might behold his infallible loss if this pardon fail'd him, or if in effect he had little regret for the death of a man who had too well merited it, and who was little belov'd by his own: but however it was, he by his Authority made those men retire forth of the Chamber, and they retired so much the more willingly, because the fear they had of our arrival made them desire a share in the pardon offer'd them, and then approaching Bellamira with infinite respect, Against other Enemies, said he, we would revenge the death of Heraclian, but what arms Divine Bellamira can turn themselves against you? Or who can condemn an action worthy all the praises can be given to heroick virtue? Heraclian hath too well merited his destiny, and it would have been too glorious had he received it from so fair a hand, in an attempt less disgraceful to his memory. Permit us to lament him by giving him the honours of Sepulture, and think fit, that under the protection you offer us, we go to implore the clemency of the Emperour, and open the Gates of Carthage to his victorious Army which marches against us.

Concluding these words, he commanded the Body of Heraclian to be carried out, and having some moments longer conferred with Bellamira concerning the orders he was to take to restore Carthage, and the rest of Africa, under the obedience of the Empire, he dispatch'd to us immediately some men, who reach'd us before we arriv'd the City, deliver'd us the Keys of the Gates, and presented me with a Letter from Bellamira. It was thus without finding any further resistance that we became Masters of Carthage, and of all Africa, which submitted it self wholly to its former duty: And it was thus, that by an Action worthy eternal memory, the incomparable Bellamira sav'd her honour from that affrightful danger into which by her misfortune she was fall'n, and executed the justice of Heaven against the cruel Heraclian, who ought to dye by the hand of a Woman, having slain a Woman, and a Woman descended of the blood of our Emperours.

Having set foot on shore, receiv'd the Inhabitants, and the Garrison of Carthage, which under the Conduct of Maximinus came to submit themselves to the mercy of the Emperour, and remain'd some time in the City, to place a Garrison in it, and give orders necessary upon such occasions: Filled with an impatience I could not moderate, I hasted to the Palace of the Governours of Africa, where Heraclian had so lately lost his life, and where I found the Divine Bellamira. I remain'd at her sight as much surpris'd as I had been at the first time, and if I found her not more fair than she appear'd to me at Ravenna, (because it was impossible to add any thing to it) she at least appear'd more fair than any mortal thing could be according to my imagination, and I found my self more lost with love at this second sight than I had been at the first. It had been easie for Bellamira to have perceiv'd it, if she had observ'd it, for my whole Countenance made sufficiently appear the trouble that perplex'd me. I bended a knee before her, and kiss'd against her intention that hand she reach'd out to raise me. She seem'd not troubled at this Action, but she could not suffer my submission, and she told me with a Countenance full of sweetness, that she was not the Wife of Honorius, though he had been pleas'd to honour her with his affection, and therefewe pray'd me to treat in another manner. In summ, she thanked me for the part she might have in what I had done against Heraclian, and protested to me, that she would all her life contesse her self oblig'd to me, though I was sufficiently recompens'd by the Glory of my Actions. I answer'd her obliging discourse with all imaginable respect, though my passion made so much disorder in my Spirit, as left me little liberty to explain my self, but having excus'd my self from the praises she gave me; It is to you Divine Bellamira (said I) that all the Earth owes those praises they are not capable to give you: for by this effect of your admirable virtue, you have so much surpass'd all Examples Antiquity can furnish us with, as you do surpass by your Celestial beauty, that which all Ages have boasted of as most fair. In summ, it belongs to you alone to punish Criminals, to return Provinces into the obedience of the Empire, and to make dye by your Sword those who merit not the glory to dye for your beauty. I held her likewise in some longer discourse, to which she answer'd with all the marks of esteem I could desire, or that I should have desired if my love could have paid it self with some esteem alone.

She made me likewise know in some following days converse, that her good thoughts for me might extend to a friendship and a confidence, and discover'd to me her thoughts concerning the love the Emperour had for her, with a freeness which made me believe she had a good opinion of me: But with this knowledge which flattered me with some hope, I had not yet the boldness to discover the love I had for her, and it was indeed accompanied with so much respect, that it was not without difficulty I took the resolution. In fine, I determin'd it by the force of all my courage (though certainly I had never been wanting of fidelity to my Emperour in any other affair, only in a passion which hath caused to him so many miseries, and which hath lost him in the World) and one day talking concerning Heraclian (of whom she made me understand all those things I have recounted to you) after I had patiently hearkened to what she told me of him; But madam, said I, Do you believe that if the Crime of Heraclian had not rendred his death odious, he had more reason to be lamented than ather men? Or that it would not perhaps be as sweet to dye suddenly by your fair hand, as to dye by your eyes a death more slow and doleful? I should believe it like you, answer'd she, if that death by my eyes could be truly a death. Ab Madam, (said I without permitting her to pass further) believe if you please that we may dye truly by your fair eyes, and that amongst those which are wounded, Artabure is no less to be lamented than Heraclian.

I pronounc'd these last words letting fall my eyes with a behaviour which made Bellamira sufficiently see the fear I had to displease her. She blush'd and remain'd some time without speaking, but afterwards breaking silence with a Countenance that denoted more grief than anger, Ab Artabure, said she, you would give me an infinite trouble, if I could believe that what you tell me is true. You see too well, said I, that it is only truth, and not a hope to be happy, which hath forced me to speak, since there is little appearance that she which hath disdain'd Honorius with the Empire, will regard Artabure. It is neither, replied Bellamira, the Empire in Honorius, nor the default of an Empire in Artabure, that can cause the happiness or the misfortune of the one or the other, but because neither Honorius nor Artabure, by reason of the condition of my fortune, can ever hope any thing from me. I am much perplex'd that a man for whom I have an infinite esteem, and to whom I am oblig'd, should go about to trouble his repose by an unprofitable passion, but I shall bring to this misfortune to which I am with little reason expos'd, that remedy which long time since I ought to have apply'd.

She pronounc'd these words with so much appearance of displeasure, that I was touch'd with a most sensible grief, and beholding her with an aspect which might testify it, Ab Madam, said I, would to God that I had fallen on the point of my Sword, or that I had perished in the Fleets, if I am so unhappy as to have incens'd you. It is not anger you have created in me, replied Bellamira, but I could wish with all my heart, that you had spar'd me the sorrow to see you lament for an ill which I cannot comfort, or that you had left me in an estate to have had always that confidence in you which I believed due to your virtue. Those persons which at this time approach'd to us, permitted us not to proceed further in this discourse, and I remain'd in a condition not capable to make any assur'd judgment of my fortune: for though on the one side I found some comfort in the satisfaction to have discover'd my self to Bellamira, yet on the other, I saw little appearance to hope after the knowledge I ought to have had of her great constancy and firmness of mind.

In the mean time I was oblig'd by my duty, to make a progress through some Cities of Africa, to settle them in their obedience to the Emperour, and where my presence being absolutely necessary, whatever grief I felt to absent my self from Bellamira, I was constrain'd to do it, by leaving her in a place where she was treated with as much respect as if she had been the wife of Honorius; and in taking leave of her for some days, I entreated her to expect my return, after which I would accompany her to whatever place she would please please to retire, giving charge my self before my departure, to prepare all things for her Voyage. My Journey was the shortest possible, and though I had many Cities to visit, and that I found Affairs proper to stay me, the impatience I had to return to see Bellamira, permitted me not to stay more than fifteen days out of Carthage; But O Gods what astonishment was mine, when at my reentrance I understood Bellamira was no longer there, and that under pretext of going to walk at Hippone, to confer with a man who sojourned there, called Augustin, whose piety and admirable devotion had acquired him a marvellous reputation, not only in Africa, but in all other parts of the world, she had withdrawn eight days before, and no news possible to be learn'd of her. This pierced me to the bottom of my heart with the most cruel grief I could receive, but she confirmed it much more strongly in my soul, when one of the women which had served her at Carthage, gave me a Letter which she had left with her for me, and in which I found these words.

Bellamira to Artabure.

IT is not out of a fear to find an Heraclian in Artabure, that I flye from you; I know too well your virtue, to entertain so injurious a suspicion; but it is to render to Heaven what I have for too long time owed it, and to acknowledge the assistance I received in that last misfortune into which I fell. Adieu Artabure, believe that I shall all my life have an esteem and acknowledgments for you, and take not, to seek me, that pains, you will take in vain.

In my Letter she had inclosed another for the Emperour, and because she had left it open, I read these words.

Bellamira to the Emperour Honorius.

THe displeasure which I should have to see my self accus'd of Ingratitude, by a Prince to whom I am bound, makes me Sir, take this leave of you, before I go to seek that repose to which I am called. The memory of the honours you have done me, is engraven in my heart in such manner, that neither time nor the accidents of my life can ever deface it; pardon to the misfortune of my life, the little means I have to acknowledge it; and be pleased to believe, that for the Empire you have with so much generosity offered me, I would willingly give you that of the whole world, if it were in my disposition. Remember in the mean time, that you are Emperour of the Romans, and Son to the great Theodosius. and make use of your virtue, to forget an unfortunate Virgin, who will never pardon her self the trouble she hath brought to your repose.

At the sight of these Letters a good part of my constancy forsook me, and I failed but little to testify as much weakness as Honorius had before done; yet I endeavoured with all my power to hinder Cassinus and the young Aetius from knowing the cause of my grief; and I daily represented unto them the sorrow I had, not to be able to return Bellamira to the Emperour, as he had commanded me. I therefore declared to them the intention I had to seek her, and that I would not retake the way to Rome, without having visited a part of Africa, to learn news of her, they testified great sorrow, both for the loss of Bellamira, and for my resolution, but they could not make me change it whatever endeavours they used, and being charged with the command of the Army which I left them, and with the Letter of the Emperour which I gave them, they embarked to repass for Italy.

I parted from Carthage as soon as they, seeing I could there learn nothing of Bellamira, and fill'd with a mortal grief, I posted with a little equipage through all the Ports of Africa, and almost through all the Cities to inform my self. I found not at Hippone that famous Augustin from whom I believed I might draw some knowledge of her retreat; and who was departed some days before without being known what way he took. All these things, and the Letters I had received from Bellamira, made me judge that she was retired into some Monastery of Virgins, consecrated to the service of Heaven, and possibly to that she had made choice of at Ravenna, where she might have changed her name to deprive all the world of the knowledge of her retreat. In summ, I sought through all, but I fought in vain, without being able either to hear news of Bellamira, or find consolation for my grief; but after that I had quitted Africa, and put my self to Sea, to see if I should be more happy there, than on the Land, after those courtes which it will be needless to relate to you, and after having escaped many Tempests in which I had possibly perished if my life had been more happy, I coasted Spain and the Gaules, and having run through the Britain Ocean, I was conducted by my fortune to a Port in the Country of the Frisons, where being known for a Roman by the Host with whom I lodged, he told me in great secret, that a little time before, the great Constance, him whose reputation was so fairly spread throughout the Universe, had lodged with him, and had been known contrary to his intention: he likewise told me some particulars which permitted me not to doubt it, and gave me some knowledge of the way he had taken. The remembrance of Bellamira, how powerful soever it was in me, could not deprive me of the honour I ought to have for that name of Constance so dear unto me, and the hopes I had to find some consolation with him, rather than in any other place of the world, made me resolve to seek him, by the tokens of his Arms and Equipage; I met with no small difficulty in it, and I often lost his trace, though I followed it as much as it was possible for me, from the place where he had lodged; but in the end, I have as you see effected it, and have encountered him by a good fortune, only capable to comfort me in my afflictions.

The end of the Second Book of the Third Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

Artabure having thus finished his Discourse, Constance, who could not understand the end of it without being sensible of the affection he testified to him, breaking silence so soon as he had ceased to speak; How too much generous Artabure, said he, is it then the unfortunate Constance you now seek in Germany? And that love to Bellamira which should in all likelyhood employ your entire thoughts, could it yet leave a place for the remembrance of one so miserable, whom the change of his fortune renders so different from what he was at the time you gave him your affection? In truth, this proof of your friendship touches me as strongly as it ought, and as the loss of Bellamira could not make you forget Constance, the loss of Placidia cannot hinder me from feeling a true joy at the sight of Artabure. I hope likewise, wholly unfortunate, and wholly disconsolate as I am, to contribute something to your consolation, and make you know that you ought not to make any comparison between your evils and those of persons truly unhappy. When those of the King of the Franks are known to you, you will not dare to think yours to be true miseries; and for mine, they are too well known to you to find any equality with yours. I believe that you might love Bellamira with that height of affection I have loved Placidia, and I will likewise, against the custom of all other Lovers, believe that she was no less fair, nor less amiable than Placidia; but in losing Placidia I lost a good which ought to have been mine by my services, by her affection by the promise of the Emperour, and by her own; whilst you have never been loved by Bellamira, have not known her, have scarce seen her, and in losing her have lost nothing ought ever to have have been yours. If you have any cause to lament your fortune, it is the not having been loved of Bellamira, but in that I must accuse you more than bewail you, and if I've may in some intervals hearken to reason, what is it that you seek? What is it that you pretend? From a person, who by all her procedure, and particularly by the refusal she made of the Empire, and of an Emperour young and amiable in his person, might well make you judge that she was engaged in another love; which in all likelihood permitted her not to be sensible of yours. It will be difficult for you (said now King Pharamond to Artabure) to find two persons more favourable than Constance and my self to a faithful Lover, or to a passionate one; but let me tell you, that if the esteem I have for your merit had not concern'd me for you, it should not be to you that I would extend my compassion in those things which I have understood from your Discourse; and that if I find any misfortune for you in what has happen'd, it is, that you have had an affection for a person from whom you could never hope any, and not that you have lost her by her own will, without your fault, nor in that likewise you could never be lov'd by her. And how had you done with Honorius, added Constance, whose disgrace would have been infallible, and a disgrace which would have been accompanied with some reproach in the world? To what would you reduce your fortune, and the effects of those fair actions you have done? And in fine, abandoning all things, to what place would you retire with a person who finds not retreats for her self in the world? For men truly enamour'd, said Artabure, I find that you reason very notably and smartly, but I know not whether in your own loves you will leave to reason so much power as you preserve in your discourse in speaking of other men. In the love of Constance, replied Pharamond, I see nothing which is not conformable to reason, save only the opinion he hath to be more miserable than my self; but for mine, if the particulars were known to you, you would have sufficient cause to say, that wherein I have devoted all to my passion, I have not too much consulted reason. But it is too true, (added he with a sigh) that in the misfortunes which have overturn'd the order of reason in my love, there hath been no rule to follow, nor example to propose. And for my self (said Constance to Artabure) as I know my self too unfortunate, I would not desire your condition should be like mine: Nor shall my prayers and counsels be wanting to make you forget that person, from whom according to my opinion, you ought never to have expected any kindness. In truth, (replied Pharamond, having ponder'd in his mind for some time) however oppress'd I am with the considerations of my proper miseries, I cannot hinder my self from being strongly concern'd in the fortunes of this Bellamira, who in so little time hath made so much noise in two parts of the world, and I owe her so much good will, for having given a death, at a time so glorious for her, to that Barbarian, who executed with so much cruelty the Orders of a Master whom he afterwards betrayed, that I cannot understand she is miserable without truly afflicting my self, and wishing a happy end to her misfortunes, which in all likelihood make her wander out of the Country of her Nativity. "I am touch'd like you (added Constance) and though by "the love she kindled in Honorius, she hindred him from labouring in the assistance of "Italy, and for this reason hath contributed to my particular misfortune, there was so "little fault in her, that I cannot accuse her, nor check my self for praising her for the "death of Heraclian, and being sorry for the little satisfaction she shewed to have in the "world. She could not make her self be known, replied King Pharamond, by two more "noble actions, than the death of Heraclian, and the refusal of the Empire; and in this I find "something so great, and above any thing common, that it would be difficult for me to persuade "my self that she were not of illustrious birth. She is so without doubt, replied Artabure, "and had you seen her, all things in her person would but too much confirm you in that "opinion. But Artabure, (said Constance to him) is it possible that she should be so fair as "you represent her, or may I not well ask the question whether she were as fair as Placidia? "You may better ask me the question, replied Artabure, than I can reply; but without "making any stop at the judgment which your passion and mine may cause us make, or "without particularizing any thing of the beauty of the Princess Placidia, whom I con- "tinually reverence as I ought, I will tell you, that all disinterested persons who have seen "Bellamira, have judg'd that there was nothing so fair as she in the whole world. They (answered the King of the Franks, though coldly) have not possibly travelled over all the world, and it may be that in some part of the world there may be something found as fair as Bellamira.

They had some farther discourse on this subject, after which King Pharamond leaving Artabure with Constance, return'd for some time to his apartment, where he had some Orders to give to the Officers of his Army. He entertain'd himself for a while with Ibere and Charamont, concerning a design he had a desire to execute the day following against his Enemies; observing with impatience that repose in which his respect to Rosamond had ob-ig'd him for some days past to leave them, and not doubting but that without wounding the consideration he had for her, he might assault them in those Quarters, farthest distant from her Tents, he gave Orders to Charamont, to prepare all things for what he was to execute on the morrow. Afterwards he visited Prince Marcomire, whom he found in a good condition, and very impatient to quit his chamber, and from thence he return'd to sup with Constance and Artabure.

After Supper, Constance spied the Persian Mitranes, Esquire of Prince Varanez, and him whom he had left him to recount the particulars of his Adventures, which he only yet confusedly understood; both Constance and Pharamond had a great curiosity to hear the relation of them, and therefore Constance no sooner saw Mitranes, but addressing himself to Pharamond, If you have still, said he, the same desire you have testified to me, to understand the Adventures of the Prince of Persia, and if this evening you have no affairs which may hinder you from lending a time necessary to their recital, we will entreat Mitranes to take the pains to recount them, and I assure my self by those things I have already confusedly understood, that you will have no small pleasure to understand in the same day, news both from the East and West. If I may not interrupt the discourse of Mitranes, (replied Pharamond) I shall be very willing to hear my part with you of the recital he is to make you, and if there be any things which merit to be kept secret, you may assure him for me, that I will inviolably keep them so. I promise him the same thing for Artabure (replied Constance) and I assure him moreover, that the Prince his Master shall not be at all troubled that he hath trusted them either to the one or the other. There is without doubt, (said Mitranes with a becoming respect) something in the discourse you desire from me, is so particular, as not to be published, and persons so eminent are concerned in it, that I should be very sorry to give the knowledge of it to men less worthy this confidence or esteem of my Prince. But since he hath commanded me to obey you, I shall do it without fear of being blam'd, or without so much as a fear to divulge the secret of his affairs, by trusting them to persons who know too well how to discern things which ought to be kept private from such as may be made publick. You may, replied Constance, have an entire assurance of it, and we will be obliged to you, if in a time wherein the King can give his attention, and Artabure and my self cannot better employ our selves, you will satisfy our curiosity, and a curiosity (concluded he with a sigh) which in the present estate of our life, the sole esteem we have for your Prince can inspire us with. Mitranes answered no farther to these words of Constance, but that he was ready to obey him, and being entred within the rail of his Bed, from whence he made all other persons retire, he remained alone with his three Illustrious Auditors, and being seated by the command of Constance and Pharamond, he began his discourse in this manner.

The History of Varanez Prince of Persia.

THERE are few persons in the world unacquainted with the power of the great Kings of Persia, who first in the world made Nations behold the Magnificence and Grandeur of the Royal Dignity. All the world hath understood, to what degree the great Cyrus advanc'd this Monarchy, and in what splendour it remained under his Successors (who extended their Dominions over all Asia, and a good part of Africa) until the last Darius, who yielding to the fortune of Alexander, saw that proud Dominion overturn'd by his fall, and so many great Provinces as had compos'd his Empire, subdued under the power of his Enemies. Yet they were not the Successors of Alexander, which reigned over Persia: for soon soon after his death it was snatch'd away, together with Parthia, Hircania, Margiana, and many other great Provinces, by the valiant Arfaces, who form'd and left to his Descendants, that proud Empire of the Parthians, which under those great Arfacides, whose names have been so famous in the world for four ages, oppos'd the Roman Puissance, and in the end, whilst Cordianus held the Reigns of the Roman Empire, return'd from the Parthians to the Persians, in the person of the illustrious Artaxares, or Artaxerxes the Persian, who having defeated Artaban, the last King of Parthians, restored its first name to that great Monarchy, and reestablished in the world the ancient glory of the Persian Kings.

After this great Artaxares Restorer of our Empire, it was extended and strengthened in its primitive lustre under his Nephews, who reign'd without discontinuation, until the time of the great Isdigerdes, who is at present seated in the Throne of Cyrus, and hath rul'd the Persians for many years, under a fair and happy Government. His Ancestors had maintain'd great and cruel Wars against the Roman Emperours, in which, Fortune had not always been favourable to the Romans, and particularly in the reign of Sapor, and the Empire of Valerian, who falling under the power of Sapor, languish'd till death in a miserable captivity, and a captivity less disgraceful to him than to his Vanquisher, accus'd through all the Earth to have proudly and unworthily used his Victory. This rigor having incens'd with a just resentment the Successors of Valerian, rendred the War yet more cruel than it had ever been, between the Romans and the Persians; but Isdigestes being come to the Crown at that time in which Theodosius yet commanded both the Oriental and Occidental Empires: These two great men, both the one and the other repleat with moderation, and many other excellent virtues, stoppt by a happy peace the misfortune of many Ages, and agreed together in such sort, that after his death Arcadius the eldest of his children, to whom the Empire of the East fell in the division, testific'd to esteem nothing so dear as the friendship of King Isdigestes, or Isdigerder, and not only preserv'd it diligently during his life, but dying in an age whercin he appear'd to have hardly begun to live, and leaving his Son Theodosius aged only ten years, instead of casting his eyes on his brother Honorius, who reign'd in the Occidental Empire, or on many others both of his blood and religion, to whom he might have trusted his Government and Conduct, out of the good opinion he had of the fidelity and integrity of the King of the Persians, he declar'd him Tutor of his Son, charging those who were present at his last Will and Testament, to pray him by all the friendship he had promised him, and which they had so carefully preserv'd during their lives, to take care of him as of his own, and to uphold his young years with his counsel and assistance. This Action of Arcadius astonish'd the whole World, and that of Isdigestes was praised as well for the diligence he took for the education of the young Theodosius, as for that he had to keep his Empire in peace, employing his Arms for his interests as well as for his own. There was likewise this Circumstance considerable, that having drawn near him with infinite difficulty, the sage and virtuous Antiochus, a man highly considerable for his great virtues, and having begun to employ him to govern the young years of the Prince Varanez his Son, who was born four or five years before Theodosius, he took from his Son that excellent Governour, to give him to the young Prince, trull'd to him, and sent him to Constantinople, where he hath educated the young Emperour with that prudence which hath acquired him a marvellous esteem through all the World.

It was then from this great and wise Isdigestes that Prince Varanez my Master was born, his only Son and lawful Successor: and as in his blooming years the King his Father saw all things in his person answerable to his desires, so he employed all his diligence to make him a great Prince, and forgot nothing which might improve either in his body or mind those advantages he had receiv'd from Nature. The illustrious Antiochus whom I mention'd but now, educated him until his fifteenth year, nor did he leave him to go to Constantinople but with infinite sorrow. At this time the young Varanez had already receiv'd those fair impressions he could desire in him, so that those who came after him had no great difficulty to render him in a little time such as the King his Father could wish him. As his Body was perfectly well made, and such as you may have observ'd, Masters were given him, which by the excellent inclination they found in it, soon rendred him more understanding and more ready in all sorts of exercise than they were themselves: and as he had his mind lively, eager and ready of apprehension, they instructed him in all noble Sciences with an extraordinary success, so that it might be said with truth, that there were not only few Princes, but few men in the World who both in body and mind had better profited than himself under an excellent education. He was instructed in Learning by a man whom the King his Father had drawn from his solitudes, and forc'd as it were with no small pain from his books and studies, which was an Athenian Philosopher named Leontin, a man accomplish'd in all sorts of Sciences, and comparable for his Learning to the most famous men of Antiquity: he gave to my Prince four or five years of his time, but after that would return, notwithstanding what the King could do to perswade his stay; and so he re-took his way towards Athens, to absent himself from the trouble and noise of a great Court not agreeable to his inclinacions, to go Cultivat, as he said, a young Plant which he had left in his house, and which at that time might have need of his presence.

In fine, both by the diligence of Leontin, and that of his other Masters, Varanez was rendred a most accomplished Prince: Nor did the natural qualities of his Soul give less satisfaction to the King his Father than what his education might have yielded him. All his inclinacions did naturally carry him to virtue, nor is he capable of any thoughts may absent it: He hath an emulation for great men, a horror for the wicked, and a compa-

tion for the miserable: And in summ, all those marks can be desir'd in a Soul truly noble, and truly great. But I must confess likewise, that this greatness of spirit is possibly to such an excess as might receive some moderation, and that as it makes him despise all things for glory, and labour with an eternal desire to acquire Reputation by noble actions, and to surpass those of the greatest men, which he proposes to himself for examples, so it gives him a fierceness which almost mounts to a Pride that cannot suffer any comparison, or measure, and which makes him look upon all others as much below himself. The King his Father, who is a Prince discreet, sage, and moderate, would often correct this default, but could not compass his desires: yet in the end he excused the effect by the cause, which was nothing else without doubt but a Spirit, great and exalted above that of other men. And this judgment which he made out of sole appearances was confirmed soon after by the fair proofs my Prince gave: For not long after some of the Provinces of the Partians rebelling against the King, and rising in a Rebellion so great and general, that it threatned no small danger to the State, the King being obliged to send a great Army to bring them to their obedience, the Prince, who now was past his nineteenth year, beholding with joy this occasion to signalize himself, cast himself at the feet of the King to demand this employment, and press'd him in such sort that he could not refuse it him.

It was now that I was plac'd near him, and from this time I can better than any other person, give you a faithful account of what hath happened to him. I will tell you then but in two words, (for it is not in these places of my recital that I would enlarge my self) that in his first exploits of Arms he did a hundred Actions worthy eternal memory, though in truth his Heat was something too boyling, and that desire of glory which had the predominancy over his Spirit, transported him sometimes to more than was necessary: That he beat the revolted in many memorable Combats, though their Forces were no weaker than ours: that in the end he vanquish'd them, and ruin'd them entirely in a great battel, by the loss of which they were constrain'd to receive all the Conditions he would impose, and return intirely to their duty.

The King ravish'd with these admirable beginnings, made a thousand Caresses to the Prince at his return, and treated him as these fair beginnings had merited: But a year after the King of the Sarazens with a mighty power, having assaulted our Frontiers, and the King having with infinite diligence levied a puissant Army, the young Varanez plac'd himself in the head of it, clad in the fairest Arms in the world (for I ought to tell you, that no man ever carried more rich nor more glorious ones than he ordinarily did) and marching towards the Frontier, gain'd two Battels against the Enemies, and after having chased them out of our Territories, assaulted them so fiercely in their own, and weakned them with such considerable losses, that they made a Peace as advantagious for us as the King could desire.

By these great Actions the Reputation of the young Varanez was spread through all Asia, and he was spoken of as a Prince who might in all likelyhood one day equal the glory of his famous Ancestors. The King his Father beheld him with a joy which he could not dissemble, and to sweeten what appear'd somewhat too haughty in his spirit, he made him employ the leisure which a profound peace afforded him, in many Braveries in which the Persians yielded little to any other Nations, exhorting him himself to seek the company of Ladies, or any thing which might somewhat abate his fierceness. He kept him a whole year near him in this manner, but after that time, though he beheld him present with him with infinite joy, and could difficultly suffer his absence, yet for some Considerations which he discover'd to few persons, he was pleas'd that he should depart from Persia, to make a pleasing Voyage which he propos'd to him. He having been Tutor to the young Emperour Theodosius Son of Arcadius; and since it was by his diligence and care that he was educated as I have told you, and as all the world hath known, he look'd upon him as his Son rather than as his Ally, and had continually entertain'd such a correspondence with him, that in all things important, when time permitted him, the young Emperour did nothing without his counsel, and by his Embassadors treated with him as if he had been his Father. It was believed likewise, that only the difference of Religion hindred them from uniting themselves by greater Alliances, and that if this difficulty could have been overcome, these two Houses would have tyed themselves by other knots than those of friendship. Both the one and the other often testified the mutual desire they had to see each other, but as Theodosius could not depart the Empire, especially in a time when it was threatned on all sides by those Nations which declared War against it: So Isdigestes retain'd in Persia by reasons no less powerful, and incommoded by an Age already far advanced, not being able to leave his dominions, resolv'd that Prince Varanez his Son, who was in a condition more free, free, and in an age might render such a Voyage pleasant and profitable together, should, to testify to Theodosius the true affection he had for him, go visit him at Constantinople, and confirm in person that alliance he desired should be eternally between their Towns.

My Prince receiv'd with no small joy the Proposition which the King made him, of a Voyage, from which in all likelyhood he might hope both pleasure and divertisement, and pressing it himself, he prepared with an impatience, which made it be judged he did it with delight; having been always very Splendid and Magnificent in all things, he was not wanting to be so in his Equipage for such a Voyage, and all things were prepared answerable to the greatness of the degree he held in the world. I was of the number of those appointed to follow him, and by my good fortune was none of those for whom he had the least consideration, or whom he the least honoured with his confidence. When all things were ready he departed from Media, where the Court at present was, but before he would go to Constantinople, by a curiosity agreeable to his age, and which was approved by those from whom he took counsel, he resolv'd to visit a part of the Cities of Greece, and particularly those of whom History hath made so illustrious mention, which had furnished Antiquity with so many famous Captains, and learned Philosophers, and which a thousand years before had made war with so much glory against Xerxes, and the first Darius his Ancestors.

To effect this design, instead of taking the shortest way, which had been by the Hellaspont, he pass'd by Armenia, and Pamphilia, and leaving Bithinia on our right hand, embark'd on the Egean Sea, and leaving to the right the Islands of Chios, Andros, Mytelene, and Delos, he land'd in Peloponnesus, where he saw the famous Sparta, so much renowned for its excellent Laws, for its ancient Discipline, and for those great men it yielded Greece. After Sparta he saw Sicone, Epidaurus, and the remains of the miserable Corinth; Argos, and Micene, celebrated for those Heroes they sent to the ruine of Troy and Peloponnesus; and passing into Achaia, he saw the illustrious Thebes (less famous for its hundred Gates, than for its Epaminondas, its Pelopidas, and other great persons it bore) Delphos, and Eleucinia; and with more curiosity than all the rest, he would see the ancient City of Athens, the Country of Phaion, Pericles, Aristides, Alcibiades, Themistocles, and Miltiades, who by Sea and Land had gained Battels so memorable against a world of enemies, which his Ancestors had arm'd against Greece. But in those which he visit'd (for he executed not entirely his design) we found only the miserable remnants of what we sought, and scarce found we any trace of what Antiquity had so much celebrated, which the injuries of time had cruelly ruin'd.

My Prince was so displeas'd at what he saw, that he forgot a part of the desire he had to see the rest, and of many other Cities which he had propos'd to himself to visit, he now propos'd to himself only the sight of Athens, and he told us that it was less, because it had produced those excellent men, who had gain'd against his Predecessors the Battels of Marathon, and Salamina, than because it was the Country of his Master, the Philosopher Leontin, a man considerable through all the world for his profound Learning, and admirable virtue; in effect, there were few men comparable to him either for the one or the other; and as he was accomplish'd in all sorts of good Doctrines, so he had found out true Wisdom, and the disdain of things vain and unworthy of his esteem. After his departure from Persia he had very particularly apply'd himself to Judicial Astrology, and had found such delight in this Science which had made him neglect a part of others to which in his younger days he had been more addict'd, and by which he had acquir'd so much Reputation. He had been request'd by several great Princes to accept an employment like to that he had in our Court, and he might if he would have purchas'd great riches, and have gain'd no small esteem in the world; but he despis'd riches as things too vile to merit his respects, and dedicating himself intirely to his Books, and to his Studies, had embrac'd a solitary life, from which no consideration was capable to withdraw him.

Prince Varanez remembering the good instructions he had given him, both in learning and manners, had preserv'd in his Spirit an infinite esteem for him, and at his approaching Athens, where he knew he dwelt, seem'd to rejoyce out of the hopes he had to see him: He was not deceiv'd in this expectation, and though the solitary Leontin seldom left his Closet, and had little conversation with the world, yet for so illustrious a Scholar, and a Scholar in whom he no less consider'd the fair fruits of his instructions, and the glory of his noble actions, than his Royal Extract, he at present left his solitude, and came to meet him half a days Journey from Athens. Varanez receiv'd him with all possible marks of esteem, spok'e to him in the most obliging words in the world, embrac'd him many times, and caus'd him to ride in his Chariot, praying him to give him some days of his conversation, and not to leave him, at least while he should stay in Athen. The Sage Leontin received the Caresses of Varanez with great humility (and so much the greater, because he was not ignorant of the difficulty he had to bow his Spirit to the least submision) and offered to show him carefully all those things in the City which might merit his curiosity.

My Prince had a most magnificent Entrance, but that which seemed to us most rare (for all the rest was indeed but what was ordinary) was, that after that he had alighted at the Palace prepared for him, by a custom which the Athenians observe when they would do any one extraordinary honours, all the fair Virgins of Athen (I say the fair ones, for the others were not admitted to this Ceremony) entred almost as soon as he into the great Hall where he was to dine, with habits very magnificent, and Garlands of Flowers on their heads, and presented him in the name of the City Baskets of Fruits, Flowers, and other presents of that nature; Varanez received this fair Company with infinite civility, but he had no sooner cast his eyes on her who was at the head of them all, and who as the fairest had been chosen to speak for all, but he was ravished, and astonished at her admirable beauty. And one may truly say, that his astonishment, and the other thoughts which succeeded it in his mind, could not be caused but by an Object so transcending; and that all the beauties we had seen in Persia (where the women are ordinarily very fair) or in all our Voyage, had nothing which in the least part might approach that wonder we at present beheld. Her Stature was lofty and delicate, but the most straight and freest in the world, and accompanied in her carriage, and in her gait, with a grace wholly charming, and almost supernatural. Her complexion the whitest, the most united, the most carnation in those places where it ought to be, the most delicate, and in fine, the fairest in the world, receives a new splendor from her sable curls, and from that of two eyes of the same colour, but so beautiful, so lively, so bright, and so sweet together, that it is impossible to find in any others such flames accompanied with so charming a sweetness, nor such sweetness accompanied with so bright a vigour; the colour of her lips, and the admirable form of her fair mouth, have beauties which no discourse can represent; and when by a sigh full of charms, or by any other action of her mouth, her fair teeth were discovered, both by their dazzling whiteness, and their admirable order, they gave a new splendor to her countenance, which begat the most agreeable effect in the world. There were a hundred other excellent things in this person, part of which have not appeared to me; as her neck, which I never saw uncovered, and others which can be but imperfectly apprehended by what discourse I can make you. This admirable person was clad with a habit not improper to cause a great part of her beauties to be observ'd, and by the dressing of her head after the Greek fashion, a part of her locks, as black as Ebony, fell in curls upon her shoulders, and the other on her fair cheeks, making by these two extremities of black and white, those two opposite colours shine more advantageously.

But if Varanez had been surpris'd at the first view of this beauty, now when this admired person open'd her mouth to acquit the employment with which she was charged of speaking for the rest, and that to the grace of the action which accompanied the discourse, and to that charm which proceeded from the sound of her voice, she added words full of eloquence and delicateness, and explained her self in terms worthy the greatest politeness of the ancient Greeks, the Prince remained surpris'd, both by his eyes, and by his ears, in such manner, that neither all he had understood from Leontin, nor all his natural boldness could furnish him, either with courage or words to answer to the discourse she had made; but in the end, opening his mouth in disorder, and without knowing what he ought to say; Divine person, began he, Divine person, repeated he again, The astonishment which the sight of an Object so admirable may give to all hearts, leaves me not liberty to explain my self, nor have I words but to tell you, that neither ancient Greece, nor all the Nations of the world have ever produc'd anything which may approach your beauty.

He spoke only these words in answer to her discourse, and afterwards turning himself towards Leontin which stood behind him; Ab Leontin, said he, Is it possible that amongst the rarities you have recounted me of your City, you have made no mention of a wonder which is without doubt the greatest ornament of it. Leontin sigh'd at these words of the Prince; and in fine, answering him with an austere gravity; That which you call a wonder, my Lord, said he, does not seem worthy for you to take the least notice of it, nor is it with a Virgin of so mean a merit that I ought to entertain you. From any other than you, replied Varanez, I should with difficulty suffer such a discourse, but I see well you speak of beauties in Philosophy, and like a man more us'd to your Books, than the contemplation of so fair an Object; tell me however, added he, what is the name, and what is the Birth of this admirable person?

If after having spoken so unworthily of her, I should yet address my self to you. No person, (replied the Philosopher lighting) can tell you more of her than my self, and since you command it, my Lord, I will tell you, that this Virgin is called Athenais, and that her Father is Leontin. How Leontin, cryed my Prince, Is this admirable person then your Daughter? and is this that Athenais of whom I have heard you speak, and whom you left so little in your house when you were called to the Court of Persia? "It is the same, my Lord, (replied Leontin) and it is a Virgin to whom you ought to pardon the faults your presence makes her commit, so much the readier, because she hath passed almost all her life in a Chamber, and that for any other but the Prince of Persia she had not appeared at this Ceremony. "O Gods, (cryed my Prince, mov'd by the first passion that had transforted him) can it be that a person so admirable should be born to Leontin, and not to an Emperour of the Orient? For being the Daughter of a poor Philosopher, replied Leontin, she hath her inclinations nothing meaner, and we have understood, both she, and me, to make less esteem of Fortune than Virtue. "My Father, (said the Prince, for he often called him so) I have not spoke these words to offend you, but since all the world are not Philosophers, you ought not to wonder that I have withed your Daughter a Fortune proportionable to her merit, and our inclinations.

At these words, without speaking farther to him, or to any other of those persons who stood in great multitudes in the Hall, approaching Athenais, who was retired some paces amongst the other Virgins, after she had acquitted her self of what she had in charge, and addressing himself to her with as much respect as if she had been truly what he wished her, "Fair Athenais, said he, as you are the Daughter of my Father, and I the Scholar of yours, I have a little more right to approach you than if there were not this kind of alliance between us, and you must permit me to look upon you at present, not as the Deputy of the fair Virgins of Athens, but as the Glory of Greece, and the Ornament of the whole world. The charming Athenais blush'd at this discourse of Varanez, and her modesty made her keep some moments of silence; but as she was admirably well instructed, not only in all things which persons of her Age or Sex might understand, but in many fair Sciences which ordinarily pass their learning and knowledge, and as her Father seeing in her mind no less beauty than in her body, had improv'd it with an admirable diligence, she remov'd her bashfulness by a modest boldness; and having observed in the countenance of Leontin, which she consulted with her eyes, that she was permitted to answer the Prince's discourse; "My Lord, said she, As the first quality you do me the honour to give me is more due than the last, I receive it with much more joy, and I doubt not but it was for the honour my Father had to contribute to your education, rather than for my beauty, that I was chosen among my companions to pay you the duty of our City. "Your Father, replied Varanez, is much more considerable for the birth of Athenais, than for the education of the Prince of Persia; and when with me he had educated all the Princes of the world, he would have been for it less glorious than for having sent into the world the fairest person of the world. But, (added he, speaking to her a little lower) it is not here that I am to dispute with you concerning this question, and I hope, as the Scholar of your Father, you will permit me to return the visit I have received from you.

After these words he spoke no more to her particularly, not finding himself in a condition to entertain her, concerning any other thing but what he was sensible of, and not judging it convenient to speak to her of that in so great company: A little time after the Company of Virgins retired, and it seem'd that the Daughter of Leontin carried with her all the brightness of day from my Prince's eyes. In effect, all things that the Athenians did the rest of that day to do him honour seem'd but troublesome to him, and he retir'd at evening sooner than he had been accustomed, that he might in his solitude think with more liberty of the adventure had befallen him. He devoted to these thoughts the whole night, without permitting sleep to take the least part, and the remembrance of Athenais kept him company so that he could not put it a minute out of his mind: Not but that his soul, fierce and haughty, did not submit without reluctancy to the yoke his passion would impose, or that before he submitted to it, he did not maintain within himself a great combat. To this age he had preserved his liberty entire, though by the advantages of his excellent composition, the fair qualities of his person, and the glory of his actions, he had obliged more, than one of the fairest Ladies in Persia, to respect him favourably, but now he found himself depriv'd of the greatest part of his strength; or at least he found not sufficient to defend himself against this imperious beauty, which at first had fettered him. How (said he, tormenting himself in his Bed) feeble Varanez, wilt thou surrender at the first sight of a Virgin? Thou who hast hitherto beheld with indifference, and possibly with disdain, all that Asia hath of most great and most fair? and after so many proofs thou hast given of thy constancy, in the most dangerous hazards, shall a simple Virgin of Athens presenting thee flowers, imperiously snatch away thy heart? Is it from the habit the Athenians have gain'd to vanquish the Persians from the time of my first Progenitors, that they resolve to make me a Slave so soon as I appear in their City? And do they look upon me as descended from those Kings whose innumerable Armies a handful of their men have defeated? Ah! I would pardon them this intention of theirs if Athenais were descended from the blood of Miltiades, or Themistocles, but she is the Daughter of Leontin: she is born among the people, and hath not perhaps drawn one drop of noble blood from all her Ancestors. Ah! mean spirited Varanez, is this a yoke worthy of thee? Or dost thou think thyself born for so disgraceful a servitude?

He remain'd for some time content with this thought, and thinking he had represented to himself with success, all that could inspire him with a disdain of Athenais, or at least of those chains wherewith she would fetter him: but a little after her beauty presenting it self to his imagination with its entire forces, dispers'd insensibly all that would oppose its power; and when he found this re-assault in his Soul, But my courage, said he, since it is by thee that my passion is assail'd, and since it is thou that art offended at my weakness, why comest thou not to defend me with forces able to resist the enemy thou disdainest? and why defendest thou not the entrance of my heart against Athenais? If thou judgest her unworthy to reign there, arm against her all thou seemest to offer in vain, and drive her from my soul, or cease to torment me. It is not necessary to be of the blood of the Gods to beget a love in man: It is beauty and it is merit that creates love, and not birth and dignity: I may love without proposing to myself any thing of base in my Love, and reason it self doth not forbid me from loving what is too amiable for any to be able not to love it. He pass'd the night in this manner, without having determin'd any thing in his spirit, or without being able to draw other resolutions from all his reasonings, or other knowledge from all he resent'd, than that he was absolutely amorous, though he knew not to what he ought to carry his love, nor in what manner he ought to seek comfort.

This nights watching, and the trouble with which he was tofs'd, made some disorder observable in his Countenance, or at least some alteration, and he was forc'd himself to allege some light indisposition to conceal the true cause. But when he was gone forth of his Palace to visit some places of Athens, for which the History had given him some curiosity, or at least those which had escap'd the cruelty of Sylla, who had taken and destroyed this City four or five Ages before, and that he began with a Temple of Minerva, which is yet kept with great diligence; by an accident of Fortune rather than design, the first object that presented it self to his sight, was the charming Athenais, who there made her prayers, and who as all other persons which were there, rose up and discover'd her face at the arrival of the Prince. The sight of Athenais made him instantly forget all that he had a desire to see in the Temple, and he was struck in such sort, that had he been observ'd it had not been difficult to have noted his disturbance in his countenance: he recover'd himself the most readily possible, and turning towards Leontin, who accompanied him every where, Tou did not advertise us, said he, that we should see Athenais in this Temple, but since we have that happiness, you must not think it ill that I demand some part in the prayers she offers up to the Gods: And at these words without attending an answer, he advanc'd towards Athenais, though it were with a tumult in his thoughts difficult for him to conceal. Athenais was retired some paces from all company, and the respect we had for the Prince, making us keep a distance, he found himself alone with her, or at least so far from all others, that without speaking very loud, he might say any thing without being heard. In all likelyhood this conveniency should not have inspir'd him with a design to speak of his love to one whom he had seen but a small while before, and to one whose person was compos'd in such manner as might create a respect in all men: but we must not measure other minds by his; and besides that, he hath a boldness in all things which never had its parallel, and that he believ'd that what he should say could not offend Athenais, it is certain that the great disproportion between him and Leontin, made him think, and possibly with some reason, that he was not oblig'd to the same circumspectness with his Daughter, as if she had been born in a degree equal to his: By this reason, and perhaps by a motion which he could not master, having accosted her with a behaviour and words full of civility, Come you hither, said he, to demand pardon of the Gods for the ill you have done to your Father's Scholar? Athenais who understood not these words, though she might well have expected from her beauty an effect equal to what it had produc'd, blush'd in such manner that from the place where we stood we might observe it, and bending down her eyes with infinite modesty, she made the Prince judge she was in some trouble, what answer she should return to his discourse. He felt some himself for the effect it had produc'd, and repented possibly for some time for the quickness he had us'd to discover himself: but seeing the first difficulty was past, and that the silence of Athenais gave him time to pursue what he had begun, If the Gods will pardon you, (added he to what he had said) I will not lament for this effect of their goodness, but I will implore them on my behalf, that they make you a little sensible of pity for the evils you may commit. Athenais was possibly unwilling to answer to this discourse, if she could have excus'd it, but not knowing how to retire her self from this conversation with a Prince, whom respect permitted her not to treat as she would have treated another person upon the same subject, seeing in the end she could not defend her self from answering him, I have enough to do, to beg pardon from the Gods, said she, for those faults I truly am, without begging it for those evils which I neither have nor will commit during my life. You may be ignorant of this, replied Varanez, and I believe you acted it without design, but you will no longer be ignorant of it, when you shall understand from my mouth, that I truly dye for you.

Concluding these words, he was somewhat ashamed himself of his boldness, and not being willing to continue a discourse which might have made the spectators conceive ill had it continued longer, he retired having saluted Athenais very civilly, and having done what he intended to do, and seen what he desir'd to see in the Temple, he went to visit those other parts of Athens whither he was conducted, and devoted the rest of the day to that employment; but it was with a prepossession so great, and he took so little notice of these things on which he had before his curiosity so intent, that it had been easie to remark, had he been well observed, that he had his thoughts full of something extraordinary, which rendered him insensible to all other things that could present themselves. He us'd however some endeavours to dissemble it, and to prevent the suspicions of the Inhabitants of Athens; he told them that he had found their City so delightful, that it would be difficult to part from it so soon as he had done from many others, and that if his affairs would permit, he would make some stay there. This second night he had very little or no more repose than he had the first, or at least he slept little more, though it be true that he was less perplex'd with those contrarieties which had disturb'd him at the birth of his love, and that he found some content in the advancement he had made by discovering his passion to Athenais, though he believ'd, as well he had observ'd, that his proceedings had not oblig'd her. But on the morrow when Leontin would yet have showed him some rarity in Athens, Leontin, said he, we will see to morrow what you will show me, for since I think to make some stay in the City, we shall have time enough to see all that can be considerable, but in the mean time it is just that I return to the fair Virgins of Athens the visit they have made me, or at least, not being able to visit them all particularly, that I acquit my self to their Leader of what I owe them, and that by the same means I see my Master in his own house. Ah my Lord, replied Leontin, both my Daughter, my house and my self are unworthy to receive you, and it is not just—— 'Tis enough replied Varanez interrupting him, and if my visit may not at all prejudice you, all that you can say shall not hinder me from paying you that visit to day. He perform'd it according to his word, and an hour after having caus'd Leontin to ride in his Chariot with some of us, he caus'd it to drive to his house, which was about a furlong out of the City, and on the way to Megara. We found it very handsome, though not magnificent, and accompanied with a Garden very curiously kept, and embellish'd with many Fountains, and some very pleasing Alleys. At one of the corners of the Garden, stood a very fair Arbour or banquetting house somewhat distant from the body of the House. in which the Philosopher Leontin kept his Books, and where he pass'd in retirement the greatest part of his life. Athenais had her Closet within the House, which was the neatest in the World, though it had nothing of rich or proud; she had likewise a great quantity of Books, by the reading of which her Father had given her the knowledge of all liberal Sciences. But it was not all this my Prince sought, though he seem'd to see them with infinite joy, for in the sole Athenais he encountered all that could at present please him in the world. He found her accompanied with some Ladies of the City which were come to visit her, for by the esteem all the City of Athens had for her, her house had been continually full of company, if they had not known the little inclination she had her self to much society. Her Mother was dead some years before, and she had been educated under the care of her Father, who for this education rather than any thing else had quitted the Court of Isdigester.

Athenais blush'd at the sight of my Prince, without doubt out of the remembrance she had of those words that had already wrought the same effect, but she did not at all discompose her self nor seem'd troubled at his visit, and though she receiv'd him with all the marks of a profound respect, she gave him however the honours of her house with so much grace and freedom, as it she had been daily accustom'd to receive Princes of his quality. Be pleas'd, (said my Prince, abording her and saluting her very civilly,) to receive for all your Company, the thanks I owe to the fair Virgins of Athens, and you will permit me to part this visit between what I owe them, and what I would render to my Master. My Lord, answered Athenais, neither the Virgins of Athens, nor the Father of Athenais could have expected this honour you are pleas'd to do them, and by the part I have as a Virgin of Athens, and the Daughter of Leontin, you shall pardon me my Lord, if I dare for them assure you of an acknowledgement full enough of submission.

My Prince return'd noble and civil answers to her discourse, but after the publick discourse had endur'd for some time, knowing well that in that company he could not entertain her with that for which only he came to entertain her, he testified to her a great desire to see the Garden and Cabinet of Leontin, and Athenais having offer'd to accompany him, he gave her his hand, and going forth of the house, he began to walk in the Garden with her; all the company as he had well foreseen out of respect kept a good distance behind him, so that he had as great a conveniency to speak to Athenais as he could desire. Nor did he lose it, for he had no sooner walked some paces with her in a very pleasant Alley, but beholding her with eyes full of all the marks of his love, and speaking low, not to be understood by those who came behind him, I know not, said he, If you can well pardon me for the interruption I yesterday gave you at your prayers in the Temple of Minerva, or if you have considered with your self of what I then told you. All that comes from you my Lord, replied Athenais, ought to be regarded with respect, but as those things you did me the honour to tell me, were but an effect of your bravery, and a desire you had to divertise your self, I confess to you my Lord, that I have not since so much as thought of them. How! replied Varanez, do you call them the effect of a desire to divertise my self, the confession I have made you of the most violent passion can reign in a heart, or do you believe any person can find a divertisement in losing his liberty, and all the repose of his life? As I do not believe my self capable, said Athenais, to produce an effect parallel to what you speak of, and particularly, my Lord, over a heart like yours, I shall with pain believe it is come to pass, and possibly should have no less disquiet to suffer this discourse, if the respect I owe you did not oblige me to it: but you are the Prince of Perlia, and I am the Daughter of Leontin. I shall be very sorry, replied Varanez, if you can believe that for the quality of the Prince of Perlia, I will dispense with the respect owing to your merit; for though you should be the Sister of Theodosius, as you are the Daughter of Leontin, this advantage of your birth should not hinder me from declaring the love I truly bear you. You would possibly have acted more circumspectly, replied Athenais, for persons of your rank and degree have other ways to explain themselves, but as those are not for me to expect, I confess the rest are little conformable to my inclination; and that they give me infinite displeasure. I should chuse rather, replied my Prince, to be expos'd my self to the greatest mischief that Fortune can make me feel, than contribute to the least of those you may receive, but it seems to me, that there is no reason why you should be afflicted for the knowledge of an effect of that beauty whose glory is wholly for you and the misery only for me; for in sum, it is not you that the arrival of Varanez in Athens hath made lose repose and liberty, nor is it you who by the rigours and absence of Varanez will be rendred miserable, but it is you have depriv'd Varanez of his heart from the first moment he saw you, and who have triumphed in an instant over a Prince, who hitherto had defended himself and his liberty against all other Beauties. If I had beauty sufficient to have done as you say, replied the Daughter of Leontin, I would willingly have been ignorant of it all my life; and I had been much oblig'd my Lord if you had spr'd me the trouble to hearken to you or answer you in a matter so little agreeing with the wisdom I have been taught. With teaching you a wisdom so pernicious, replied my Prince, Leontin ought to have depriv'd you of your beauty, either he ought not to have instructed you in a wisdom which permits you not to be belov'd, or he ought not to have left you in a condition that must force all the world to love you. The whole world replied Athenais, have not thoughts like to yours, or at least few persons have hitherto given me knowledge of it. I confess, said Varanez that the impatience of my love made me a little too rashly discover the knowledge I have given you, but it is a fault you ought to pardon both because I could not restrain it and because that being Scholar to Leontin, I thought in that respect I had some little privilege: However it be it is certain that I passionately love you, and I feel likewise that I shall so love you till death. I will give you those proofs that shall not permit it to be doubted either by you or Leontin, and if I can oblige you to some acknowledgments, I shall not be less happy, than I shall be miserable if my love cannot make you sensible.

He hastned to speak these words, being come near the end of the Alley, at which he must of necessity return, and expose himself to the sight of the company, to go towards the the Banqueting House of Leontin, which as I have told you, was in a corner of the Garden, and Athenais was much pleas'd to be deliver'd by this means from a discourse from which she could difficultly have retir'd her self, out of respect to the Prince. She therefore made a sign to one of her Friends, not to absent her self any longer so far from her; and the Prince seeing himself deprived of the hopes again to entertain her in particular, or contenting himself with what he had said for the first visit, employ'd the rest of the time which he stay'd with Leontin, to visit with all the company, the beauties of the Garden and the Banqueting House, in which, besides the great quantity of Books, he saw no small number of other things worthy his curiosity.

On the morrow he gave Athenais a like visit, and afterwards many others, in which, though she testified no small reluctancy to hearken to him, he continually entertain'd her with his love, and that in a manner so passionate, that perswaded her by all appearances; that there was no man more truly amorous than he. Athenais being a Damsel extremely sage, she at first supported very impatiently both his frequent visits and passionate discourses, and she had without doubt not easily accus'd her self to them, if her Father for particular reasons which he had, and which were unknown to all the world, had not commanded her to suffer them, and had not visibly testified that he approv'd them, so that in a little time the Prince Varanez saw himself in an entire liberty to see Athenais, and to speak to her of his love. And to her he dedicated his whole time, or rather his entire life, and gave himself over in such a manner to his love, that he seem'd to live no longer but for Athenais, nor to think of any but her. He spoke not at all of leaving Athenais, nor seem'd to think longer of his journey to Constantinople, but left himself to his passion in such manner, that never any man seem'd so fix'd to one. He believ'd likewise, that in the thoughts of Athenais there was something for him, which went beyond the sufferance of his love, and as he saw himself of a person so well compos'd, as might be lov'd by the most severe person, he believ'd that he was not indifferent to Athenais. In effect, as there are few men in the world of a better mind than he, of a disposition more agreeable when he pleases, of a fairer reputation in the world, and of a birth more illustrious; it would not have been strange if with so much love as he had, and as he had testified, he had touch'd the heart of Athenais. In fine, he had reduc'd her to hearken favourably unto him, and to tell him sometimes things so obliging, as might make him believe he was a little lov'd; however, this was all the advantage he had gain'd, and when at favourable opportunities he would strive for little liberties with her, such as kissing her hand, he saw her shew a countenance wholly different from the ordinary, and beheld himself repuls'd with a severity that gave him as much fear as he had love. He had likewise taken notice of one thing which much troubled him, which was, that neither Athenais nor Leontin would ever receive any of his presents, (though he had made use of many devices to make them accept them) nor suffer any of those proposals he had made for their advantage. This severity of Athenais in granting him favours, (for she had always refus'd him, even to the least things) and her constancy, and that of her Father, in refusal of his Presents, gave him infinite disturbance, and though he saw himself well receiv'd, and favourably hearken'd to, and knew likewise by the discourses of Athenais, that she had some affection for him, it seem'd to him that he found not his aims either in the behaviour of the Father or Daughter, and that he had yet much more to do, to render himself truly happy.

The melancholy which he had at certain hours, might be observ'd in his countenance by those who like my self were continually near his person, or had any part in his confidence; and one day seeing him more disquieted than ordinary making use of the liberty he gave me to demand the cause, It will be difficult for me to tell you it, said he, and I shall likewise have the same difficulty to tell you what is necessary to make me happy, not but that as you may judge the possession of Athenais would render me the most fortunate of all men, but out of the knowledge I have of an austere virtue, which refuses me even the least favours. I know not whither to direct my thoughts, nor know not what to hope, or what to desire. At least my Lord, said I, you know what is your own intention, nor are you ignorant, without doubt, how you ought to put an end to that love, to which you have abandon'd your self. I know that less than the rest, said he, and all that I can judge of my intentions, is, that I would make my self be lov'd of Athenais, as much as I love her, if it be possible, but that to compass it I would do nothing base or worthy blame. This was all that I could learn from him that day, and many others; but in the mean time I saw with infinite grief, that that Journey of so much renown, to see the Emperour of the Orient, was ended at Athenais, and that all the thoughts of a Prince so great in all things, were fix'd at the feet of a Virgin, who though of an extraordinary merit, yet was but Daughter to Leontin.

In fine, his desires increasing with his love, and possibly with his hopes, he contented himself no longer with the condition of his fortune, but after having made Athenais several times judge that he aspir'd at a better, without her having testified any knowledge of his desires, one time being alone with her, after he had several times in vain endeavoured to kiss her fair hands, Too amiable and too well beloved Athenais, (said he, with a passionate behaviour) shall I be all my life in the condition you see me, and will you refuse me till death those marks of your affection, which may render me the most happy of all men? "I believe not my Lord, (replied the Daughter of Leontin) that you can complain of me with justice, for I must believe I have granted you easily enough all that depends on me for your satisfaction. All that you have granted me, replied Varez, might be given without any affection, nor have I obtained hitherto any thing but liberty of discourse. "That liberty, replied Athenais, is not possibly so small as you believe it, for I had naturally so great a reluctance against it, as could not have been overcome but by the respect and by the esteem I have for you. For this respect, replied my Prince, it seems to me more injurious than obliging, and for the esteem, you know it hath been often given to merit alone, without affections hearing any part. "You have perhaps, said Athenais, known something sufficiently particular in this esteem, to discern it from that which merit alone can give; and you may well judge my Lord, that I am not insensible of the honour you have done me; if you demand further, it doth not depend on me, it is of others than my self you must ask it. If your heart be not your own, said my Prince, I have in vain employed all these proofs of my love, and it will be difficult for me to draw it from another place if you have engaged it, but if it be yours, from whom but from your self can I demand it? "My heart is my own, my Lord, (replied the Daughter of Leontin) at least, if you will permit me yet to call mine, that which you possibly believe due to you for those proofs you have given me of your affection, but it hath done for you all that is permitted it, and if you desire farther, you must address your self to him, to whom the disposition is reserv'd. And to whom is it I must then address my self? (said he very hastily.) "It is to Leontin, whom you see, (said she, espying Leontin to enter at the same time into the chamber) and it is Leontin who disposeth of my heart, even to the least thought of it.

This discourse of Athenais in the presence of Leontin, who had hearkened to it, and by which my Prince knew well that both the Father and the Daughter had a design to make him explain himself, surpris'd him with a great astonishment, and made him remain some time without reply; but in fine, making use of his boldness at that time, as he had done in all others, and answering very loud to Athenais, to be understood by Leontin as well as her, I know well, said he, that Leontin is not ignorant of the love I have for you, and he knows well I have not made it a secret to him; but though in the beginning he hath been less opposite than you, I know not whether in the pursuit, he will be less favourable. "You need not doubt it my Lord, (replied Leontin, breaking silence instead of Athenais) but that with the profound respect I have for you, I have all those thoughts you can desire in a man passionate for your service; but I know not in what manner I can be more favourable to your desires, than by commanding Athenais to receive the honour you do her with that respect and acknowledgment she owes to your person, and to that affection you testify. As Leontin, said my Prince, this acknowledgment of Athenais hath limits very strait, and a man who truly gives his heart, is ill repaid with only civility. My Lord, (replied Leontin very seriously) Athenais hath done hitherto but what I have commanded her, and I assure my self, that she hath done for your satisfaction all that wisdom and virtue can permit her. Greater proofs of her affection cannot be granted, but to him that shall be her Spouse; and since by reason of her meanness she cannot hope that honour of you, you ought to pardon her if she keeps within those bounds prescribed her by her duty. These words astonish'd the Prince, notwithstanding all his natural confidence, but a little after beholding Leontin fiercely, I believe, said he, that you cannot think that I should espouse Athenais. I see well my Lord, replied Leontin, that I cannot well hope it; but you must permit me to tell you, that in any other quality, and with any other design, you ought to hope nothing from Athenais. In my opinion, (replied the Prince with his first fierceness) that without having the design you speak of, I might do for your fortune, and for that of Athenais, things sufficiently considerable to content reasonable ambition; but though there be few things in the world which my love for Athenais would not make me do, yet the Daughter of Leontin shall never be seen seated on the Throne of Cyrus. No my Lord, said now Athenais, she shall never be seen seated there, but as she is unworthy of that high degree, all other things you can do for her, are unworthy of her courage and her virtue; and as she knows her self no more worthy of the honour of your sight, she entreats you my Lord, with all the respects she owes you, never to see her more. And concluding these words, she retired with a profound reverence, and left the Prince with Leontin. "How, (said he, seeing her retire in that manner) at less than espousing the Daughter of Leontin, is it no more permitted me to see Athenais? "My Lord, my Lord, (said the Philosopher, with a behaviour that denoted his discontent) you shall not espouse Athenais, but I dare assure you, that the man who shall espouse her, shall be no less great than you, and that you shall see her in a degree not at all less exalted than that of the Queens of Persia. It is the belief I have in a Science which is not accustomed to deceive me, which hath made me understand this, and it is that knowledge hath made me commit faults ought not to be pardoned, either to my age or to my profession, if I had not a design to repair them.

Varanez laugh'd at this discourse of the Philosophers, and having made him know the little belief he gave to what he had predicted of the great fortune of his Daughter, he departed from his house, to retire to the Palace where he was lodged. He passed the rest of that day in a strange melancholy, not being able to take any resolution between two extremities, either to espouse the Daughter of Leontin, or never more to see Athenais. "How, (said he, walking at a great pace in a Gallery which was by his apartment) shall I no more see Athenais, to whom I have given my heart, and to whom I have given it without hopes of withdrawing it? That Athenais which I adore, that Athenais for whom I die, and that Athenais whom no reason, nor no consideration can make me abandon. That happiness I propos'd to my self in a hopes to be beloved by her, is it vanished then like a vain smoke, and shall I not only no more see Athenais, but shall I be hated by her for the injury I have done her? But what injury, (added he a little after) what injury hast thou done to the Daughter of Leontin? and whatever effects her beauty may produce, what appearance was there that the only Son of Isdigestes, and the Heir to the most illustrious Crown of the world, should become Son in-law to Leontin? Oh Love! Oh Athenais! Pardon me if you think fit, but I shall never act this meanness, and I must choose rather never more to see Athenais, than espouse the Daughter of Leontin.

He alone tormented himself for some time in this manner, but having seen me, and having observed upon my countenance the grief his disquiet had created in me, he called me, and recounted to me word for word, all that had befallen him that day at Leontin's. I know not how to tell you my Lords, whether the recital he made of this adventure, afflicted or rejoiced me; for as on the one side I was not at all troubled that he would not espouse Athenais (though by the merit of her person I judged her worthy of a Crown) nor yet that he retired himself from a passion to which he was abandon'd in such manner that he forgot all other things; on the other side, I feared that a rupture made in so strange a manner, would beget in him a discontent, of which he would not easily be cured. This incertainty of my thoughts made me remain a long time without saying any thing, and when he commanded me to speak and tell him the judgment I made of his proceedings, "My Lord, said I, I know not how to condemn the design you have not to espouse a Virgin born among the people, and in a meanness so disproportionate to your Dignity; and I approve it so much the more because you are made master of your passion in an age wherein for the most part, it renders it self Mistress of man's reason; but if you be as enamoured of Athenais as you have done me the honour to tell me, or rather, if it be true, that the repose of your days is fixed to this love, as your actions make me judge, you need not so soon make this manifestation, or do it at least with some sweetning. "Ah for the manifestation, said my Prince, I cannot well hinder my self from making it, and by the discourse both of the Father and Daughter, you may judge well they have resolved to cause me to explain my self, and I will add likewise, that truly esteeming Athenais, it is impossible for me to abuse her, or to make her hope I would espouse her, not having any such intention. "You may my Lord, replied I, represent to her your present condition, and the dependence you have on the will of your Father, who in all likelyhood will never consent to this alliance, and by this means my Lord, you would give a different face to this explanation of your intentions, though in effect it would be but the same thing. "I confess to you, replied Varanez, that I ought to have acted in this manner, but the boldness of the Philosopher having mov'd me, I could not become master of some small motions of choler which transported me, and made me declare my self somewhat roughly. If this may be repaired, and that tomorrow, you visiting Athenais on my behalf before I see her again, can recover what is past, by the dependence I have on the authority of the King my Father, rather than any other reasons disobliging to her, and by your discourse mollifie a part of her anger, you will do me the best office I can receive from your affection: For in summ Mitranez, though I would not espouse Athenais, I must confes that it is impossible for me to live without loving her, or without endeavouring to make my self be lov'd by her if it be possible, and that if I lose that hope, I shall with difficulty find any joy or repose in my days. I promised him to do what he commanded me, and to forget nothing I believed capable to lessen the disgust of Athenais.

He wondred not at all that on the morrow at his rising, he saw not Leontin, though he had waited on him almost every day since our coming to Athens, believing that he could not now so well expect his visits: but not being able to live without the sight of Athenais, and remembering that she had prayed him never more to see her, to testifie the respect he had for her, he would not return to her house without demanding permission, and for this reason he sent me as we had agreed to discharge the commission he had given me the day before. But my labour was in vain, for (not to lengthen my discourse in places little important) I could neither that day nor the following find either Athenais or her Father at their house, but the third day we understood that both Father and Daughter were departed from Athens on a voyage, from which by all appearances they would not in long time return, and nothing could be judged but that they were gone to Thebes, to the Kindred of Athenais's Mother.

At this news Varanez was touch'd with a grief so piercing that it was impossible for him to dissemble it, or hinder it from breaking forth by most violent marks, "How cried he have I chased Athenais from her house and from her Country? and because I adore her am I become so odious to her, to make her quit her Native Soil, possibly to seek a retreat and Sanctuary in strange and forreign Nations? O cruel Athenais, O unfortunate Varanez, O ambitious and revengetul Leontin. Alas, added he a little after, it is to fly from thee, that the fair and Divine Athenais hath exposed her self to the labour and travel of an incommodious voyage, and exposed her self possibly to more terrible dangers; and it is thou alone oughtest to be accused for all her ill fortune can make her suffer. He added to these many more words, by which he expressed the violent agitation of his soul, and not content with words he commanded with all speed that his Equipage should be made ready to go for Thebes, whether he believ'd she was retir'd; and to follow her if he mist her there through all the Cities of Greece till he had found her. I let the first violence of his inward motions vanish, without opposing my self, hindering in the mean time as much as it was possible the Athenians and other persons who were not of his Confidants from the knowledge of what pass'd, and I acted my part so well that having stoppt him at Athens for the remainder of that day, at night seeing him a little more ready to hearken to me, I represented unto him the great noise that the effects of his passion would make in the world, and the judgments would be made of him through all the Earth, if they saw him run through all Greece to pursue a Virgin that fled him, the displeasure which that rumour would beget in the King his Father, and the ill effect it would cause in the Court of Theodosius, whither he ought to go: And in summ, to speak to him likewise of that of which he was most sensible, and by which I might best perswade him, I told him that if it were true that Athenais and Leontin fled from him, he could with little appearance of success follow them with an Equipage like his, and that it not being possible for him to march without great notice taken of him where he passed, he might well judge that those that fled him would have the knowledge of his removal on all sides, and by consequence as much liberty as they could desire to shun him; whilst if he thought fit to stay yet some time at Athens, in which place he might possibly learn more assured news of Athenais, than those he had yet received, and from thence take his march to Constantinople and visit in his passage some other Cities of Greece the sight of which he had propos'd to himself, I would engage in the mean time to go not only to Thebes, whither marching without Equipage, I should give no cause of suspicion by my arrival, and that if I were not so happy as to find Athenais there, I would seek her through all Greece, and not only promise him to find her if she were to be found in that Country, but to appease her in such manner by those things I should tell her on his part, without yet engaging him farther than he desir'd, that I durst assure my self she would no more fly from him, but that at his return from Constantinople where I would again meet him if I did not overtake him before he arriv'd there, he might see her as much as he desired, and with a leisure so much the greater, having acquitted himself of a Voyage he was of necessity to make, and for which the King his Father had sent him out of Persia.

I added to this discourse all things I judged likely to perswade him, and as there was much more

more appearance of reason in what I propos'd, than in what he had before design'd, And as he had no small confidence in me, both by reason of my fidelity and my address to find Athenais if she were still in Greece, he in the end suffer'd himself to be perswaded, and consented to all I desired: but it was after he had recommended to me those things I promis'd him in such a manner that he made me easily judge all the repose of his life depended on them. I departed on the morrow for Thebes, and my Prince having remain'd yet five or six days at Athens, during which he had no news of Athenais, departed in the end for Constantinople by those Cities he had design'd yet to see, and in which he flatter'd himself with some hopes to find Athenais or hear some news of her. This hope feeble as it was made him stay in those Cities longer than he had otherwise done, where in the mean time he employ'd all manner of diligence to inform himself of the Philosopher Leontin, and his Daughter, but all his labour proved vain; for he visited all he had design'd to visit of Greece, without hearing of either of them. Besides the desire to find Athenais, that which made him make a longer stay during the rest of his journey than he had otherwise done, and gave me the means to arrive at Constantinople as soon as he, though I had run through all Greece, was the counsel which many considerable persons of his Train gave him, not to appear at Constantinople before he had by a little time expell'd a part of that grief which had chang'd both his spirit and his humour, and not to come to a place where he should be so much observ'd, and where his reputation and the Renown of his arrival, had already for a long time been spread abroad, far different from the fair representation thereof that had been conceiv'd from the extent of his fame. In effect, he hearken'd to their counsels, and particularly to Megabises, who was a person of merit whom the King his Father had plac'd near him in the stead of Antiochus, to perfect what was yet wanting in his education: And though he could with difficulty dissemble a part of the effects of his love, yet having a haughty courage equal to all that could be called most great, by the force thereof he became Master of a part of his grief, and appear'd himself in the end at Constantinople in a better condition than could have been expected.

For my Voyage, the discourse I could make you would be needless, I will only tell you, that I not only went to Thebes but that I visited Argos, Micene, Madena, and almost all those Cities my Prince was not to pass through without finding either Leontin or Athenais, or without hearing any news of them; and being returned to Constantinople the same day that he arriv'd, I had increas'd his disquiet, by the little success of my voyage, if his Mind had not been already resolv'd on what he had design'd to do after his departure from the Court of Theodosius.

Many days before his arrival he met the Officers of the Emperour, who received him, and treated him with a splendor worthy their Master's greatness; and approaching nearer to the City he not only encountred the Chariots of the Emperour who came to meet him with a magnificent Train, but the Emperour himself (who was come to receive him at a great distance from the City, having caused all things to be prepar'd for the most noble reception. I believe you desire, not I should make a particular recital of his entrance, You my Lords who have often seen things of much greater importance, I will only therefore tell you, that the young Emperour descending from his Chariot so soon as he saw my Prince, who was already allighted to move towards him, made him a Salute full of sweetness and Majesty: And though Varanez not being yet possess'd of that Dignity to which he was to mount after the death of his Father, knew well the difference which was between the degree of the Emperour and his, and treated him with that respect usually practis'd in the like interviews. The young Theodosius, without considering in him the default of a Crown which he ought one day to wear, look'd upon him not only as the Son of a Prince whom he had always called his Father, but like a true brother, and like a Prince in whose person he would acknowledge the obligations he had to the King his Father.

At present all things in the person of Varanez accompanied so well his dignity, and besides the reputation which the renown of his fair actions had already given him in the world, his high and noble Aspect answer'd so worthily to what was published of him, and particularly that day when it was set off by a most resplendent attire, and the most magnificent habit that possibly was ever seen in Constantinople, that it was difficult to behold him with an ordinary consideration: And when the Emperour and he were both mounted into the same Chariot, but so open in which they might be seen of all the world, and that in this pomp they marched through the Streets of Constantinople. We took notice with infinite pleasure that the people and persons of quality that were in the Emperour's Train, and which compos'd without doubt the fairest Court in the World, testified no small astonishment at the sight.

fight of my Prince, so different from common men. The Emperour conducted him to his appartment at the Palace, and forgot nothing usuall in such entertainments, when all honours possibly were to be paid to a Prince of the quality of Varanez. The same day he let him see the Princess his Sister, I mean the Princess Pulcheria, for the two younger Princesses Flavilla and Marina, had already renounc'd the World and shut themselves up for ever in a House consecrated to the Service of that Divinity they adore. And because I am much oblig'd, my Lords, to tell you in this part of my discourse, in what estate we found the Court of the young Theodosius, and how it remains to this day, I will do it the more succinctly for that I doubt not but every one of you is better instructed than my self, and I will tell you only what is necessary in the pursuit of my discourse.

You know my Lords, what was the Reign of Arcadius, Father of the young Theodosius, and Son to the great Theodosius whose memory is so glorious: Nor are you ignorant of any thing hath happened of memorable in the Empire, since the great Theodosius at his death parted it between his Children, and made them reign in the Orient and Occident. You have understood the disorders which the Infidelity of Ruffinus caused in the East, who by the great Facility of Arcadius had usurp'd an Authority parallel to that of Stilicon's in the West, but with a merit much unequal: For though there be some similitude between the last intentions of Stilicon and those of Ruffinus, yet in the person of Ruffinus there was none of those great qualities which both for War and Peace had with justice acquir'd Stilicon the reputation of a great man. The wicked Ruffinus, who without any virtue had a power almost absolute, tormented miserably the Empire with his Factions, and had entirely ruin'd it if a just death had not prevented his detestable intentions. Eutropia as wicked as himself, had an end little different from his: and the good Emperour Arcadius began to taste some sweetness in his Government, when too hasty Death cropt him in the flower of his Age. The young Theodosius his Son who was but Ten years old at the death of his Father, was educated as I have told you and as you very well know by the diligence of Isidigeſtes our King, and by the good conduct of his Governour Antiochus; who finding in this Prince a nature full of Sweetness, Wisdom and Piety, did in his Education all was possible though possibly not all he desir'd. He found truly in him a great part of the qualities of the great Theodosius his Grandfather, but he did not find them all, and with those which he possessed he without doubt wish'd a greater vigour of Body and Spirit, and a part of those great virtues which compose Heroes. Making use then of what he found, he made of the young Theodosius no strong and able man for War, or for the management of great affairs, at least by what may be judg'd of a Prince who hath as yet scarce pass'd his twentieth year, but a Prince full of piety to Heaven, of Goodness towards men, of Justice, Clemency, Liberality and all that which we may call good or acceptable. He had possibly inspir'd him with more vigour of Spirit than he hath, if he had not died before he could accomplish his work, which was two or three years before we arriv'd at Constantinople. As Antiochus had very well known the ill effects which the credit of Favourites had produc'd in the Empire in the Reign of Arcadius, he decried Favourites as much as he could in the affection of Theodosius, and exhorted him so well, not to let himself be govern'd by persons whom love to themselves makes ordinarily sacrifice the publick interest to their own private: that he inspir'd him truly with a very great constancy to suppress the ambition of those who after the death of Antiochus sought to aspire to a degree like Ruffinus and Stilicon. But as he saw himself young and naturally an enemy to affairs, by a design which all the World at first blamed, but by the happy event have since approv'd, he cast his eyes not upon a Favourite who might ease him from the weight of affairs, but upon a Favourite who by her natural knowledge or by the inspiration of Heaven he found more capable than all men he could make choice of. This was the Princess Pulcheria his Sister, who not above a year or two elder than he equalled already both for the greatness of her Spirit and that of her Courage, all that the World can boast of as most great. With her spirit and courage she was endowed with many excellent virtues, with which the Emperour was likewise endowed, and though a person admirable in the Politicks she was observ'd to have no less Sweetness, Piety, moderation and Goodness than he. For her person it may be said that Pulcheria hath an admirable beauty, and those beauties which do surprize and astonish, but as she hath her complexion fair, her features well compos'd, her body most exact, and an infinite grace and majesty in her person, so there are many beauties do outshine hers, though to speak truth it may in the general be said that Pulcheria is a beautiful Princess.

'Twas then into her Arms that the Emperour disburthened himself of his load of affairs, and he found things in a small time so well manag'd, that in the end Pulcheria did entirely govern both the Empire and Emperour, but it was with so much approbation of all the World.

World, by reason of her admirable conduct, and the good order she by her prudence took in the most pressing affairs, by her exactness in causing justice to be observ'd, in entertaining alliances for the Empire, her knowledge in the choice of those men she called to the War, or to the affairs of State, her good œconomy in the disposal of the Revenues, her excellent orders in the Provinces to keep the people in obedience; and in fine, in all the functions of that great employ with which she was charged, that the Emperour ravish'd with the election he had made, saw himself the most happy, and most satisfied person in the world.

Affairs were in this condition when we arriv'd at Constantinople, and you may judge, that Pulcheria, such as I have in few words represented her to you, receiv'd from my Prince a visit full of respect, and all the marks of that esteem which ought to be had for a Princess of so great a Merit, and Authority in the Empire. My Prince likewise found in her person all things answerable to her fair reputation; and though perhaps before he knew her, he had conceived some disdain of the Emperours having abandoned himself to her conduct, when he had seen her, and conversed with her; he approv'd what he had possibly before with many other persons condemn'd.

During several days the Emperour solemnized the arrival of Varanez with all sorts of divertisements, and the great streets, and publick places of Constantinople, were for a long time fill'd with Beholders and Spectacles of rejoycing. But besides the publick, the Emperour neglected no occasion to procure to the Prince such as were particular, and as it were prevented his intentions in all things which he understood to be grateful to him. In the Palace were seen magnificent assemblies both of the one and the other Sex; and out of the Palace, the Emperour, whose age might very well carry him to these sorts of Divertisements, made parties in his delight, to which all his Court agreed the more willingly, because he was extremely beloved, and the whole City ran with joy to seek occasions to please him. Yet in all there was nothing which was not full of innocence, and conformable to his piety and wisdom. He took with Varanez a part of those pleasures he procur'd, and there were few assemblies, and publick Spectacles, in which they were not seen together; but at some hours of the day the Emperour retired, both from Varanez, and from all the Court, and my Prince remain'd not long time without knowing that he had some affair to which he was solemnly fix'd. He might have observ'd more, if his heart had been in a greater liberty; but though the Pomp of Theodosius his Court, and the daily divertisements, seem'd for some days to have charmed a part of his desires, yet his passion, with its entire forces, remained still Mistress of his Soul; and though apparently he was divertis'd, and seem'd touch'd with those things were acted for that design, in truth, nothing was capable to make it self be felt in his heart but that love possess'd it. The fair image of Athenais was eternally presented to his memory, nor were all the objects he saw at Constantinople capable to make him forget it. The violence wherewith he forced himself for some time hindred the Emperour from observing his malady, or the disorder of his thoughts, and he made use so well of his great courage to resist his grief; and the force of his spirit to dissemble a part of it, that for more than a month after our arrival it was not suspected. But as too long a constraint is insupportable, after that time slackning a little the great diligence he had taken to disguise it, the Emperour perceiv'd in his countenance, in his discourse, and in all his manner of living, a part of what he had in his soul; not that he could precisely divine, or know, whether it was to love, or to grief, or to any other cause he ought to attribute this disorder and alteration, but yet he could not doubt but his Spirit was exasperated by some very violent passion.

Out of discretion he for some days dissembled what he thought, but in the end his goodness perswaded him to endeavour the knowledge of it; and as he concern'd himself truly in the repose of a Prince, in whom, besides the quality of being Son to Isdigester, he had known a hundred other virtues worthy his particular affection, he was desirous to instruct himself in his misfortunes to seek remedies, and for this reason he often demanded of him with infinite sweetness the cause of an effect which he observ'd with no small sorrow, praying him to make use of all things which might be in his power, if they were able to bring any comfort to the trouble he testified. Varanez, who would not discover the evil he felt; out of the reluctancy he had to confess that it was a person of so mean birth as Athenais, to whom his Soul was enslav'd, answer'd with respect to the obliging offers of Theodosius, but disguis'd the truth to him as much as possible; yet however he disguis'd it not so well, but that seeing by how many advantages he had reason to be satisfied in his Fortune, he easily perswaded himself that he was enamour'd, and that he had left some Beauty in Persia, the remembrance of whom in his Soul had caus'd that effect remarkable in his eyes:

He often made this war upon him, and my Prince defended himself so ill, that in fine he left him confirm'd in this opinion, but one day, after some discourse they had on this subject, and in which Varanez had endeavoured with much steadfastness to oppose the opinion of the Emperour, Theodosius after he had stood some time silent, beholding him with a sigh, and pressing his hand with an action which had something in it of passionate; *I will not, said he, treat with you as you treat with me; and because I esteem you truly, and consider you as my Brother, with a confidence worthy that quality, I will open my heart, and confess to you that I am truly in love; Yes my Brother, I have as much love as an admirable Beauty, accompanied with a charming Spirit, and excellent Virtue, can beget in a heart capable to receive it; but as my love is not accompanied with any criminal thought, and that there is nothing but innocence in all my designs, all things are favourable to me: Nor have I any thing in my condition which may cause a melancholy, or trouble, observed generally in persons highly amorous; yet this advice is not enough to testify to you the trust I repose in you, but as there is something so extraordinary both in my love and designs, to make me desire they should be approved by a friend like you, I will, my Brother, make you see that person that hath begot in me so much love, and make you possibly confess, that few persons in the world are more capable to enforce a true affection. I doubt not at all my Lord, answered Varanez, but if you love, you love with sufficient reason, and as in so early an age, you have an admirable prudence, and a very particular knowledge, I shall easily believe, that that which you have judged worthy of your affection, ought to merit the esteem of the whole world; nor is it necessary my Lord, that to make me of this opinion, you should do me a favour which I have possibly never merited. I see well, replied the Emperour, that you have little curiosity to see the person I would show you, and for this reason I may possibly accuse you of little friendship, seeing you take so little interest in a thing which at present employs all my thoughts; but I pardon you, because you cannot divine whether this subject be worthy of that desire I would have created in you, but to finish what I have begun, if you will, I will acquit my self of my word without farther delay. But my Lord, (said Varanez, who in truth had little inclination to follow him, by reason of the eternal object of Athenais, which rendred all other women odious to him) as I am truly unhappy in all things which respect love, if by misfortune (as it is not without example) pursued he laughing, I should my self become enamoured of this admirable person, what remedy could you find for so ill an accident? Believing your affections already prevented, (said the Emperour) I do not fear that any such thing should happen, nor have all the world a liking like to mine, and possibly though you should have the same love, you would not have the same intentions. You will charge your self then, (replied my Prince, in a jocund manner) with all that evil shall befall me, and as I am here under your protection, it is you must guard me.*

After these words, and some other which the Emperour spoke in the same manner, having sent one of his Attendants with a secret order to the Princess Pulcheria, and receiv'd the answer: He led Varanez to the Princesses lodgings, telling him he need go no further, to see what he would shew him. My Prince now believed that the young Emperour was only merry, and that he had made this discourse for no other cause, but to express the great esteem and affection he had for the Princess Pulcheria, though he had spoke many things that did not entirely agree with this design. But he lost this opinion entering into the chamber of Pulcheria, where he saw another person with her advance to meet the Emperour and him, to whom the Emperour presented him, telling her that the Prince of Persia was his Brother, and that it was as his Brother that he came to present him.

He spoke these words with a respect most tenderly obliging, but they were not followed but with a profound silence, and if the person to whom they were addressed, appeared a little surpris'd at the sight of Varanez, my Prince remain'd as one out of himself, when lifting up his eyes on her visage, he knew it for that of the charming and divine Athenais. Never possibly was any astonishment equal to his, nor any spirit in one instant assaulted with so many different passions, and though to strive against his surprisal, in a necessity so pressing, he call'd instantly to his assistance all the forces of his courage; it was impossible for him to receive all that help he desired, or at least, to hinder the Emperour or the clear-sighted Pulcheria from observing his astonishment. Theodosius himself observing with some surprize that of these two persons, cast his eyes on the Princess his Sister, as if it were to demand the cause; but by that time the astonishment of Athenais, which was light in comparison of that of Varanez, being vanished, she made answer to the Emperour, and beholding him with a countenance, to which serenity was in an instant restor'd, My Lord, said she, by the sight of the Prince of Persia, your Majesty doth but procure care me an honour I have already receiv'd, for besides that I met at Athens when he was there, if your Majesty remember that I am the Daughter of Leontin, you may have heard that my Father was employ'd in the education of the Prince Varanez. I confess my Lord, (said my Prince, endeavouring to recover himself) that I could not see Athenais in a place where I so little expected to meet her, and understand at the same time, that she is the same which reigns in the heart of the Emperour Theodosius, without being astonish'd at so surpassing an effect of Fortune. Fortune, replied the Emperour, might have led Athenais to Constantinople, if Heaven had not guided her, but she hath no part in the effect of which you speak, for the merit of Athenais might produce things much more strange and more advantageous for her. "It shall not be Varanez, replied the Prince, who will dispute against the merit of Athenais, for I shall easily agree, that Fortune could do nothing for her but what would be below her merit. "I know not, replied Athenais, if you believe as you say, but I can render my self that justice, never to attribute to my merit, what I hold from my fortune. "All the world (said the Princess Pulcheria) act not with a modesty parallel to yours, and few persons with a merit like yours, would believe they owed any thing to their fortune. "I am content (replied very readily Athenais) not to owe any thing to my fortune, because it is to you Madam that I truly owe all things, for by a second Being which you have given me, I am more bound to you, than to those which gave me my first. "But Madam, (said Varanez, who gave no attention to this discourse) by what wonder is it possible that I find you at Constantinople? And if it be permitted me to make this complaint before the Emperour, with what cruelty could you conceal your self from a Prince who honours you as he ought. "My Lord, (replied Athenais very fiercely) I was not worthy of your remembrance, and my mind hath been so fix'd on those great employs I have had since I came to Constantinople, that it was difficult for me to retire from them. "I confess, said Varanez, that the employs you have had are great and worthy of you, since you have made the most illustrious conquest you could make in the whole world. "I believe not, (replied the fair Athenais) that you can make this judgment of the Daughter of Leontin, but however it be, I am so much satisfied with what I have done at Constantinople, that I shall praise the Heavens for it so long as I live. "You have done both good and ill, replied the Emperour, but you may repair if you please, that ill by another good, and not suffer any to be unhappy whilst all their good fortune depends upon you.

These words were as so many mortal wounds to the Soul of the jealous and afflicted Varanez, and whatsoever endeavours he used to dissemble it, it was impossible for him to hinder his eyes from discovering a part of his resentment; therefore whilst he durst not speak what he thought, and Athenais out of prudence would not explain her self in the presence of the Emperour and Pulcheria, whilst the Emperour observ'd the trouble in which Varanez was involved, and Pulcheria in the disorders both of the one and the other, read a part of the truth, the conversation of these four persons was very much forc'd; and had nothing in it of agreeable or pleasing; which the Emperour having in a little time perceiv'd, rising from his Chair, asked the Prince Varanez if he would descend, and walk a turn in the Gardens, which were under the windows of the Chamber, so he drew him from the greatest trouble in which ever in his life he had found himself, and led him away in a time when he knew not what to say, nor what countenance to keep.

When they were in the Garden, they took some turns in the Alley without speaking; the disquiet of Varanez seizing the Emperour, though rather by his goodness, which made him sympathize in the disorder of his friend, than any other reason, but in the end Varanez, who notwithstanding the violent agitation of his Soul, knew well he was wanting in his proceeding, and who could not hinder himself from discharging a part of what he had on his heart, turning himself towards the Emperour with more appearance of calmness than he really had in his spirit, besought him to relate to him by what adventure Athenais was come to Constantinople, why she was lodged in the Palace, and what was the design he had for her.

To answer to what you demand of me in few words, said Theodosius, I must tell you, that few days before you arrived at Constantinople, the venerable Atticus who holds here the chief place among those dedicated to the Service of that God we adore, and Successor of the great Chrysofostom, who for his piety and admirable eloquence, made himself famous through all the world; knowing the interest which the Princess my Sister takes in the augmentation of our faith, and the Religion we profess, and the zeal she hath for all things which regard it, came to advertise her, that he had for some time had with him two persons, whom the design to quit the Worship of those Gods you adore, had led from Greece, and that they had prayed him to cause them to be instructed, with a zeal which was extremely edified; and moreover, that they were two excellent persons, the one for his profound Learning, the other for her marvellous beauty; that they were Father and Daughter, the one called Leontin, the other Athenais. In sum, he spoke in such manner to my Sister, (who was always well intended to persons who had such a design,) that she desired to see them, and prayed Atticus to bring them to her. Atticus obeyed her. and on the morrow presented to her Athenais, and the Philosopher Leontin. Pulcheria found Athenais such as she is, and having found by her conversation, that the beauties of her mind were not inferior to that of her body, she grew so affectionate to the fair Athenais, that she would not permit her to return with Atticus, but having well known she would not be troubled to remain with her, she gave her an apartment near hers, where she continued, to cause her to be instructed, and in few days made her quit both her Religion and her Name, to take ours, and that of Eudoxia which she gave her, and which was that of the Empress our Mother. On the morrow she made me see the new Eudoxia, and in telling you that she made me see her, I must tell you that she made me love her, since in me seeing and loving was but the same thing. I will not entertain you with what this new born and fondling love made me feel, believing you have sufficiently proved it to apprehend it, but only, that having some days sigh'd, and being more and more inflam'd by many conversations which I had with Athenais; in fine, out of the confidence I in all things had of the Princess Pulcheria, I discovered to her my love. She seemed not overmuch surpris'd at the declaration I made her, but she told me that at present she knew not what counsel she ought to give me, but prayed me to think yet some days of the intention I might have for Athenais, and not to suffer in my heart any, which might offend Heaven or Virtue; in the mean time I continued to see Eudoxia, and finding in her Spirit and in her converse, charms not inferior to those of her beauty, I not only could not conceive any thought which might offend her virtue, but I permitted without opposition to enter into my heart, all those which I might have had for a Princess of a degree equal to mine, and discovering in her daily new qualities, which made me judge her worthy of all things, but among others, a courage, exalted above her fortune, but without pride, and out of the true greatness of her Soul, an extraordinary Piety for Heaven, an admirable sweetness in her manners, a marvellous eloquence in her discourse, accompanied with a great knowledge of the fairest Learning, and a prodigious readiness in speaking and writing several languages, and in verse as well as prose, a regularity in her carriage, full of wisdom and moderation; and in fine, all the fair marks of a solid and true virtue; in few days I told my Sister, that according to my inclination and the Idea I had of the merit of Athenais, I could not fancy to my self a greater felicity than to espouse her, and though I were a person young in years, being scarcely twenty years old, I propos'd to my self so much happiness in this marriage, that if she approv'd it, and Eudoxia would consent, nothing should retard it. Pulcheria appear'd not astonish'd at my discourse, but she demand'd of me some days to observe Eudoxia better than she had hitherto done, before she would give me her advice; and those expired, she testified to me not only that she did not condemn my choice, but that she should exhort me with all her soul, not to change my design, for she believ'd that Heaven had sent Eudoxia to Constantinople for our happiness; that of all the qualities I could wish in a woman, to make me regard her as fit for my Spouse, she wanted nothing but Birth, but that she minded less the default of that, than of others more necessary, and that she esteem'd more a Soul exalted in a mean Birth, than a low Soul from a high descent; That I was of a Family strengthen'd with so many alliances sufficiently illustrious, that I had no need to make new ones, and that in fine, by the Marriage I should lose nothing of my degree, and that I found a Spouse, in whom having well observ'd her, she found nothing which was not worthy of admiration. The discourse of Pulcheria charm'd me, confirm'd me in my design, and made me resolve not to defer the execution. The same day I made the proposition to Eudoxia, with all the marks of an affection full of respect, and she received it with a submission, wisdom and moderation, which had nothing in it of affected, and gave me place to believe, that she was no less sensible of this fair proof of my love, than of the hopes of that dignity, to which I would raise her. The Philosopher Leontin, who after his conversion was entirely fix'd to the service of Heaven with Atticus, regard'd the fortune of his Daughter like a Father, but yet like a man already withdrawn from the world. And in fine, my Brother, all things are advanced in such sort, yet however without publishing any thing, that after the return of a person whom I have sent to Italy, to the Emperor Honorius my Uncle, I hope by ways allow'd by Heaven, and approv'd by her Virtue, to be possessor of my fair Eudoxia.

Theodosius spoke in this manner, whilst Varanez hearkned to him with an impatience which almost reach'd a fury, and which with all the power which reason preserv'd over him, he could hardly master; but when he had done speaking, beholding him with an aspect aspect full of transportation, and eyes from whence his passion seemed to sparkle, How my Lord, said he, is it then possible you will espouse the Daughter of Leontin? Yes I will espouse her if Heaven so please, replied the young Emperour, and I hold Eudoxia more worthy of Theodosius, than Theodosius is worthy of Eudoxia. This humility, replied Varanez, would do well in a person of the profession of Atticus, but an Oriental Emperour, whose greatness all the world beholds, cannot without too much offending it have such a thought for the Daughter of a man, who hath nothing so glorious for him in the world as the honour of having been my Tutor. He hath so well acquitted that employment, replied sweetly the Emperour, that in that respect he is yet more considerable to me: but however, it is not Leontin that I espouse but the fair Eudoxia in whom the defects of birth is too much repair'd by her beauty, by her mind and by her virtue. But my Lord, said the passionate Prince, if you will permit the Son of a person whom you have always look'd upon as your Father, and who hath possibly acted in your interests, as if he had had that quality: If, I say, you will permit the Son of Idigestes to speak to you with a little freedom, in an occasion wherein you ought not to be flatter'd. May not I represent to you that those who counsel you to a marriage so unequal, regard only themselves in so doing, and that the desire to govern the Empire, as they have for some time past done, induces them to give you from their hand a woman, who shall be oblig'd to them for her fortune, and who will not trouble them in their dominion as another might do, not beholding to them for her greatness? Those who counsel me this Marriage, replied the Emperour sighing, cannot be suspected by me, but if our friendship would permit me to suspect you, after what I have seen to day and what I now see and understand, you would be rather suspected by me, than those persons of whom you would give me some suspicion. Yes my Lord, (said the Prince giving the reins to a passion he could no longer keep in,) yes my Lord, I ought to be suspected by you, and since I see my self reduc'd to an extremity permits me no longer to dissemble. I confess to you, that I am not only enamour'd, but passionately and like a lost person enamour'd of Athenais?

Theodosius appear'd so astonish'd at these words of my Prince, that he stood a long time without speaking, testifying a great surprisal and no less discontent. Varanez a while beheld him in that condition, and in the end breaking silence, I see well my Lord, said he, that the confession I have made you gives you some astonishment, and I ought without doubt to have constrain'd my self by a greater violence, to have conceal'd from you that which I have discovered in so cruel an extremity. I had great reason to doubt, said the Emperour, the best part of the truth you have told me, but not in such manner that I could understand it from your mouth without astonishment, or without a sensible grief to see that of necessity one of us two must be miserable. Oh my Lord, replied Varanez, there is no need to consider which of us two it ought to be, for I am already too much prepar'd for my ill fortune. As your love, said Theodosius, without doubt preceded mine, and as by the greatness of your merit and that of your degree there is sufficient appearance that Athenais hath not been insensible, it is not just that a latter comer, and a person that makes profession of a fraternal amity with you, should deprive you of a benefit you merit better than he. But I look upon it as a cruel thing that Athenais hath told me nothing of it, for if she be engag'd by any word or any affection for you, she ought not to have accepted mine, nor permitted us to proceed so far as we have done. I owe my Lord, replied Varanez, a testimony to truth, which no interest can hinder me from rendering, and I confess, that having in the love I had for Athenais, represented to my self, the same things I endeavour'd some minutes past to represent to you, I could not overcome in my heart that reluctancy which I had to be Son in law to Leontin. And at these words Varanez seeing that the Emperour hearkned to him without interruption, he made him understand in few words that which had pass'd of most importance between him and Athenais, and gave him to understand by a discourse of the entire truth, that though he had observed in the heart of Athenais some good will for him, and a great inclination to espouse him, if he had had those thoughts, yet she had made no engagement to him, which might deprive her of the liberty to dispose her affections, or receive those proofs the Emperour had given her of his.

Theodosius sigh'd at this discourse of Varanez, and beholding him with a countenance more serene than before, "I should have been much astonish'd, said he, to understand that with a merit like yours and an intention like mine you could not have gain'd the affections of Athenais: but since you have had no design to spend her, I wonder not at all that she hath by her virtue despis'd all other things unworthy of her. For my self, whose eyes this Idea of Grandeur hath not stoppt to an extraordinary merit, like that of Athenais, and who have as much respect'd her virtue as you have disdain'd her birth, I confess, that by a thought much distant from yours, I have judg'd her too worthy to be seated in the Throne of the Cæsars, and that in giving her my heart, I would with too much joy have offered her something of greater value than the Empire had it been at my disposal. You will

“ will not then be so unhappy as I should be in losing a person whom you would not possess, “ but by ways not permitted by her virtue, or rather in leaving to another that which you “ have not judged worthy of you; and if at present you have no design to espouse her, you “ have no reason to dispute it with me, nor to desire that a person destin’d to the Empire, “ should fix her thoughts on an affection of that nature with yours. “ It is true, replied “ Varanez, that hitherto I could not bow my courage to any design to espouse Athenais, but “ your example hath dissipated that reluctance, and as a person who hath merited to be Em“ peress of the Orient, may well merit to be Queen of Persia, I would at present espouse her “ with an excess of joy, would heaven permit it.

At these words, the trouble which was in part removed from the Countenance of Theo- dosius, entirely return’d, who thereupon beholding my Prince with an aspect full of all the appearances of his grief, “ This is a strange effect of my misfortune, said he, that a design “ which all the beauty and all the merit of Athenais could not beget in you whilst I had no “ interest, should be inspired into you to render me miserable, but this consideration shall “ not hinder me from acting with you as the friendship between us and what I owe to the “ King of Persia oblige me. I do not tell you that I yield you absolutely Athenais, though “ I may have less love for her, yet after the word I have given her and in the terms wherein
 “ we are I would not do her that injury; but as I doubt not by the knowledge I have of your “ merit and the discourse you have made me, that her inclinations might have been favoura“ ble, if you had had the intention you at present have, you may hope that by the know“ ledge you may give her of it and by the entire liberty I shall leave you, that she may do “ that for you she is upon the point to do for me. In sum, I will do no violence to her “ inclinations, nor will I make use of the word she hath given me to exact the effect: nor “ will I tell her any thing against you. You shall speak with her alone, and with all the “ liberty you can desire, and if she will chuse rather to be the Spouse of Varanez than Theo- “ dosius, you shall find no obstruction to hinder you from possessing her this way and leading “ her into Persia. Oh my Lord, cried Varanez, this is too much, and when my life should be more strongly fixed to the love of Athenais, I cannot consent to this effect of your goodness. I will suffer my misfortune if I have sufficient courage, and if my courage abandons me, death cannot be wanting, but I will not abuse—’Tis enough, (said Theodosius interrupting him,) and you oppose in vain the resolution I have taken; though the consideration of your repose did not oblige me, I would do it for my own, for I would not espouse Eudoxia if I did believe she had any affection for you; to morrow we will make the proof, and I will give you the opportunity to entertain her, and make with all leisure that proposition, by which you may hope as much change in her intentions as there is at present in yours. Neglect nothing to gain her, in an occasion wherein the excellent composure, and great qualities of your person may cause a happy issue. I will my self open to her the discourse in your presence, and leave you to do the rest, but afterwards if the success is not conformable to your desires, demand no more; and if you cannot oblige Athenais to espouse you, think it not strange that I espouse her, and conjure you not to trouble the repose in which I would willingly establish the whole felicity of my days.

Varanez yet for a long time oppos’d the design of the Emperour, but he opposed in vain, and Theodosius having testified to him an unshaken resolution, he was constrained to submit; protesting that if Fortune were contrary to him, he would die rather than disturb his content by the least thought that might injure him. Afterwards they both retired to their ap-partments at the time when the night began to spread darkness over the Garden, and my Prince spent the same in those agitations of spirit between hope and fear, which scarce permitted him a few minutes of sleep.

The end of the Third Book of the Third Part.

PHARAMOND!

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

But it was not only by the effects of his fear that the spirit of Varanez was tormented, but amongst those pleasures which hope might for some moments make him conceive, he was assaulted by thoughts with which his generosity inspir'd him, and by the opposition it created in him to accept the offers of Theodosius, judging, that if Fortune should be so favourable as to make him be preferred, he ought not to make use of that advantage, against the repose of a Prince who had acted with so generous a goodnets. and expos'd himself to so cruel a hazard to testify to him his friendship. Shall I be so ignoble, said he, to abuse ingratelously a goodness without example? or shall I suffer a man of the degree of Theodosius, to establish my repose at the expence of his own, and render himself miserable to make me happy? cannot I judge of the estate of his soul by that of my own, and imagine how cruel the loss of Athenais would be to him, (in a time wherein he might without any obstruction possess her) from the grief I have to lose her, without having ever had any hope to enjoy her? Ah Varanez, consent not to a weakness that will dishonour thy whole life, but make use of thy courage to eschew a disgrace thou preparest for thy self, and which possibly, added he with a sigh, thou preparest in vain.

This last thought afflicted him no less than the first, but from the first proceeding to the latter with great facility, "Who hath assured thee, said he, or who can make thee hope that Athenais will prefer thee before Theodosius? thee, who hast so unworthily despis'd her, thee on whom she no more thinks, before him who hath so honourably and so generously treated her, and before him to whom she is already engag'd? Is it by a vain confidence thou hast in some advantages thy person may have over that of Theodosius, in somewhat of a more martial Air, or in some honour thou hast acquir'd by thy Arms? Ah thou abusest thy self Varanez, Theodosius is no less amiable for his beauty and for his virtue, and for the sweetness of his manners, of his disposition and many other qualities, no less deserving love than thou mayst be, for a courage possibly greater than his, or some reputation of valour.

He stopp'd a long time at these thoughts, and out of this double consideration of the shame would accrue to him, and the incertainty of his success, he endeavour'd what possible in him lay to vanquish himself, and gain so much power over his passion as to reject the offers of Theodosius. But soon after, the violence of his love stronger than all his resolutions, made them vanish, and flattering him against what he might fear of the choice of Athenais, by a thousand advantages it represented to him in his person above that of Theodosius, and stopping his eyes against the shame he had conceiv'd and foreseen in that design of rendring himself happy, by representing unto him that Theodosius was without doubt less amorous than he, since he durst expose himself to the hazard of a certain happiness, and that he did but a thing very ordinary, and to which all Princes were oblig'd, in leaving Athenais to the freedom of her choice. This thought did indeed rather make him resolve, than any other, imagining that he might with honour dispute a benefit not absolutely yielded to him, but which he was permitted only to dispute, whilst the other forsook not his advantages.

He would however expect the effect of the resolutions and intentions of the Emperour, without testifying to him any eager desire to urge them; but he attended not long, for immediately after Dinner the Emperour sent to entreat him to descend into the same Garden, where he had the day before entertain'd him. Varanez went without delay, but with whatever whatever resolution he was fortified, he could not see the Emperour without confusion, and having saluted him, lifting up one hand before his face, as if he had endeavoured to cover his blushes, My Lord, said he, I commit a weakness which renders me possibly unworthy of the degree I hold among men, or of the glory I have purchased; but besides that you have forced me to it, by the obedience I owe you, you owe possibly a pardon to a passion too violent to leave me in a liberty to do what I ought: And moreover my Lord, there is so little appearance that Varanez should be preferred before Theodosius, that you hazard but very little in the favour you do me. I would willingly do more, replied the Emperour, but Honour and Justice permit me less than love, and as I would not in my own favour force the inclinations of Athenais, I believe you would not desire I should force them in yours, or promise to make you spouse her if it be not her intention.

Varanez was about to reply, when they saw Pulcheria and Athenais appear from towards the apartment of Pulcheria, whom the Emperour had intreated to come and bring Athenais with her; at the sight of Athenais, and at the remembrance of what passed, both the Emperour and Prince equally changed colour, and they were, I believe, both the one and the other, surpris'd with a heart beating, which denoted the agitation of their Spirits. The Emperour however appeared the most confident, and advancing towards Eudoxia, some paces before my Prince, who followed him not but with infinite marks of confusion, he accosted them, and saluted them with a countenance so sad, that both the one and the other felt no small disquiet; and a little after addressing himself to the charming Eudoxia; "Madam, said he, As great fortunes are difficultly established without some obstruction, it was necessary that mine should find one sufficiently considerable to counterballance its greatness; and I confess, that I have not bought it dear enough, to merit it. Yesterday I believed my self alone in the fairest hopes in the world, to day I have a companion, for the Prince Varanez, as well as my self, pretends to the glory to possess you. We come, both the one and the other, to decide our fortune, and I leave the Prince with you, to explain to you his intentions better than he hath for the present explained them; I will tell you nothing in his favour, nor to his disadvantage, but of two men which adore you, you have the free liberty of giving pre-eminence; but as I have reserved to my self the profit of your choice, if it be for my advantage, so if it be to that of Varanez, you may render him happy without the least murmur of Theodosius."

The Emperour concluding these words, presented his hand to Pulcheria to walk with her on the other side, when Eudoxia notwithstanding her natural reservedness, appeared more hardy than ordinary at this time, stopping him by the Arm, and beholding him with eyes whose excessive languour did seem to dart an extraordinary splendour; "Is it Varanez, my Lord, said she, who pretends I ought to be his? Or is it the Emperour would give me to Varanez?" "I tell you not that, replied the Emperour, Nor yet (added he, speaking a little lower) that if I lose you, I can suffer this misfortune without dying, but only that you are free, and Mistress of your will, in the Dominions, and in the house of Theodosius; and that with an entire authority you may choose a Spouse either in the person of Varanez or Theodosius." "It is enough, my Lord, (said she, with more serenity than had appeared some moments before in her eyes) and I ask pardon of your Majesty, if I have required this explication in a business so important. And at these words, seeing that he passed into another Alley with Pulcheria, and that the Princes made a sign to her to stay with Varanez, she receiv'd the hand which he presented to her, to assist her in her walk in the Alley were they were at present.

They made some paces, both the one and the other, testifying some confusion, though there appeared less in the countenance of Athenais than that of Varanez; but in the end the Prince stopping, and lifting up his eyes on those of Athenais; "And well Madam, said he, You see in the end him whom you have fled with so much cruelty, and I should speak it with an extasie of joy, that I see you again, if this sight were not much more cruel to me than your most doleful absence; for it had been much more sweet to me not to have seen you. than to see you in the Palace of Theodosius, and upon the point to espouse him. Yes Madam, you are within few days to become Empress of the Orient, and Heaven gives that to your merit which with too much reason it ought to do. Your beauty could expect no less, but the love I bear you is not worthy of so ill fortune; nor ought I to be led hither, by my pitiless destiny, to assist at the triumph, and be miserably bound to the Triumpher's Chariot. You see however, that it is my duty, and that which is most cruel, is, that you behold me without pity, and without the least mark of any remembrance of that love which merited possibly some part in your memory. I “ find however in the Soul of my Rival that compassion which I find not in yours, and “ that Rival whose felicity I come to trouble and disturb with difficulty accepts his hap“ piness, since he hath come to understand it due to my love, and not to his; and that it is “ not just that he should triumph over my life and fortune, without having bought with “ one sigh that felicity he would deprive me of. Will you be less just than he, Divine A- “ thenais? Or will you oppose what Heaven seems to have inspir’d him with in my favour?

"find

 “ You do see me, I will not say more enamoured than at Athens, but more enamoured than “ Theodosius, or all other men in the world can be, and yet as unfortunate as enamoured, “ if you regard not the estate of my condition with pity, and if you surrender not your self “ to deprive others of what they would unjustly deprive me of.

Varanez spoke in this manner, with a passion which permitted him not the liberty to explain himself, but with confusion and disorder; and the fair Athenais having peaceably hearkned to him, answering him with a behaviour full of modesty and sweetness; “ My “ Lord, said she, I would answer to the complaint you make if I could apprehend it,
 “ but since I know nothing of it, you will do me a kindness if you will better explain
 “ your self. “ I confess, replied my Prince, that my love hath created sufficient disorder “ in my thoughts to leave me in an estate unable to express my self in acceptable terms, but “ I have no need to do it with you, who see so well into my heart as to know its most “ secret thoughts. “ I will not give my self this vain trouble, replied Athenais, I have “ been already too much deceiv’d to have longer this opinion; but in the end my Lord, “ what is it you complain of? Is it of me? Is it of your self? Is it of Theodosius? Or is it
 “ of Fortune? “ I complain, replied my Prince, both of you, of my self, of Theodosius, “ and of Fortune; but for Fortune, she is insensible and deaf to our complaints; for Theo- “ dosius, he does part of what he can do to satisfy me, for my self, I am so sufficiently “ miserable, that my own reproaches are not necessary to add to my misery, and therefore “ Madam there rests only you of whom I ought to complain, either with some reason, or “ with some hope; it is by you only that I lose all things, if I am so unfortunate as to “ lose them, and you have understood to day, that it is only in your will to render me “ happy or miserable. “ How my Lord, (replied the fair Endoxia) when I should “ be so happy to espouse the Emperour, will it be of me that you will have reason to com“ plain? Or can you accuse me for giving him that you have never demanded, nor so “ much as once desired? “ I confess, said the Prince, that in the beginning of my love
 “ I have not possibly done all that I ought, nor is it strange to see that love in its first birth “ should not arrive at all that Grandeur which time and a greater knowledge might give it;
 “ but Athenais, I have at present attained that perfection, and since with what I ought to “ have to merit entirely your affections, I have likewise some things which by your con“ fession have not displeas’d you, why may it not be permitted me to hope, that what “ might one have rendred me happy may not now prove unprofitable? “ I confess to you “ my Lord, said Athenais, that during the honour you did me at Athens, I observ’d no“ thing in your person which was not great and worthy of esteem, and which did not “ merit all other fortune than what you can hope in the affection of Athenais. I will “ likewise say, and endeavour to speak it without shame or confusion, that those great “ qualitics had wrought a greater effect on my heart than I ought to have desired, and “ that you knew the truth when you knew that I was not insensible of your affection:
 “ But my Lord, if I was so presumptuous as to raise mine to you, you repress’d my bold“ ness by the care you took to humble me, and to represent to me my meanness, and you “ taught me so much repentance, that it was only that, and the fear I had to esteem you
 “ more than I ought, which drove me from my Country, and made me sollicite my Father “ to depart, that I might no more appear before a person that had so well corrected me.
 “ You see how Fortune hath since dispos’d of me, and possibly you begin to believe, that “ those Predictions of Leontin, which you once with reason derided, by reason of those “ faults they made us commit, were not without some foundation; of what then do you “ accuse me? What injury have I done you? What desire you of me? Or for what reason “ come you to trouble the fortune of a person in whom you have no interest? “ Have I
 “ no interest? (cryed my Prince) Alas I have all the interest, for without giving me “ my death, you cannot give your self to Theodosius; you may say possibly that I had no in“ terest in your marriage so long as I had no design to espouse you; but at present, that I de“ clare it to you, and that with the person of Varanez, which you confess not to have been “ indifferent to you, I offer you a Crown, which possibly in the estate wherein the affairs “ of the Empire are at present, is of no less value than that of Theodosius: It is for you Athe- “ nais to recall into your heart that good opinion you have formerly had for me, to receive

“all the reparation which an humbled and repenting Prince can offer you, and to testify that you have sufficient generosity to accept, in the estate wherein you are, that which in another fortune you would not have refused. “No my Lord, said Athenais, I had not refused it, since I knew no reason which might hinder me from receiving a Crown from a Prince great and worthy of esteem like you. But my Lord, added she sighing, it is not seriously you make these offers, you would not abase your Grandeur to the Daughter of Leontin. “Ah Madam, replied Varanez, insult not over one so miserable, nor make me blush for my fault, since you see me touched with a true repentance. “How my Lord, added Athenais, can you forget that long descent of great Kings from whom you are descended, to ally your self to a miserable Philosopher? “I would do something much more difficult, said my Prince, to make you forget a fault, the remembrance of which you too cruelly preserve; and I find you at present as much above me, both by reason of your merit, and my own love, as I did formerly believe the Philosopher Leontin to be beneath the Prince of Persia. This change would be very strange, (replied the charming Eudoxia) *but it is to the honour I receive from the Emperour, rather than any other cause, that I owe this obligation, it hath possibly taken from my condition a part of that meanness you looked on with so much disdain, and you have possibly believed that a Prince of Persia might without dishonouring himself cast his eyes upon a person destined to the Emperour of the Orient. But my Lord, I am too just to abuse you by this unjust effect of your passion, a fortune which I have never merited, ought not to make me forget my Meanness, and your Dignity; if the Emperour hath committed a fault in raising me to a degree of which I am too unworthy, he will suffer the trouble by the knowledge he will have of it; and as he respects less Dignity than Virtue, if he can in me find any Virtue, he will make it supply the default of Dignity; but for you my Lord, in whom all things are great and exalted, it is not just that you should commit the same fault; and to deliver my self from the reproach might be made, should I contribute to it, I protest to you, that the Daughter of Leontin shall never be seated in the Throne of Cyrus.*

Ab! Throne of Cyrus! (cried my Prince, transported with grief) mightest thou have been overturn'd as thou wert in the times of Darius, so that I had not remembered my self of thee in a time wherein I ought to have laid all things at the feet of my divine Athenais. But Madam, (added he, beholding her with a languishing aspect) is it possible, that having a Soul great and fair as you have, you cannot forget a feeble effect of the presumption of a young man who neither knew you nor himself, and much less knew the love he had for you? I had done without doubt at Athens what I do at Constantinople, had I for some days longer seen you; nor was it probably in the first days of his love, the design of Theodosius to espouse you: pardon me then if it be possible a fault which I do repair as much as I can, and if this reparation suffices not to appease your resentment, receive my life and my blood, which I will spill at your feet to satisfy you. Such a satisfaction, replied Athenais, is not at all necessary to repair an injury which I would willingly forget; the Religion I have embraced obligeth us to pardon much more cruel ones; but when I have lost the remembrance of it, as I do lose it for ever, what advantage will you draw, or what can you hope or desire of me? I desire, replied Varanez, all that that love I have for you, all that the favourable thoughts you formerly had for me, and all the consent of Theodosius will permit me to desire; and I desire (to explain my self more clearly) that you would receive the Faith, the Crown, and the Life of Varanez, which I offer you. I should accept what you offer me with infinite respect, replied Eudoxia, if I had the liberty to do it; but you know well that I cannot accept it. Ab for that liberty, replied my Prince, you know that you have it entirely; and you have understood it from the very mouth of Theodosius. I have well understood from the Emperour, replied Eudoxia, that he will not force my inclinations, which though he had not told me, I could have hoped from his justice, and from his goodness; but this power, which he leaves me over my will, doth not disengage me from an obligation, of which the gift of a thousand lives cannot acquit me, and which permits me not to prefer him who hath despised me, before him who from the stirrup hath lifted me to the Imperial Dignity. Ab cruel Athenais, replied Varanez, and have you so soon forgot the promise you made me not to remember my fault? I will not remember it, said Eudoxia, to keep any resentment against you; but you shall permit me to remember it to compare your proceedings with those of Theodosius; and to hinder me from acting an impiety, and horrible injustice, in preferring him to whom I owe nothing before him to whom I owe all things. Do you believe then to owe nothing, replied my Prince, to a man who hath devoted himself wholly to you from the first moment he saw you, and who at present offers you all that Heaven hath put in his dispose? Hath Theodosius done more, or hath he not done less than I? Since in the estate wherein he is, he may dispose of his Person, Person, and of his Empire, whilst I expose my self to the anger of a Father sufficiently formidable, if my love did not stop my eyes to that, and all other considerations: nor is he himself resolv'd on what he hath to do for you without the advice of Pulcheria, who hath an absolute power over his will; nor you possibly anything more indebted to his love, than to the ambition of his Sister. To whatsoever I may owe it, replied Athenais, I have all due apprehension thereof fixed in the middle of my heart, and the proceeding of Theodosius is so fair, so noble, and so obliging towards me, that my most sensible grief is, that I cannot express my acknowledgmen of it but by the sole gift of Athenais. I have likewise this misfortune, that it maybe believed the Imperial Dignity hath at least as many charms to incite me, as the person that gives it, and that endeavour which I shall use to insure the contrary, will scarce gain any ascendent over this opinion; but I will not refrain from telling you, whatsoever judgment you may make, that though the Emperour Theodosius, by a prodigious change of his fortune, should to morrow see himself reduc'd to the meanest condition of the most unfortunate person of his Empire, I would not only prefer him before you with the Crown of Persia, and before all men of the world, but I would give my self to him in that condition, though impossible to find any change, and in possessing only his person, I should not appear less satisfied, than in possessing with him the Empire of Constantine. I will add to this my Lord, that I had done the same for you, if I had been bound to you for an entertainment equal to that which I have receiv'd from him, and that in whatever estate fortune could have cast you, I had not only refus'd Theodosius for Spouse, but prefer'd your person before the possession of the world. "But if it be true, said Varanez, that you have had some consideration for my person, do you not find that it is a little different from that of Theodosius? and with a dignity not at all inferiour to his, the glory of some very noble and gallant actions, ought to have touch'd a soul like yours with some favourable thoughts. "I confess, replied Athenais, that there are few great qualities which you possess not, and that the glory of your actions is spread through the world; but as Theodosius speaks not of your person but with esteem, you ought possibly use him with the same generosity, and if you oblige me to judge, the difference I should place (according to my inclinations) would not be for your advantage. "But in fine, (replied the Prince of Persia) though all the merit and all the advantages were on the part of Theodosius, would you devote nothing to pity; nor suffer your self to be touch'd by the deplorable fortune of a man that dyes for you? it is no longer by reason that I will struggle with your inclinations, for all reason vanishes before your authority. I am without merit, I am guilty, I am unworthy of all things; but Athenais, once more I dye for you, and it is certain that the first moment of the felicity of Theodosius, will be the last of my life. Will the safety of an unfortunate Prince, whom you reduce to this deplorable estate, gain no consideration with you? or can you see him yield up his soul at you feet, without being sensible of compassion?

At these words, without considering that he might be seen, he cast himself at her knees, and embraced them with a behaviour so passionate, that Athenais had never been so troubled in her life. She released her self in the end from his arms, and having made him rise up, with a countenance which testified to him the little content she receiv'd in that action, "I know yet less my Lord, said she, what it is you can desire of my pity, than I can judge you desire of my affection: for since all the pity with which you would inspire me, cannot make me fail of my Duty to the Emperour, I know not to what intent you would employ it. I believe likewise, that it is not at all necessary for you, but that you have sufficient courage to receive, like a great man, all that grief which a loss like that of Athenais can beget in you. Summon it up at this time my Lord, if it be true that you have need of it, and do nothing which may be unworthy of your Birth or fair Reputation; with its assistance, and that of your virtue, a months absence, or the view of some person more worthy of you than the Daughter of Leontin; you will drive her from your heart; and since you ought never to see her again, there is some appearance that time will banish her in such sort from your memory, that there will not remain the least trace. How Madam, said Varanez, shall I never in my life, see you more? No my Lord, (replied she very readily) and if you will believe my counsel, this should be the last discourse we should have together. You are at present too much suspected by me, replied Varanez, to take your counsel, for I cannot only in this manner not abandon you, but I shall with difficulty do it all my life. "I know not what are your intentions, (added Eudoxia very coldly) but as mine shall always be, never to do any thing against my Duty, I know well that when I shall be the Emperour's, I shall not suffer the sight of any man who, may give him suspicion; and if I have not the power to make you depart from Constantinople, I shall confine my self in those places where you shall difficultly see me. Ah cruel person, (said the Prince, beholding her with an eye full of resentment, stay at least till you are Empress, before you drive me from Constantinople, how know you whether this condition be too well assur'd, or who can answer to a Rival too happy, for the wisdom of a man whom his felicity makes despair? "I will answer for him my self, replied Eudoxia, out of the knowledge I have of your virtue, and against such crimes and treacheries I will with you seek no precautions. "I shall not be capable to act them, replied Varanez, whilst I shall have any remnant of Reason in my soul, but when that shall have absolutely abandon'd me, I know not to what I may abandon my self. Since there is nothing capable to drive it thence, replied the fair Eudoxia, I believe that it will still remain Mistress, and the belief I have hinders me from what I would do were I less assur'd.

Concluding these words, she found her self at the end of the Alley, from whence she saw in another that crossed it the Emperour and Pulcheria, who walking and judging that she had long enough entertain'd the Prince, "I believe my Lord, said she, that it is time to seek the Emperour and the Princess, who expect us, and we have possibly by so long a discourse pass'd the rules of civility." You may see it not seasonable for me, said the Prince, that in the condition wherein I am, I should present my self before them: I cannot do it at present without testifying some weakness or disturbance which will displease you, and you may pronounce victory to my Rival, without letting me so soon behold the face of my Conquerour. Concluding these words he made her a profound obeysance, and retired on another side, so lost and transported, that he had scarce any knowledge of what he did.

Two Ladies who had followed Eudoxia at a distance, approach'd her when they saw her alone, and a little after the Emperour and the Princess his Sister, seeing her advance towards the place where they were, mov'd towards her to receive her. The Emperour by what we knew afterwards accus'd her not, but with a great heart-beating, and beholding her with a countenance that betrayed his want of confidence, And well Madam, said he, is it life or death that you pronounce, and the Prince of Persia doth he absent himself from us, out of grief or modesty? As this adventure, replied Eudoxia, cannot be the cause of any great grief in him, nor put his modesty to any proof, I believe that it is neither for the one nor the other that he is retired, but rather out of a confusion to have accepted the offer that you made him. But in fine Madam, replied Theodosius, if I may demand it of you without trembling, in favour of which of us have you given sentence, and the choice which you have made is it to my advantage or to that of Varanez? It is without doubt to that of Varanez, (replied Eudoxia) for since he that loses Athenais gains much more than the other, I believe my Lord that his condition is better than yours. Oh if it be so, (cried the Emperour with a countenance full of all the marks of joy) if it be so that Varanez hath gain'd the advantage, I wish that he may enjoy it eternally, and I would my self preserve it to him at the price of my own life. In truth Madam, said the Princess to Athenais, I never doubted but you would act in this manner, and I have continually assur'd the Emperour against the fear which the uncertainty of your choice might raise. It was not so light, replied Theodosius, but it hath made me suffer in one hour, more than I have suffer'd in all my life: and I confess that the great and fair qualities of the Prince of Persia have begot in me a fear upon this subject from which I have had difficulty to recover my self. Oh my Lord, (said Eudoxia with a behaviour full of sweetness) by what action can I have merited that your Majesty should make so cruel a judgment of me? or how can you believe me guilty of so much deceit and ingratitude? Would to God I could make to this affection with which you honour me, a greater sacrifice than that which I have to day done of the Prince of Persia: and I must let you know my Lord, that if the effects of my gratitude cannot reach so high as I could wish, they are at least in such manner fix'd in my heart, that I shall preserve them unto death. I am not at all displeas'd, added the Emperour, that you have for to be Empress of the Orient, refused the Crown of Persia: Nor could the knowledge I have of your merit, be better authoris'd, than by the love and design of a Prince such as Varanez, who in dignity and merit hath possibly few peers in the world. But I confess, that his misfortune creates in me a pity, and that I would at the price of part of my blood, that he had not pass'd through Athens, or that he had not come to Constantinople. I cannot however yield to him Eudoxia, for besides that no reason obliges me to it, I would renounce much sooner my Empire and my Life, than my Divine Athenais. Wholly absolute as you are my Lord, replied Eudoxia, you shall permit me to tell you, that you cannot give me to the Prince of Persia: and though I confess that if he had offer'd me at Athens what he offers me at Constantinople, I had not refus'd it. Yet if you judge me unworthy of the honour you have offer'd me, it shall not be with Varanez that I will seek my recompense, but I will find a retreat more agreeable at the feet of Altars, with the Princess Flavilla and the Princess Marina.

You repay with too much generosity, replied the Emperor, a benefit I have not done, but to my self: but since I have no small impatience to possess it, think it fit that I hairen the time, and that I pass over many particulars and vain formalities oftentimes practis'd by persons of our degree, to espouse you in eight days. My Lord, said Eudoxia, you are my Emperour and I ought to obey you.

Whilst these happy persons took a resolution so cruel to the repose of my Master, that poor Prince had sought out the most silent and retired place of the Garden, where he abandon'd himself to all the assaults of a most terrible grief. He walked at a great pace, his arms crossed on his stomach, his eyes swoln with those tears he could not retain, and his sight wholly troubled and affrighted, which sometimes he let fall to earth, and sometimes gently lifted up to Heaven, whither he sent up sighs accompanied from time to time with words of complaint, which his sobs at every moment interrupted. All his gestures, and all that appear'd in his person was so worthy of pity, that the most cruel souls could difficultly have defended themselves from it: and possibly Theodosius himself, had he seen him in this estate, could not have kept all his resolution. Ab unfortunate Prince, cried he sometimes, to what remediless torments dost thou see thy self miserably expos'd? and what assistance canst thou draw from thy courage, against thy terrible misfortunes? wilt thou patiently see Athenais in the arms of a happy Rival? or wilt thou suffer to break forth on this too happy Rival some effects of thy despair? canst thou suffer that he should enjoy peaceably before thy eyes, that only good can make thee love thy life? or by an effect of that fury, into which thy ill fortune hath precipitated thee, wilt thou make him find his Funerals in those cruel Esponsals which send thee to thy Tomb? Ab Varanez, added he, I feel that thou canst do neither; the first is no less impossible to thy love, than the last is forbidden by thy virtue: Miserable that thou art, what wilt thou then do? and to what dost thou resolve thyself after the loss of Athenais? thou wilt lose her for ever, and thou knowest that her loss is for thee a misfortune without remedy, without consolation. Alas! said he a little after, what resolution can I take but a resolution to dye? this seems to me so easie that it is that alone at which I must stop, for in the estate in which I find my self, nothing can be so sweet to me, nothing so agreeable as death.

He torment'd himself in this manner, and his heart was miserably afflicted with those cruel thoughts that opprest it, when from another part of the Garden, where I had walked since he had entred with the persons that had attended him, I went to him, knowing well that my presence would be less troublesome than that of any other. I found him in the condition I have told you, and yet more disconsolate than I can represent to you: and he saw me no sooner near him but casting himself upon a seat of stone which was behind him, and beholding me with eyes which made me conceive a part of what he had to say, It is to day Mitranes, said he, it is to day that I lose Athenais for ever. And well my Lord, said I, though this misfortune should happen, (for to be complacent to your passion I will believe it a misfortune to you) have not you courage enough to support it? No Mitranes, cried he, I have no courage against the proof of so terrible a misfortune. It seems to me however my Lord, replied I, that you ought to have been sufficiently prepar'd before you came to the proof you have made, for after the different usage which Athenais hath receiv'd from you and Theodosius, there was little appearance that she would quit Theodosius. "Ah vain pride, cried the Prince, which all men "have blamed in me with too much reason, wherefore hearken'd I to thee at that time? "and why consider'd I not that it was only against enemies, and not against those whom I adored, that thou wert pardonable. But, added he a little after, vain reflections, unprofitable repentance, wherefore come you to torment me? and wherefore joyn you your forces to that of a grief, sufficiently powerful to give me a death without your assistance.

He made many other discourses, little different from these, and by which he made me know that he was in an extremity of grief, little distant from despair. I was little capable to comfort him, (though beholding his misery without passion, I found it not so great as he fancied it,) I however did all that was possible for me to restore his mind into a more settled condition, and I represented to him all that reason and the affection I had for his repose, could inspire me with, to appease a part of his grief, but I labour'd in vain: and having hearken'd peaceably to me; Ab Mitranes, cried he all on a sudden, I shall never more see Athenais. "That may happen my Lord, said I, but it may in all likelihood fall out as well, "that in little time her sight will be no longer necessary for your repose, and that when you "have let Reason re-possess her entire Empire over your mind, you will not only comfort "your self for the absence of Athenais, but will be better content that the Daughter of Leontin should reign in the Orient than in Persia. "Ah Mitranes, (said he looking upon me with an incens'd eye) let us behold Athenais no longer as the Daughter of Leontin, nor flatter

“more a pride which you ought to have condemn’d at a time that it produced an effect so “fatal to my repose. Since Athenais reigned in my heart, I ought to have made her reign “through all the earth; and since she had submitted my self to her, I ought not to have “doubted the submission of my people. Would to God it were permitted me to advance
 “her as much above me, as I am above the meanest of the Persians: or that beholding her
 “as my Sovereign, I might pass my life in her service like a vile slave, rather than see her “Spouse to Theodosius. “But my Lord, said I, since you love her truly, and it is ordain’d
 “by Heaven, that she shall not be yours, had you not rather that she should live advanc’d
 “in dignity, and be happy with Theodosius, than pass her life in a miserable condition?
Mitranes, said my Prince, seek not for Reason in me, I know neither what I would have nor what I think: but I know only that the death of Varanez or the death of Theodosius, are the two only things of which I can at present think. “Ah my Lord, said I, think rather of any other thing, and both in the one and the other, hearken to your Courage and to your Virtues; for the life of Varanez precious to so many persons, and precious to the whole world, ’tis not in such a humour as this it ought to be abandon’d: and for that of Theodosius I am as-sur’d that if any one should make you the proposition you would hearken to it with horror.
 “It is a Prince who hath treated you in all things like his brother, and who in that very “thing which renders him odious to you hath done that for you you would not have done “for him. When he laid the design to espouse Athenais, he was ignorant of the interest
 “you had in her; and when he knew it, he hindred not but Athenais might have been yours, “though he had all sorts of ways and all sorts of reasons to preserve her. You have seen “that his proceeding hath been the sweetest the most generous and most obliging in the “world: And for this reason my Lord, you not only ought not to conceive any ill will a“gainst him; but by an endeavour worthy of your courage, you ought willingly and cheer“fully to yield him that you cannot dispute with him. Let the whole world see that it is “no less ealie for you to overcome by Generosity than by Arms: and remember in the end,
 “the word you have solemnly given, not to bring any trouble to his love and to his repose,
 “if the choice of Athenais were not favourable to you. It is true, said Varanez sighing, that I have given this word, and I will keep it if it be possible, (said he, lifting himself from the place where he was seated,) but let us go seek repose if it be permitted us in a place more gloomy and retired than this, and do you Mitranes manage things so, that I be not this day seen by any person.

Speaking these words he went towards his Apartment at a great rate, and having shut himself alone into his Closet, he passed the rest of that day and the whole night without suffering himself to be seen, and without receiving any nourishment. We had some difficulty to make him take any on the morrow, nor had we brought it to pass, if we had not represented to him, that by that proceeding he would make himself be accus’d of feebleness by those persons to whom his great courage was not so well known, and that it would be of ill consequence to expose himself to their disdain, in a place where he ought so carefully to preserve his reputation. Being always sensible of glory more than all other things, he had some respect to what regarded it, and acted a violence on himself which he had not been capable of for any other consideration. But when he understood that the day of the Emperours marriage was agreed on, and that there were but four or five to come, before that which ought to give to the Emperour the possession of Athenais, he relaps’d into his first transportments, and wanted but a little to enter into a fury ready to stop his eyes to all things. In fine, he moderated himself by the wise counsels of Megabises, for whom he had an infinite respect, and if we could not give him any comfort, yet at least we manag’d so well his discontent by the assistance of his virtue, of which we made great advantage in this necessity, and which with success we plac’d before his eyes, that in the end we made him resolve to support his misfortune like a Heroe, to keep his word which he had given to the Emperour, and seek his recovery in the absence of Athenais.

He had not seen her since she had declar’d her self in favour of Theodosius, and he had so well thunn’d the sight of Theodosius, who, knowing the condition wherein he was, would not aggravate his grief by his presence, so that they had not seen each other since that day. But when he had took his resolution, and was determin’d rather to dye than do any thing unworthy of his courage, he refus’d no longer to see the Emperour. Theodosius visited him in his Chamber, where he receiv’d him not with a sprightly Countenance but with an aspect which denoted a part of his resolution: and the Emperour willing to excuse himself of the grief he had caused in him, and comfort him with words full of sweetness, and the most obliging in the world, Cease my Lord, said he, to comfort one so miserable, who is not worth the care you take of him; and since the good fortune of Athenais wills her to you and not to me, rejoice both both the one and the other in those pleasures which are destined to you, without receiving any trouble from the remembrance of my misfortunes. Time or Reason will possibly afford some comfort to my evil; but because I have understood that it is within three days that you are to espouse Athenais, think it not inconvenient that I do not appear to grace a solemnity which will put my constancy to too cruel a proof, and permit me to retire before this great day arrive.

“It will not be without great sorrow, replied the Emperour, that I shall see you depart from us; but since I dare not intreat you to be present where you will receive so much grief, I am constrained to consent to your departure with infinite regret, that a Journey by which you have so deeply obliged us, hath not been more happy to you.

They had little discourse that day, my Master not being so well able to dissemble his grief, as to continue with the Emperour in any long converse; and the Emperour was unwilling to constrain him longer to see the face of a man who was to render him miserable. But from that moment we prepared all things for our departure, and we laboured with so much diligence, that two days after, and precisely that which was to precede the Marriage of the Emperour, all our Equipage was ready in the great Court of the Palace, and my Prince went to take his last leave of the Emperour. He knew not whether he ought to bid adieu to Athenais, and if on the one side his love importun'd him once more to see her, the fear he had to renew his grief by that sight, and to procure some obstruction to the cure he sought, made him fly what he desired, or at least hindred him from demanding it. I know not what he had in the end resolv'd, but as he was upon the point to depart the chamber of the Emperour, having received all his civilities, and told him all that his grief would permit him to say, How, (said Theodosius to him, embracing him) will you depart without bidding adieu to Athenais? and will you quit her like an enemy, having so much loved her? I will do what you please, (replied my Prince, with a sigh which he could not withhold) but believing the sight of me might be troublesome to her, I durst not demand a permission to see her. And at these words, without speaking farther, he followed the Emperour to Eudoxia's Apartment, but with so much disorder and trouble in his spirit, that he had scarce knowledge how to demean himself.

The Emperour was advanced some paces before him, to prepare Eudoxia for his visit; and when my Prince entred into her Chamber, she received him with the best grace in the world, and with a Majesty absolutely conformable to the degree to which she was called. For Varangis, he had scarce the power to behold her, and in all his countenance he appeared so distracted, that if Athenais, to whom the cause of this trouble was too well known, had not assisted him, he had difficultly entred into any discourse with her. The Emperour to give him more liberty, was entred into an adjacent chamber, with those Ladies which he had found in that of Athenais, and now rendred this vain and unprofitable office to a man who could take no advantage from it. You leave us my Lord, said Athenais, and you leave us, as I understand, without bidding me adieu. I ought this respect, replied the Prince, to the counsel you gave me some days past; and I depart from Constantinople before you are Sovereign, not to give you the trouble to drive me thence. Ad my Lord, replied Eudoxia, I should not have driven you hence; and it was for your repose as well as my own, that I counsel'd you to depart from us. I am too much obliged to you, (replied the Prince very sadly) for the care you take of my repose; but as all hopes ever to find it are banished from my Soul, it is not by that counsel you can procure it me. I desire with all my heart, replied Eudoxia, that you may entirely meet it, and I would gladly contribute all those things which my duty will permit me; but as I believe it is rather in your self that you ought to find it, than in any remedies I can bring, I hope that you will soon possess it as entire as I can wish it. In revenge of your good wishes, said the Prince, I beg of the Gods that you may be as happy as you have rendred me miserable, and that that felicity for which you forsook me, may never be troubled by any remembrance, or any change may give you cause to repent it. I hope my Lord, replied Athenais, that the effect of your prayers will come to pass, and as I have no intention that is not innocent, and that it is Heaven and not my own design hath wrought for me, I believe not at all, that any change of my fortune may make me fear to repent it. For you my Lord, I should be very sorry you should have any thing wherewith to reproach me, but without bringing things past to your memory, I am assured that the reflection your self may make, will justify me sufficiently in your thoughts. I know well, replied my Prince, that you have done me no injustice, and though you had, the cause that obliged you to it might well have excused it. I come not therefore hither to complain, I ought now to carry my grief, and lead it with me to all places whither my love shall conducl me, and where the remembrance of you will wage war with me to my grave. I will do it cruel Athenais, since my ill fortune will have it so, as well as you, and after having made you this last protestation, you shall suffer me to give you the last adieu.

Concluding

Concluding these words he saluted her, and took leave of her, by a force so contrary to his will, that all his constancy was scarce able to withstand it. The Emperour followed him, hearing him depart the chamber, and whatever endeavours he used to hinder it, he accompanied him forth of the Gates of Constantinople, and would have gone farther would he have permitted him; but Varanez not suffering him, and the Emperour knowing well that his company was not acceptable, they parted, and at their parting, the Emperour embracing him with a tenderness which he expressed with tears, Adieu my Brother, said he, preserve for me the amity of the King my Father and yours if it be possible; and believe that I would with all my soul give a part of my Empire, and a part of my blood for your satisfaction. Varanez had not the power to answer to these words, or at least he answered to them with a disorder that would not permit him to explain himself.

He would not embarque to pass the Streight no more than he had done in coming, though it was his much nearer way to repass into Asia, but that was not his intention, and saying that he would yet visit some Cities of Europe, before he put himself to Sea, he went to lodge at his departure from Constantinople, at the same place where he had lodged at his arrival. He remain'd there all the morrow, to understand news of the marriage of Athenais, imagining that Heaven might yet by some miracle interrupt it, and out of a weakness common to all Lovers, conserving to the extremity a hope without foundation; and for this reason he had left one of our men at Constantinople, but he came about the Evening of the second day, and he understood but too certainly that Athenais was espoused, and was already Empress of the Orient. Though he was sufficiently prepared for this news, he could not understand it without relapsing into a grief which had near-hand deprived him of his life, and that night which he fancied with so much reason so sweet to Theodosius, was the most cruel to him that can be imagined. He passed it wholly in complaints, sighs and sobs, but on the morrow, before he rose, or had given orders for his departure, a man presented himself to him, who brought him a Letter from the Philosopher Leontin. He receiv'd it with infinite trouble, not being able to imagine what might be the subject of it, and so much the rather, because he had not seen Leontin during all the stay he had made at Constantinople, where he had understood, that instead of taking part in the greatness of his Daughter, he was absolutely retired from the world, and had with Atticus fix'd himself to the Service of Heaven; however he with no small impatience open'd the Paper and found these words.

Leontin to the Prince of Persia.

Since you know my Lord, that by reason of the honour I have had to be nigh you, I am not ignorant of any particulars of your Birth, and since by the success of those predictions I have made of the Fortune of Athenais, you may judge that I have some knowledge of the Stars; I will assure you out of the interest I take all my life in your repose, that you shall in a short time recover of the misfortune you at present suffer under. But it is upon the Banks of the Rhine that you must find the remedy, and it is there only that you will lose the love and the remembrance of Athenais. This is an assurance given you by

—LEONTIN.

If my Prince had not had too fresh in his memory the remembrance of the cruel effects of those predictions Leontin had made of the greatness of his Daughter, and which he had before derided, he had not laid so great foundation on this Letter, but after such a proof had of the knowledge of the Philosopher, he believed that what he had pronounced might befall him, though he could not imagine in what manner, for he fancied that only by death he could forget Athenais. However it were, this was the reason which completed his resolves, in the design he had not to return again into Persia, till he had freed his mind from that cruel passion which tormented him, and an hour after having caused Megabises to be called, who was the chief officer of his House, Megabises, said he, you shall lead back my Equipage into Persia, and leave with me only my first Esquire, and two others to serve me. You shall return with the rest, to the King my Father, and having reported to him those truths you know, you shall tell him, that for not doing an action which might have given given him displeasur, I am become the most miserable of all men; and that not daring to present my self to him whilst I labour under this sad condition, I go unknown to wander through Europe, and seek a remedy to my passion in this voyage, and in the diversity of objects which may conduce to my recovery; that I will return to him so soon as I shall have a mind more composed, and that besides those very necessary knowledges I may gain by this voyage, I have hopes it will not be unprofitable to his service.

Megabiser did a long time oppose this design of the Prince, and represented unto him all those reasons he believed strong enough to divert it, or at least to oblige him to suffer him to accompany him, but he could gain nothing over his resolution, for the Prince in the end testified to him so absolutely that he would be obeyed, that Megabiser, though with infinite grief, was constrained to submit to his will, and to prepare to pass the Bosphorus with his Equipage, leaving with him only my self, and two Esquires, the best of his Horses, and the precious Stones and Silver, which might be necessary for his Voyage. With this little Equipage he began his Journey, resolving to essay, if the predictions of Leontin would produce any effect, and to do with that little proof, all that he had an intention to do, if he had not been flattered with greater, which was to seek from Province to Province, and from occasion to occasion, all that could divert his thoughts from Athenais, whom, in whatsoever manner it should be, he was resolved to drive, if possible, from his memory.

But believing nothing more capable than War, to divert the thoughts of Love, and having his mind naturally full with martial thoughts, he would (unknown as he was) pass into those Countries where he might find occasion to signalize himself; and to this purpose we took our way towards Macedonia, a good part of which, the Huns had possessed themselves of, and from thence into Mesia, whither their King extended his Conquests, and where he had gained many great Provinces, by the valour of his younger Son Balsmir. In effect, there being a war yet maintained in this Country, my Prince apparently sought death rather than glory (for what glory could he hope for not making himself known?) and siding with those parties he believed most just, he ran to all perilous hazards, and gave marks of so extraordinary a valour, that he every where relieved his party; and I know not by what fortune he was known in many places, whatever his desire was to conceal himself, and through all the neighbouring Provinces of Greece, it was spread abroad, that the Prince of Persia privately travelled in Europe, and that in Macedonia, in Mesia, and afterwards in Illyria, he had done several great actions worthy eternal memory.

This fame which spread it self through all, made him depart thence, and seek in Pannonia, and Dalmatia, new employs for his warlike inclinations. In the mean time, all the endeavours he used to banish his love from his mind, proved vain, and though by those of war, and others which our Travel daily presented to us, his thoughts were for some moments diverted, it is most certain however, that Athenais still reigned in his soul, and that if by the greatness of his courage, his passion found more steadfastness to resist its forces, than it had at his departure from Constantinople; yet it is but too true, that maugre all his resolutions, the remembrance of the beloved Object had fully maintain'd its Empire. In fine, having done many fair things, which through all places where he passed, left the renown of his presence, and of which, my Lords, I make you not the recital, (out of fear my discourse should prove tedious, especially since the night is so far advanced, as to make you desire repose, and inform me I ought to come to an end of my narration) he would try his fortune on the prediction of Leontin, and seek that River on the Banks of which he might find a remedy to his passion. For this design he did no more then cross those Provinces, by which he must of force pass to reach the River Rhine, and departing from Pannonia, he passed into Noritia, and from thence by the Country of the Vindiliciens, came to the Banks of the Danube; we passed it at Celeusa, and entred in the end into the Country of the Hernoduses, where there happen'd an adventure, which I ought not to pass over, as I have done over other particulars of our Travel, which for its importance; I am obliged to recount you.

Having always accusom'd himself to carry his Arms in those Countries, where he had found war, and knowing well, that in those we now travelled through, there dayly passed great numbers of Soldiers, which were advanc'd towards Pannonia; he for the most part went armed, and it was probably for this reason, that feeling himself one day annoyed by the extraordinary heat, and seeing near the Road we travelled, a little Grove of Trees, which made a very pleasant shade; he had a desire to alight, and repose himself for some hours. Whilst he considered of this design, and turned his Horse-head that way, he might see depart thence, a Cavalier followed by some Esquires, whom in all probability a like design had drawn thither. He rode a great distance from us, that he might not be taken notice of, and my Prince having no concern to know him, marched without stopping to that place of the little wood, which to him seem'd the fairest, and where the Grasse appeared most verdant; he presently alighted, and having commanded me to do the same, he made me leave the Horses in the hands of the two Esquires, who stopp'd at some paces little distant from that place; but scarce had he with his eye begun to seek a place proper to repose himself, when in the same he had destined for it, he saw something shine on the Grasse, which on the sudden dazzled his eyes; he approached it with sufficient curiosity, for a man whose passion had of late left him none, and having taken it up, he found it to be a Box of Gold, of the bigness of the palm of ones hand, enriched with many Diamonds of infinite value. He held it some time without opening it, and beholding me with a sigh, If we were poor, said he, this accident might relieve us, but since I believe this fair Box belongs to those persons who but now departed hence, I will not make any profit of it; for I believe I ought to give it one of my Esquires to speed after them, and restore it if he can overtake them. "It is just my Lord, said I, but your Highness will indeed have but little curiosity if you send it without opening. Let us open it Mitranes, said he, but rather to satisfy your curiosity than mine. And at these words he open'd it, and casting his eyes within it, he saw that which none can be capable to represent to you, he saw, my Lords, a face, to the beauty of which no imagination can reach. I shall therefore not make you the description of that, which without making any particular discernment, no mortal beauty could approach, so rare was what I saw in the Pourtraicture. Varanez beheld with a curious eye which nothing was able to remove; his astonishment, caused at the sight of so prodigious a beauty, was expressed better by his behaviour and by his silence, than it could have been by words. In fine, opening his mouth, yet without drawing his eyes from the Pourtraicture, Mitranes, said he, can it be possible that there is any beauty in the world which may approach this? "I cannot believe it my Lord, said I, and I should imagine rather that it is a Picture made for fancy. "There is so little appearance, replied he, that any mortal thing can resemble what I see, that I should easily be of your opinion; but however, added he, there is little reason to believe, that a Box so fair and rich, should be employed only to keep a Picture made for fancy or pleasure. At these words he yet remain'd some time without speaking, still keeping his eyes fix'd on the fair Object, and dedicating his contemplation entirely to the admiration it had caus'd in him; but in the end drawing his eyes a little aside, and turning them towards me, "I do not despair, said he, to see the effect of the predictions of Leontin, for it I meet a true beauty equal to this I see in painting, I doubt not at all but I shall forget Athenais. "Ah my Lord, said I, would to God this might happen. "I should not possibly be more happy, replied the Prince, but however it be, I feel that it would easily come to pass, if I chance to see that in the original which I see in the Pourtraicture. I will use all my endeavours to know if there be anything like this in the world, nor will my mind be at rest till I satisfy myself.

Speaking in this manner he still beheld the marvellous Pourtraicture, and his eyes were so firmly settled on it, that though we heard a great noise of Horses behind us, it was not able to disturb him, but he was still in the same posture, when a Cavalier attendd by two Esquires, came near him. I judg'd well (by what I could mark of his Arms at a greater distance) that it was the same whom we had seen depart from that place when we approached it; but because he had his Viser lifted up, and a part of his visage discovered, I observed him to be a person little different in age from my Prince, but of the noblest deportment that I had ever beheld any man. His Arms were rich and magnificent, and all things about him had a very advantageous appearance. Being come near my Prince, before he perceived his arrival, he found him seriously contemplating the fair Pourtraicture, and accosting him without alighting from his Horse, Sir, said he, that Pourtraicture which you hold in your hand is mine, and I beseech you restore it me. Varanez at these words lift his eyes towards the countenance of this Cavalier, and appeared surpris'd at his goodly presence, at the same time when his without doubt produced the same effect in the eyes of the strange Knight; but though he believed that it was the same he had seen depart from thence some moments before, and doubted not but the Pourtraicture belonged to him, the manner after which he demanded it pleas'd him not at all, and he had already fix'd his affection on it in such sort, that if he had thought he could with honour have kept it, he had hardly inclin'd himself to restore it, and therefore looking upon him very fiercely, If this Pourtraicture be yours, said he, I shall not keep it, yet I shall very unwillingly restore it you, you, if you oblige not your self to let me see the Original, if it be possible that there is an Original of so admirable a beauty. In seeking to see her, said the Knight, you seek without doubt your own misery, and without doing you that ill office, I hope you will restore me my Picture. You hope in vain, replied my Prince, and if you engage not your self to this condition, you shall not draw it from my hands. I will engage my self to nothing but what I please, (replied the unknown Knight, with a fierceness nothing less than my Masters) and I will have what is mine without any condition. I see well, (said Varanez, with a sigh full of disdain) that thou knowest not him whom thou threatenest; but since there is some appearance we shall one day be Rivals, if it be true that there is in the world a Beauty equal to this Picture, there is little danger for us to begin to day for the Picture, what we shall one day finish for the Original. If I had not, replied the unknown Knight, Rivals more formidable than you, I should hope better of my fortune than now I can, but with expecting that thou shalt put thy self in a condition to do what thou sayst, thou shalt restore my Picture. And at these words, seeing that he still held the Box in his hand, he spurred his Horse by the side of him, and putting his hand to a Chain of Gold to which it was fastned, he laid hold on it so unexpectedly, that he fastened the Case from his hand before he could put himself into a posture to hinder it, and at the same time shutting it, and taking a Lance from one of his Esquires, Now, cryed he, I will attend thee without any trouble; and in effect he attended him in the posture of a man whom in all appearance the presence of an Enemy could not affright.

Varanez transported with a violent Choler, was in a moment on horseback, casting as it were flames out of his Viser which he pull'd down, and taking his Lance and Shield from the hands of his Esquires, brandishing it with a menacing cry went to take his Carier: his Enemy had already done the same, and having at the same time turn'd head the one towards the other, they parted, ran and encountred with a terrible fury; their Lances without shaking them in their Saddles broke on their shields into a thousand little Splinters, and they finished their carriers with the best grace in the world: turning about they drew their swords and assaulted each other in such a manner as would have put fear into any other hearts but theirs: I cannot tell you which of the two first struck his Enemy, nor particularize to you the blows they gave with an equal fury and forces little different; And I believe likewise that the recital I could make of the whole course of the Combat would be needless, but I will only tell you, that in little time they equally knew that neither had any reason to despise his enemy, but that both the one and the other had Glory enough to acquire by the issue of the Combat. I will not speak to you of the grief I repented, seeing my Prince engag'd in a peril wherein I could be only Spectator, both by the laws of Honour and the particular Laws of our profession. In a little time the Combat was heightned in such manner, and the two valiant Combatants dealt blows so terrible, that their Arms begun to bluish with blood in several places, and my affection possibly rather than the truth made me believe that there was more on those of my Master than on those of his Enemy: The Combat was brought to a very doubtful condition, and in all likelihood had not been finished but by the death of one or the other of the Warriours, and possibly of both, if Fortune had not led to that place another Knight cover'd with Arms all black, and followed only by two Esquires: though by all appearances it might have been judged he had little curiosity for things in which he had no interest, yet he stopped at the sight of such a Combat, and having sufficiently beheld it to be sensible of the valour of the two Combatants, on a sudden drawing his Sword, without considering the danger he ran into, by cutting himself between the Arms of two incens'd and two men so terrible as they appear'd, he spured between them with a countenance might make him be judged a great Master in what he saw others do, and joyning his voice to his Action, and to his voice the sight of a countenance full of majesty, which he discover'd to them, he acted so well that he oblig'd them to hearken to him. My Prince was however the last who had this respect for him, and his Enemy either less irritated or naturally more sweet than he, retired first, though to say truth he had no disadvantage of the Combat: It is enough valiant men, said he that had parted them, I see too much blood upon your Arms? and however important may be the cause of your Combat you have done enough.

He spoke these words and some others with so good a grace, and with an aspect so well accompanied with all marks of a true grandeur, that the indoubtable Courage of the Prince of Persia, which nothing but submission could bend, began to be softened, and to moderate that boiling Choler which transported him, and his Enemy with a very good grace addressing himself to the Knight in black Arms, "I am content, said he, to grant you what you desire of me, since you by many marks appear worthy a greater esteem: And turning in the end towards my Prince, "By the proof I have made of thy valour, said he, and the belief I have that all things in thy person are agreeable to it, I judge thee worthy to enter into the number of many illustrious miserable ones, who will not disdain thee for their companion; and if we see one another again, I will out of good will do that for thee which thou hadst not made me otherways do. I will seek thee so well, said Varanez, that I shall without doubt find thee, nor art thou so little remarkable but I may follow thy footsteps.

His Enemy did not understand these last words, for scarce had he done speaking but he drew back with all the swiftness which the labour of the Combat had left his Horse capable to undergo: Varanez burn'd with desire to follow him, but he was hindred by him who had caused the Combat to cease, and seeing my self have so good a helper, I joyn'd my self to him with so much success, the rather because his loss of blood began to weaken him, that we obliged him to go to the next adjacent City to dress his Wounds. That generous Cavalier knowing my Prince by many marks to be an extraordinary person, would not leave him, but going with us to the City where we had a design to dress him, would not only see his wounds dressed, but having understood that they were not dangerous but might in few days be cured, he would not forsake him, but made him be attended as if he had been his brother: my Prince obliged to his generosity made himself known to him for whom he was, and that great person to testify to him that he had in him the like confidence, discover'd himself to him for that great Constance, who hearkens to me, and whose Reputation is so gloriously spread through the universe.

You may have understood from him, my Lord, said Mitranez to Pharamond, that which hath passed between them after this knowledge, and the assurance they gave each other of a reciprocal amity. Nothing happen'd to them worthy recounting to you; and after the wounds of my Master were cured, as they were in few days, they began their Journey, and separated not, but by the departure of Varanez, who as I believe is gone in quest of that valiant Cavalier against whom he fought, not having since that time had other thoughts but to see the Original of that admirable Picture, having confessed to us many times, that if he met with a Beauty equal to that, he should hope to forget Athenais. You may judge by this my Lords, if he be not in a condition to recover of his love, and to see the effect of Leontin's Predictions. I attend here news of him by his order, and believing he hath not forgot me, I doubt not but I shall receive it in few days.

Mitranez concluded in this manner the recital of the Adventures of Varanez, of which Constance had before a confused knowledge, which yet hindred him not from taking infinite pleasure in the Narration. He had many things to say concerning the interest of Theodosius and Athenais, and King Pharamond studied not a little of the last Adventure of Varanez; but because the greatest part of the night was past, they deferred till the morrow the discourse they intended to have concerning this matter, and King Pharamond having conducted Artabure into his chamber, notwithstanding all the excuses he made, retired soon after into his own, to set apart fewer hours to sleep, than to those sad thoughts that had prepossessed him.

The end of the Third Part of
PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

The Fourth Part.

BOOK I.

King Pharamond having resolv'd to execute an enterprize he had design'd on some parts of the Enemies Camp, awakened a long time before the day broke, and immediately after his Chamber was filled with a great number of Officers of his Army, who were to have a part in that days action; among the chief he saw the Prince Sunnon, the Princes Ibere, Genebaud, and Meroveus, accompanied with Cleomer, and after them enter'd Priam, and Pharabert followed by Clodesile, Rithimer, and Theodimir, and many others, who for their Birth and Valour merited a particular esteem amongst men. The King received them with all that charming affa-bility which made them adore him, nor was there any one particularly to whom he gave not some mark of esteem by obliging discourses; and in the end addressing himself to those who were nearest to him, I hope, said he, that we may to day acquire some glory together, and since by the Orders of Rosamond defence is permitted us, I believe we shall render our selves nothing more criminal, by visiting to day the Herules and Gepides. My Lord, reply'd the valiant Ibere, You would be less expos'd than you are, to the fear to offend the Queen of the Cimbrians, if you would not go to seek occasions in person, and if you would be pleas'd to reserve your self for the most important, leaving to us those which are less, and in which your presence is not always necessary. I see well, my Cousin, reply'd the King of the Franks, that you would have all the Peril, and all the Glory to your self, but you must give me leave to share both the one and the other with you, and that for my particular quarrel, I expose not so many brave and generous Friends to those dangers wherein I will bear no part. Ah my Lord, (said the famous Priam) you do but dayly take too much, nor can you by any example, or any reason, justify that neglect you shew of a life which ought to be precious to all the earth. You see to the contrary, reply'd the King, that it is odious to a great part of the world, and that it is not but against my life that so many thousands of men are armed, which destroy our Country, and which, for the misfortune of one sole man, make so many miserable. It would be much more just, added he with a sigh, to abandon it to the fury of so many enemies which demand it, and to the legitimate resentments of the Queen Rosamond, than defend it at the price of so many others, to whom the Destinies might grant one more long and happy. But since it is not your intention, (added he with a sigh accompanied with some constraint) and since you love too much a miserable person, bated of Heaven and Fortune; I will not deprive you of the object of a friendship which is dear to me in my misfortunes, nor rob you of the fruit you desire of so many fair marks of your affection: and to this end, (pursued he, turning towards his Esquires) let them give me my Arms, to the end, that we may not present our naked breasts to the Steels of our enemies, and that they defend us from any blow of Lance or Sword that may afflict so many generous Friends.

Finishing these words, he put on his fair Arms, and appear'd soon after in that terrible posture, which to the eyes that beheld him might make him pass rather for the God of War than any mortal. Having understood afterwards by the report of Charamont, that according to the Orders which he had given the day before, all the Battalions were already in Arms, as well those which were to march with him as those which were to remain in the Camp to attend his Orders. He prepar'd himself to depart when he saw Richer and Diocles enter the Chamber with countenances that made him judge they brought some news; and in effect, he had scarce opened his mouth to ask them, when Diocles breaking silence, My Lord, said he, you need not take so much pains to go seek the Enemy as you have thought, for by what I can judge, they come to us with a design like to ours, and are now not far distant from our Camp. And at these words he presented him an Officer who having receiv'd commandment to relate to him what he knew, My Sovereign, said he, we have been on horseback all this night, under the conduct of Adelard, to whom your Majesty had given that command, and we were advanced far distant from the place where we began to draw a line between Segodunum and the Mountain. But in the end, having a long time beaten the Champaign, we encountered the Vant-Couriers of the Enemy, in number little different from ours: And Adelard without delay having given us command to charge them, we assaulted them with so much vigour, that not able to make any long resistance, they retired in disorder. The night being very clear, we pursued them a great way, and had possibly engag'd farther, if from the height of a Hill, which we came to in the pursuit, we had not heard in the adjacent Valleys, first the neighing of Horses, and afterwards the noise of Arms, which made us know, that not far distant from us, there was a body of the Enemies much stronger than that we had sought. Adelard stopt in this place, to learn more, and as you know my Lord, we hear things more easily by night than day, lending an attentive ear, we heard the same noise in several other places, and easily knew that those Troops which made it, possessed a great part of the neighbouring Country. Adelard dispatch'd two or three Horsemen of those who best knew the Country, to go take a nearer notice of them, and in the mean time he thought it his duty not to defer longer advising your Majesty, he commanded me at the same instant to depart, and I have speeded hither with all diligence possible.

This Officer spoke in this manner, and the King who knew the Country, having asked him more particularly of the place where he had left the enemies, and judging very near of the advance they might have made since the time he had left them, and turning to those that were about him, By what I see, said he, we shall take less pains than we thought, and more glory than we could hope: but the design we have had will not be unprofitable to us, since it will hinder us from being surpris'd, and cause the enemies to find us in another posture than possibly they hop'd. At these words seeing he had no time to lose, nor scarce any to change his design, he commanded the Prince Sunnon to begin to march at the head of the Cavalry: Pharabert had command to place himself at the head of the Gaules, and keep them in Arms in their quarter, till they should have advice from him: and to Priam to do the same throughout all the Camp, leaving all Officers that were necessary to make them observe their Orders in their grand body. But he left particularly the charge to Charamont, to remain at the guard of Contance and Marcomire, with those Troops that were able to defend the Castle from the whole Enemies Army, should he have had none to oppose them. He had much difficulty to make Marcomire remain in bed now he went to the field, but he was constrain'd to obey at this season, and so much the rather he did it, because the King permitted him not to be advertis'd of the Enemies march.

Having dispos'd all things like a great Master with an admirable diligence, he mounted on one of those horses which he ordinarily rode upon on those days, and of which he order'd a good number to be led near him at such times, and reposing the trust of what remain'd to do in the Camp, on the experience of the valiant Priam, Pharabert, and many other brave Commanders, whose valour and intelligence was known to him by many fair proofs: he appear'd himself in a little time at the head of the first Troop, which march'd under the Conduct of Sunnon, and by his presence he inspir'd into the souls of his own that confidence of victory which never forsook them whilst he fought in the head of them. He drew forth some Infantry along the Valley, which was very near the Camp, to possess an advantageous Post which was upon the passage, and he left a great body behind, with many squadrons of Cavalry, on the two wings, to sustain them in case of need, dividing the Cavalry which he led into two bodies, of which he gave the first to Sunnon and the valiant There, at the pressing importunity of Sunnon, who would essay the first danger, and see the enemies before the King could approach them.

It was just about the time when darkness began to give place to the first splendour of the day, when the King having pass'd the valley in which he had lodg'd his Infantry, and from thence being advanc'd to a Place high enough to discover all the plain to Segodunum, and the foot of the opposite Mountain, might observe very distinctly a part of the Enemies Squadrons

Squadrons, which coasting a wood on their left hand, advanced in fair order in the Plain, and with some choice men charged Adelard and his Troop, who retired fighting in all places where the situation of the place gave means to a small number to amuse a greater. At this fight it was difficult for the King of the Franks to stop the boiling heat of the young Sunnon, and he had no sooner obtained leave to succour Adelard, but he advanced with Ibere, followed with ten great Squadrons, while Pharamond with the rest came on an easy pace after him, observing what happen'd in the first rencounter.

Sunnon and Ibere mounted on two fair Horses, and richly arm'd, covering their left hands with their Shields, and carrying their Launces fix'd in their Rests, in a posture altogether warlike, marched fiercely towards their enemies, and coming near them, having passed a rising ground, which robbed them of their sight for some moments. They now observed both what was their countenance, and in what posture they came towards them; They easily saw that they had oppos'd them with a Body of Cavalry, little different to theirs in number; or if the enemy appeared more strong, it was not with a difference so great, as to cause in them any fear, or make them assault them with less assurance. Those who came to encounter them, appeared no less assured than they, nor in effect were they less; and two men who were at their head, having observ'd the action of the two French Princes, strengthened themselves like them with two strong Lances, and brandishing them, at the same time they saw them depart, they ran with a violence like to theirs, and encountred in the middle of the course, with a shock that made the Plain resound like the sound of Thunder. Their Lances flew into a thousand splinters, and the four valiant Cavaliers finished their career without any considerable advantage of either side. They returned immediately with their Swords in their hands, and the two Troops either possibly by the order of their Captains, or possibly by their own, having expected the event of their course, without stirring before they joyned, they had time enough to accost each other and exchange some blows. Ibere began a furious Combat with the enemy he had before him, and they charged one another with an equal vigour, and forces little different. But he who address'd himself to Prince Sunnon, having made a sign with his hand, lifting a little up his Viser, to speak with more freedom, I know not, said he, whether it may be permitted to an enemy to demand your name. Without informing my self of the reason you may have, answered the Prince of the Franks, I will tell you that I am Sunnon. I will not refuse, replied his enemy, the glory I have to acquire against you, but I could have desired that you had been Marcomire. I doubt not, replied Sunnon, but you are Gondemar, and you will possibly see Marcomire sooner than you desire, but in expecting—— He had without doubt said more, if the Troops which at that time charged, had given him leisure, or if he had had time to explain himself, otherwise than by a great blow of his Sword, which he made fall on the head of Gondemar, for it was truly he.

The Brother of Gondioch knowing by this rude attempt the force of his enemy, could not despise him, though the passions with which his soul was stimulated, made him seek Marcomire, but he, to let his Brother know a part of that resentment he had against a Rival more happy than himself, he made him feel by a terrible blow, what in all occasions where in he had encountred him, he had never proved; they exchanged some others by the diligence they had to disengage themselves from the press, and I know not what would have been the fortune of the young Brother of Pharamond, fighting against a man incens'd by a violent passion. But they had not long time to pursue their Combat, the multitudes of their men separated them notwithstanding their endeavours, and made them carry among the multitudes, the effects of their choler and their valour. Ibere and Gontran against whom he fought, found the same obstruction, and the particular animosity of each yielding to the remembrance of what they ought to the employment of that day, they ran to their functions, making their Troops fight with all those advantages they could have learn'd from the greatest Masters in the mystery of war.

The Victory was however doubtful, and seem'd to incline neither to the one nor the other of these two Parties, though they fought it by very great endeavours, and by a great effusion of blood; when King Pharamond who was at the head of those he had reserv'd; and who from a place little raised, had observ'd a part of what had pass'd, could not longer withhold their impatience, nor possibly his own, which spurred him to the Combat, but turning towards those who were so near him as to understand him, My Friends, (said he, with a countenance in which with a Majesty full of sweetness, a martial fire might be seen to sparkle forth) I doubt not but they who have acquired glory in so many great Battels, will likewise in this Combat gain sufficient honour, and if your courages need to be awaken'd, it will be by examples rather than words. Follow me then like valiant men, as you have done
hisbert,

hitherto, and suffer not the event of a Combat like this, to take from you the glory of so many famous days. Concluding these words, to which he believing it not necessary to add a long discourse, he marched towards the enemy, and because from the height where he was, he saw, or believed to see at the same time, their second Body move towards him, and that those which fought, filled the Plain unto the Wood, which was on their right hand, he moved on the left, towards those Troops which advanced to receive him, and drawing all his Squadrons in a Line, he obliged the enemies to enlarge in the Plain to oppose him, and observe the same order with his, to fight without disadvantage. But because at their head, though at a great distance, he beheld a Commander, who might truly make himself be observed by extraordinary appearances, and whom he doubted not to be one of the Lovers of Rosamond, emulation, and possibly the particular animosity he had against his Rivals, made him desire to know him before he came to the Combat, and turning towards those were the nearest to him, I would willingly, said he, if it were possible, learn the name of the Commander of this second Party you see coming towards us, and whom you may observe on the white Horse, and that bright shining Armour.

He had scarce spoken these words, when Meroveus and Cleomer parting from him with an admirable swiftness, flew to some Burgundians, which they saw routed and out of the press, and stopping, with their Swords lifted up, and a threatening voice, the first they found in their passage, they understood without difficulty from them, that he who marched in the head of the Cimbrians, and who that day commanded all that party, was the great and formidable Balamir. At this name of Balamir, the amorous Pharamond, who understood it immediately after, felt the fire which mounted into his countenance by the effects of different passions, which in a moment surpris'd his soul. Though hatred could difficultly introduce it self with the others, by reason of the obstruction the true esteem for so great a man caused; it is true he felt at the same instant choler against an enemy who was his Rival most to be feared, jealousy for the advantage he had over him of the fight and friendship of Rosamond, grief to see him employed in enterprises to serve a Princess whom he had eternally offended, and joy for his rencounter at the present time, to dispute his happiness with his Arms. He had not time to express what he thought, but he had enough to take that resolution which his several passions inspired him with, and causing a Trumpeter to be called, Go, said he, to Prince Balamir, whom thou seest at the head of that Party of the enemy, and tell him, that if he believes to find Pharamond an object worthy of his valour, he may before our Squadron joyn, break a Lance, and exchange two blows with his Sword for the love of Rosamond.

The Trumpeter parted with this order, and the King having charged his left hand with his Shield, and his right with a strong Lance, marched a little pace after him, and followed him so much the more patiently, because that he saw well, that the Troop of Sunnor had not need of his assistance, but fought without disadvantage against that of Gondemar. The Trumpeter crossing with infinite swiftness the space between the two Battalions, accosted Prince Balamir, and had no sooner acquitted his charge, but the Prince of the Huns receiving with extraordinary joy a proposal which would have made any other face than his grow pale, and beholding him with eyes which his discourse had enlightened with a fire extraordinary, Tell thy Master, said he, that I accept with too much joy the glory he presents me; and that in combating against him for Rosamond, I protest that for any other quarrel but that of Rosamond, I had never been his enemy. He sent back the Trumpeter after these words, and having ordered those who commanded under him, to make the Troop march after him at the same pace as that of Pharamond, and not to advance but as the Franks advanced, he galloped to meet his enemy, who did the same seeing him part, and in a very little time they found themselves at the distance of an ordinary Career. From that place they beheld each other some few minutes before they began their course; Pharamond finding Balamir much more worthy his esteem under those Arms with which he was at present covered, than in the condition he appeared to him, when he defended him against his Assassines; and Balamir who believed never to have seen Pharamond, finding in what appeared to him of his person all other things conformable to his high reputation. Pharamond carried that day those fair Arms in which he had appeared some days before to the eyes of Constance; and the valiant Balamir, in whom the love of Rosamond had revived that which other passions seemed to have extinguished in his soul for some time before, had Arms most rich, and shining with Gold and precious Stones, so that the beauty of his stature, and all the grace of his person, could not be accompanied by any apparel more rich and magnificent, his Helmet was shadowed with several Plumes black and white, which fell confusedly over his Shoulders, and over his weighty Shield, which he sustained sustained with his left hand, and on which he that day bore the famous Lions, the ordinary Arms of that illustrious house.

The two famous Warriours set apart but little time to the observation mutually made of each other, and having pull'd down the Visers of their Helms, they cover'd themselves with their Shields, levelled their Launces, and giving the reins to their Horses, they made them part with a swiftness to which few things can compare; if their Course were violent their shock was no less terrible, and as Love and Fortune had at this present armed one against the other two of the most valiant men that were at present among men, their rencounter did not at all fall short what might in all probability have been expected from their fair reputation. Their Launces, though chosen among the strongest, did even to their very handles break into a thousand pieces against their Shields which were oppos'd to them, but the two terrible assailants were not at all shaken by so violent an assault: but having sustain'd their Horses, who with their Croupers touch'd the ground, they spur'd them forward, and finish'd their career without shewing the least ill posture in their Saddles, though neither of them were accustom'd to find such resistance. The opinion which each of them had conceiv'd of the Valour of his Enemy, comforted them equally for the success of the encounter: and if by the bruit which was spread through the Earth of the valour of Balamir, Pharamond supported the equality with patience: Balamir was not ill satisfied with his fortune, to have sustain'd without disadvantage the force of that formidable Lance, which had given death to many great Princes, and many more valiant men. They drew their famous swords at the end of their course, and turning the heads of their Horses with an equal speed, they return'd with a fury which made the most confident of their Spectators look pale, and at the same time dealt two terrible blows on each others heads, that of Balamir falling on the Helm of Pharamond broke a part of its proud ridge, and made the King stagger in his Saddle; and that of Pharamond descended on the head of Balamir with so much force, that he was stunn'd as if the ruins of a Tower had fall'n on him, so that he was in need of all his strength to keep himself in his seat. They recover'd themselves very readily, and returning at the same time one against the other, they essayed to do that by the point they could not do by the edge, that of Balamir passing between the braces of his arm, gave Pharamond a slight wound in the shoulder, and that of Pharamond finding a default in the cuirasse to which he had directed it, wounded Balamir in the side, but with no great wound, for the Sword slid along the ribs without entering into his body. The blood which these two valiant Princes drew by these two blows stirred up all their anger, and rendering them more furious than two most terrible African Lyons, they were about to continue, and possibly determin'd by some fatal success a Combat which froze their two parties with a mortal fear, when their Troops which had seen the beginning with infinite impatience, could not suffer the continuation, but crossing in a few minutes the space that separated them, charg'd with infinite fury, and depriv'd the two great Warriours of the liberty of a particular Combat, to make them turn their thoughts to the event of a general one. This Obstruction made them foam with anger, and many times through bodies of their men they lanced one at the other with all that fury which Love and the emulation of Glory could create in them: But in the end they yielded to those difficulties they could not vanquish, and separating they threatned each other with their eyes, for the true respect and esteem they had for each other permitted them not to threaten with words.

But if their Choler could not make its effect fall on the object intended, it was no less fatal to the two parties, and these two Thunderbolts of War being constrained to employ their forces there, they carried terror, confusion, and death to all parts where they directed themselves. The valiant Balamir being a little drawn from the press to view the posture of the Combat, as well in the first as last Troops, perceiv'd that some Squadrons composed of Sidenes and Rugiens, subjects of Gondioch, did bend before those of the Marses, and the Angricariens, commanded by Elimir and Theodemir, and that these two brave Captains animating their men by their example, overwhelmed all that stood before them with an extraordinary Valour. The knowledge he had of this disadvantage of his Friends, made him run to that place with an admirable diligence; and presenting himself at the head of those broken Squadrons, by his presence and by his words, he gave them such reassurance as stopped the fury of his Enemies. Elimir and Theodemir perceived this change with infinite perplexity, and observing that this great assistance which snatched the Victory from them came but from one man alone, they bent at the same time their thoughts to revenge against him, and spurred on by an equal resentment, they both ran on him with full carriere, and accosting him let two weighty blows fall upon his head, the goodness of the Helmet resisted the edges of both their Swords, but it hindred not the Prince's being astonished for some time, and his Enemies willing to take advantage of his disorder, were lifting up their Arms to redouble their blows, when the terrible Balamir incensed much more than astonished, turned towards them with a fury which made them wax palid under their Arms, and striking them with an Arm stronger than theirs, gave Elimir his death by a cruel back stroke, which clove his head to the middle of his face, and lancing himself towards Theodomir, he thrust the point of his Sword between his Helmet and Cuirasse, piercing him quite through the neck, so that he fell without life from his Horse Crouper.

The fall of these two men, who held the degree of Princes in their Provinces, and in the Court of Pharamond made those of their men who were Spectators cast forth many lamentable cries, and the couragious Adelard finding himself too near to see the fall of the unfortunate Theodomir, with whom he had tyed a particular friendship, ran to his revenge with great fury, not fearing to expose himself to the danger that threatned him in assaulting so terrible an Enemy, but fortune was not favourable to him in his design, though less cruel to him than to the two others, for having dealt some blows on Balamir with more violence than good success, he receiv'd one which having cut his Shield in two pieces, had yet so much force as to open his Casque, so that he fell at the feet of the Horses with a deep wound in his head.

By these Actions and many others, possibly no less worthy the knowledge of men, having recover'd the decay of his Party, and made Victory turn of his side in all places where he shewed himself, he was stopp'd by the valiant Sumnon, who having done several actions worthy the illustrious blood from whence he was descended, oppos'd himself couragiously to him, and though there were possibly some inequality in their forces, yet he for a long time put him to a Stand. Pharamond on the other side made no less havock among the Cimbrians, and Burgundians, and having killed with two blows of his Sword, Gilmond Captain of the Coldales, Ulric nephew of Briomer, who commanded all the Cimbrians next to Balamir, and threw to ground the famous Goutran Prince of the illustrious blood of Gondiocb, by his admirable courage he had disorder'd, and struck a fear into his Enemies, when the valiant Gondemar seeking a glory proportionate to the greatness of the danger to which he was expos'd, presented himself before him, not fearing to engage his life against the valour of so formidable a Warriour: He had likewise the happiness to sustain the Combat against him with little disadvantage, so long as they had liberty to fight, but the Burgundians, who cast themselves before their Prince, and the Franks, who by their example cover'd their King, depriv'd them equally of its continuance. In the mean time they fought of each side with an equal courage and a fortune little different: The Plain on all sides was cover'd with blood, and the bodies of dead or dying men, while yet it could not be judg'd to which side the Victory would incline. The invincible Pharamond with whom it seem'd to have contracted an eternal alliance, blush'd with shame and Choler at the same time to see it so slowly declare it self in his favour, and he made it appear with an anger which jealousy and emulation rendred more violent in his Soul than at other times, caused by the valour and experience of Balamir and Gondemar, who with Troops not at all stronger than his disputed with him the Field and the Glory of the Day: This knowledge made him run to all sides to strengthen with his presence the weakest places; but passing near a hill, from whence he might easily discover all that was done in the plain, a design to observe the state of the Combat made him attend it, and from that height casting his eyes not only upon the Troops which fought, but many furlongs farther unto the very Camp of the Cimbrians, which from that place he might discover, he saw appear, though at a very great distance, a great number of Squadrons which marched towards him, and whose Forces were not inferior to those which fought under Balamir and Gondemar: He could not presently discern their number, but fixing his sight more accurately, he saw a great part of the Country covered, and did not doubt but that unless he speedily remedied it, he should be forced to engage with a power too great for him to withstand with those Forces which now he had about him: But as in these adventures his prudence and his courage always equally served him, immediately taking his resolutions and turning towards Prince Meroveus, and the faithful Cleomer, who were next him, he commanded Cleomer to post with diligence towards the Camp, and cause those Troops to advance which were destin'd to his assistance; and whom he had left so near that he might easily receive a succour from them in case of necessity: but because he judg'd well that he could not be so ready to oppose them of his Enemies whom he saw coming, he order'd Meroveus to cause a retreat to be founded, and to advertise Sumnon, Ibere, and other the most considerable Captains to rally their Squadrons and make them retire fighting, towards the Valley where he had lodged the Infantry, which was not far distant from that place, and where he hoped to fight the Enemies with a greater disadvantage for them if he could engage them.

All things were executed as he commanded, and the Franks, however desirous they were of the Combat, heard no sooner the Trumpets which recalled them to the Standard, but they rallied with that diligence which made their Enemies admire their discipline, and forming their Squadrons, maugre the disorder into which they were put, they began to fight and retreat with an admirable order, and like men who quitted the Field out of any other motive rather than fear. Both the Cimbrians and Burgundians were for the present astonish'd at the retreat of their Enemies, but the valiant Princes that commanded them, having presently discover'd the cause, were forc'd to take some more time to consult what resolution they were to take, and Balamir turning towards Prince Gondemar, who was come to his quarter, Pharamond retires before us, said he, but I believe that it is not fear that makes him flee, for since we know him for a great Master in the mystery of War, we ought not to doubt but on that side whither he would draw us, he has forces to sustain us: therefore in my opinion we have no other way to take, than either to engage him with those men we have, before he can join with the rest of his, or attend those who come to our assistance, to assault him in the post he goes to seek; but as the one of the two seems hard to execute, so the other is below our courage. That which you say is very true, replied Gondemar, but to follow that Party you judge the most honourable, we may in my opinion, press the Enemies without expecting greater Forces until we come to such places where we can no longer fight them without disadvantage, in which I judge as well as you, we ought not to engage our men without absolute necessity.

Balamir approv'd the advice of Gondemar, whose merit he extremely esteem'd, though he was brother to his Rival: and at the same time those two valiant Princes press'd with their Squadrons on those which retir'd, and had without doubt disorder'd them, had it not been for the great endeavours of their King, who sustaining the charges of the Cimbrians and Burgundians with those Bodies which he oppos'd to them, and which he changed from time to time, whilst the Gross retired towards the Valley, hindred his Enemies from drawing any great advantages from that little retreat. Sunnon, Ibere, Genebaud, and Meroveus did an hundred worthy Actions, and the great Pharamond was that day so well satisfied with what he saw his young Brother do, that it highly augmented the esteem and affection he had for him: Fighting in this manner, they arriv'd at the place where the Plain freightning, there appear'd the beginning of a great Valley, bounded on the one side with a River, which taking its source from some Fountains very near the place, went to discharge it self in the Segue: and on the other, with some Trees which took root in the foot of the Mountain. It was on the side of the Trees that Ibere, accompanied with Meroveus, sustain'd the Powers of the Cimbrians with an admirable courage, and the valiant Sunnon, followed by the hardy Genebaud, stopp'd the violence of the Burgundians on the River, whilst Pharamond combated every where, and keeping in the rear of those that retired, turned every moment his terrible Countenance towards those which pursued, striking fear by his sight into the Souls of the most hardy, and stopp'd them more powerfully by his presence than thousands of men could have done. He saw however near the place where the fair Meadow begins to expatiate it self between the Wood and the River, Balamir at the head of his Guards which were ordinarily near his person: the fall of this man who was very particularly beloved by his King, incens'd him with a terrible Choler, and notwithstanding all Obstructions, once more opened his passage to the Prince of the Huns, who for his part did not fly the Combat, and at the same time press'd him with his Horse, and directed the point of his Sword to his Vifer: The Sword did not work that effect he expected, but instead of finding the passage he sought, by the care which the Heavens had in this attempt of a life precious like that of Balamir, it lit on one of the edges of the Vifer, and broke in many pieces, leaving the incens'd King wholly disarmed; but the Shock was more advantageous, for the Horse of Balamir either feebler or more wearied than his could not support it, but fell with his Master at the feet of the Combatants.

These accidents that beset these two great Princes astonish'd them much less than those who fought near them, and if in a small time there was seen in the hand of the King of the Franks a Sword which he had wrested from one of his Enemies, the Prince of the Huns, whom the fall of his Horse had little, or not at all disorder'd, was straight remounted, much less by the assistance of his, than by his proper valour; his fall having incens'd him, he began to charge the Franks in the Meadow with a fury which made him forget the resolution he had taken with Gondemar, when he saw the Infantry which Pharamond had left in the Valley advance, and which marching along the River, and the foot of the Mountains, which the Cavalry of the Cimbrians could not approach, made shower down upon them a flight of Arrows, which in a moment deprived of life a great number of those that were engaged in the Meadow. Balamir and Gondemar presently knew the disadvantage they might receive in this kind of fighting, and the damage they suffered by the Infantry which it was difficult for them to force; but having seen appear at the same time the Troops which arrived to their succour, they prepared to use all their endeavours to oppress those they had before them, not doubting but notwithstanding all the valour of Pharamond, they might compass their desires, when, from the place where they were, being somewhat more exalted than that to the sight of which they were opposed, they discovered the Troops which came to assist Pharamond, which Cleomer had gone to fetch, and which marched in so great a number along the Valley as might justly deprive them of the hopes of Victory.

Balamir and Gondemar, both as from Rosamond and Gondioch, acknowledging a power above their own, and not having orders to engage the Armies in a general Battel, stopp'd at this sight to consider what they had to do; and a little after Balamir, to whom Gondemar out of respect yielded the Command, following the example which Pharamond had some time before given him, retired his Troops from the fight, and made them regain the Plain in the fairest order in the world: Pharamond pursued them hotly to the very Plain, where seeing that he could not be followed by his Infantry, nor seconded by the Cavalry which came to his assistance, who were yet too far distant to joyn with him, he was constrained to consent to their retreat, and to suffer with infinite displeasure that Balamir should share with him the Glory of that Day. He marched however after him, but very slowly, to give time to his Troops to come up, if there should be farther occasion of fighting; but before they came to the Plain, the enemy was too far distant to follow them, with any hopes to make them renew the Combat. The Field remain'd in this manner to the Franks, but it was without any other advantage, than that of making the Cimbrians do what the Franks had some time before done, and for the loss of men, it was almost equal in both parties, for both of the one and the other party, there fell near eight thousand upon the place. The King being advanced to the place where the Fight had begun, ordered them to seek among the Slain, for such as might yet receive some help, amongst whom he with infinite joy saw Adelard living, and some others with him, whose loss he had before lamented; but he found with infinite grief the bodies of Elimer and Ibeodimir, who lost their lives by the Sword of Balamir, and encouraging himself at this sight with a new anger against a Rival and an Enemy, whom he could not forbear to esteem, he settled resolutions for their revenge, which added a new fire to what his love and jealousy had enlightened in his soul.

Whilst he gave his orders both to succour the living, and bear away the most considerable of the dead, and by a goodness seldom practis'd, took the same care to afford help to those of his enemies who were able to receive it, some Scouts which he had sent on the right hand, and towards that Mountain which is opposed to the City of Segodunum, returned to him, and brought him advice, that in a Valley at the foot of that Mountain, they had discovered a grove of Cavalry, of about seven or eight hundred Horse, which according to their opinion, took their way by the backside of the Wood, towards the right hand; and that they had seen, though very indistinctly, by reason of the distance, Chariots full of Ladies, which marched amongst the Squadrons, of which the Body was composed. The King hearkened with a great deal of coldness and neglect to the beginning of the report of these Horsemen, but as soon as they talked of Chariots and Ladies, he hearkened not only with more attention, but with much commotion of spirit; and judging that it was not impollible but it might be the fair Queen her self, who was with those Chariots, he could not receive this advice without a trouble easily observable in his countenance by those about him. Ibere and Cleomer perceived it first, and the King beholding them with a behaviour that confirmed their thoughts, I see well, said he, that you read in my eyes, a part of what passes at present in my spirit, and I am content to tell you, that you are not deceived if you believe, that the report of these Cavaliers, by giving me some hopes to see Rosamond, have made me forget all other things to seek the occasion.

Concluding these words, having left in that place those persons that were necessary to execute what he commanded, both for the dead and wounded, he placed himself at the head of some choice Squadrons, commanding Prince Sannon to follow after him with the rest, towards the place which those Horsemen had described. It being most true, that at the name of Rosamond, not only all his prudence, but all his reason abandoned him, the hope he had conceived to see her, possessed him entirely in such sort, that he was not capable of any other thing but the Idea of Rosamond. This pressing and imperious remembrance, brance, made him march with great diligence towards the happiness he went to seek, but not without those troubles which strongly counter-balanced his hopes, and as in the estate of his fortune, he had but too much subject to fear, fear did at present hold but too much place in his spirit. Sometimes he imagined that the Queen of the Cimbrians would not so far hazard her self in that manner from the Camp, or if it were possible that she should do so, she would in all probability be accompanied by a greater Force than they had discovered, and by a Troop which would not permit his access: Not but that he could hope to open himself his passage to her with his Sword in his hand, if he had thought he might take the liberty to fight against her Guards, when she was there in person, but this was not his design, for he had without doubt preferred death before the least occasions to commit against her new offences. But when he fancied to himself that it was not impossible that Rosamond might be there, and that he might hope to approach her, it was in this action that he feared to displease her, as much at least as in combating against her Troops, and the fear to displease her, was more powerful over his spirit, than all other considerations. What goest thou unfortunate to seek? (said he with a sigh) What though thou shouldst be so happy as to see Rosamond, dost thou hope that she will to day behold thee more favourably than she hath for the time past? or though her inclinations should not be contrary to thee, dost thou believe that she can approve thy presumption? or that before so many witnesses which accompany her, she can suffer thy presence without offence? What now can induce thee to hope that thy merciless fortune hath made a truce with thee? or rather, knowing it as thou dost know, what hinders thee from believing that she leads thee to new occasions, to injure her whom thou adorest? Ah too unfortunate Pharamond, return back if thou art able yet for some few minutes, to hearken to reason, and content thy self with thy miseries, without going to seek more, to which without doubt thy cruel destiny conducts thee.

There wanted but little at that time, but that these considerations had stopped him, and made him direct his march another way; but he remain'd not long in this opinion, for all that he could fear from the sight of Rosamond, could not hinder him from desiring it. Let us run, added he, let us march whither our love calls us, and let us hearken no longer to that reason which we have so long since abandoned to our love. It is against this power it ought to defend us if it were in its power, and not cruelly oppose it self to that good, such as it is, which fortune offers us. Though I should not approach Rosamond, I may probably be permitted to see her, and though I should not speak to her, nor understand the sound of her voice, I should be happy if my eyes could see her, whatever distance separates us, her sight in whatever manner I obtain it, cannot but be of great value to the enamoured Pharamond, and from her fair eyes, how distant soever, I shall receive a new day, much more sweet to me than what the Heavens great Luminary gives us.

Speaking to himself these words, more agreeable to his passion than his ordinary wisdom, he came with the Troop that followed him to the borders of the Valley, and found himself in a place so high, that he might easily observe all that was there, and all that passed; he knew presently, not only that the report brought him was true, both for the number of the Cavalry, and for the Chariots which they conducted; but he saw that the Chariots and the Cavalry were still in the same place where his Scouts had left them, and that the Ladies, who in all likelyhood had been stopped by some hindrance, remounted their Chariots to depart. At the view of this he stopped, holding his eyes fix'd on the object which employed it, without power to determine on any resolution; but he saw that he was likewise seen, and the Troop which he beheld, not marching without distrust, they had no sooner discovered him, and with him five hundred Horse, which followed him, but they rallied about the Chariot, and placed them in the middle of four Squadrons, which they ordered in a moment. Pharamond observed them in the place where he stood, without stirring, and judged by their countenances that they were in a good resolution to fight if they were assaulted. In effect, they gave him occasion to judge so, whilst there appeared not only that Troop which followed the King; but Prince Sunnon, who fearing by the remembrance of things past, the effects which the love of Pharamond might produce, would not let him advance with so few men, without following him with the gross, with much more diligence than he had ordered; so that he had stood but a little time to behold the Chariots, and the men which accompanied them, when they might behold all the Hill covered with Squadrons, which advanced at the same time, and instead of five hundred Horse which appeared at first to them, they might now behold more than four thousand. At this sight, the fair resolution they had testified against the small number, abandoned them, and not being in truth in any condition to fight those they beheld, fear first wrought confusion and disorder amongst them, them, and in the end spread so generally through all, that the whole Troop was disbanded in a moment, the Horsemen flying both along the Valley towards the other Hill and on all sides where they could hope to find their safety, leaving about the Chariots but a small number of men, more generous than the common, who ranged themselves about the Ladies, resolving to expect their destiny in their duty.

The King of the Franky beheld this disorder with infinite discontent, fearing to have already done a new injury to the Queen of the Cimbrians, if it were truly she, by affrighting her men, but in a moment after he found some consolation, in the hope he had he might approach her, and demand pardon for the disorder to which he had not contributed, but by his presence. But as he began by some appearances to fear that it was not Rosamond, he would clear himself before he would go near the Chariots, and as he was about to send a Trumpeter, Cleomer presented to him two of the Fugitives, whom some of his Horsemen had taken, among whom their fear had made them seek their safety. The King having commanded those about him not to make him known, neither by their actions nor discourse, caused these two Horsemen to approach, and commanded them not to fear any thing, but tell him with truth who were the Ladies they accompanied. These men being reassured by the sweetnets of the usage they received, one of them breaking silence, My Lord, said he, the Lady whom we accompany, is the Princess Amalazontha, who is Queen of the Turingiens, by the death of Amalaric her Brother, who lost his life in Battel by the hands of King Pharamond. These words which deprived the amorous Prince of the hopes he had to see his adored object, touched him with a sensible displeasure, and those who were near him, easily observed the marks in his face, but he used his utmost endeavours to vanquish it, at least to dissemble it, and breaking silence with some sighs he could not retain, How, (said he to the two Turingiens), the Princess whom you convoy, is she then the famous Amalazontha, who by the renown of her admirable beauty, is known through all the world, and who by the death of Amalaric is at present Queen of the Turingiens? Those two men having confirmed what he said, I doubt not at all, added the King, but your fair Queen passes this Country to go to the Queen of the Cimbrians, and join with those other Beauties, who encourage the Nations to war again Pharamond. It is true my Lord, said the Turingiens, that our Queen goes to visit the Queen of the Cimbrians, where the Troops of the King her Brother yet are, and it is believed they will not separate, till this war be at an end.

This discourse drew many new sighs from the breast of the passionate King, seeing that with so many millions of men, so many Beauties united themselves together for his ruine; but this knowledge of the intentions of Amalazontha, could not presently extinguish that profound respect he had for her Sex, and what he ought particularly to her beauty, the fame of which was spread abroad; and therefore permitting his civil and gallant humour to reign over all his passions, which seemed to make him incapable of all things but the remembrance of Rosamond, he resolved to render to this fair Queen, though she were his enemy, all she could have expected from him, if she had passed through his Territories with intentions wholly contrary to those which now conducted her. And to this purpose, having commanded the two Turingiens to return to their Queen, and to cause their companions to rally, he commanded Prince Sunnon to stay in the place where he was, with Ibere and all the Troops, and taking with him only Cleomer, Geneband, and Meroveus; to whom, out of a respect which defended him from presenting before the eyes of that Princess, him who had slain her Brother, he gave order not to render any respect to make him known; he descended the Valley, and marched towards the Chariots, after having confirmed to those which were about them, by a sign which he made many times with his hand, what their companions whom he sent back might have informed them.

To accost the Queen of the Turingiens with more respect, he had lifted up the Visor of his Helmet in such manner, that his countenance was wholly discovered, and the stir and heat of the Combat having added a little redness to it, it seemed that his natural beauty received a new splendour, and that charming and majestick aspect, against which nothing could resist, appeared exalted that day, like something extraordinary, and more than humane; to the charm of his face was added that which equally spread it self through all his person, and his whole composure was such, that it had been difficult for persons that had never seen him, to behold him without admiration. Approaching the Chariot of the fair Queen, he beheld in her habits, and in those of her Ladies, and the Officers of her Train, all the marks of a profound sadness; but when he cast his eyes on her face, he found a subject of astonishment, from which, nothing but the prepossession of his soul, and a soul prepossessed for Rosamond, was capable to defend him. And it might indeed be said, with truth, that few beauties in the world could equal that of Amalazontha; and that next Rosamond, there was perhaps none, with whom she might not dispute. Nothing can appear to the eye more white, more lively, and more united, than her complexion; nor was ever any proportion found more regular, than what was observed in all the features, and in the whole form of her face. Her eyes were black, though somewhat different from those which truly are so, but they had a piercing fire, which rendered their Glances difficult to support, and when they would sweeten a part of what they had of natural fierceness, they had a charm which did insensibly surprize, and against which, it was difficult for any to defend themselves. The beauty of her lips, and that of her teeth, was admirable, and those of her hands and neck, agreed wonderfully with the absolute perfection of her whole person; her hair approached rather to black than fair, nor could it be of a colour more proportionate to that of her eyes; her stature was little inferior to that of Rosamond, and in her port, her gait and all her action, she had something so great, so fair, and so exalted, that it was difficult to behold her, without submitting to her all that respect, which a Transcendent and Royal Majesty could exact. She had likewise in the tone of her voice, a particular charm, nor could any hearken to her, without receiving that impression which her discourse intended.

with

Notwithstanding all that the prepossession of Pharamond could do by observing at first sight a part of these wonders, and by the effect they produced, astonishment found place in a soul, which in all probability was little capable to receive any; but if he received any, he caused no less in the spirit of the fair Queen, and though she seemed at present overwhelmed in the grief that had seized on her spirits, and that what she felt for the loss of a Brother whom she dearly loved, expressed it self by all mournful appearances, from which the affright and fear of her Troop, and the danger threatening her was not able to divert her at the sight of such a person as Pharamond, she could not remain in the estate wherein she was, but lifting up her head which she had negligently leaned on the shoulder of one of her Ladies, she fixed her self entirely to observe a man so extraordinary as he appeared to her eyes. All that had ever amazed them before, was expell'd from her memory at the sight of so excellent an object, and the fair figure which presented it self to her sight, spread its representation through her whole soul in an instant. The King of the Franks having as well as she pay'd some time to the surprize which the fair object had caus'd, saluted her with a profound submission, bowing himself to his very Saddle Bow; and when he lifted up his eyes to fix them on her countenance, seeking terms to explain himself without making himself known, or without offending the truth, for which he had an inviolable respect, Great Queen, said he, if Pharamond were at the head of the Troops you see, or if the misfortune he hath to be odious to you, permitted him to present himself before you, he would without doubt do the same I come to do for him; and therefore Prince Sunnon his Brother, who commands this Party, hath thought good I should come to assure you, that the design which leads you through his Brothers Territories, cannot hinder you from being Mistress there, and that you may not only call back your men, whom their fear hath made fly from you, but if their convoy suffices not to conduct you to the Camp of the Queen of the Cimbrians, he will in person assure the March to her very Tents. This is all he can offer you for Pharamond, nor doth his misfortune permit him to hope you would suffer more.

The King of the Franks spoke in this manner, and the fair Queen of the Turingiens hearkened to him with a trouble she had never before felt, which appeared in her eyes whilst he spoke, and breaking silence so soon as he had done, I am much more content, said she, to owe to Prince Sunnon or to you, the civility I receive, than to the King of the Franks; and though the fame which is spread through the world of him, makes him esteem'd by his very enemies, I cannot receive a more sensible discourtesie, than to be obliged to one who hath slain my Brother. I can, replied the King, tell you for the defence of Pharamond, that it is was only defending his own life, that he gave death to the King your Brother, and that possibly it is not just, that with so much innocence, he should be exposed to a misery so great, as the hatred of so fair a Princess. You know well, (replied Amalazontha with a sigh) *that neither friendship nor hatred are always founded on reason, and that we ought to yield something to misfortune, when we are subjected to Fortunes Empire. If that cruel Fortune, added Pharamond, did act with the King of the Franks as with ordinary enemies, he might find some consolation in his misery, and in the justice of his cause; but he sees with too much grief, and possibly with some injustice, all the Beauties of the world armed against him, by seeing himself exposed to the hatred of Amalazontha, Albisinda, and Rosamond. Since he hath slain the Brothers of these three Princesses, replied the Queen of the Turingiens, he cannot wonder if he be hated by them, nor can he, having spilt so much blood, speak himself innocent,* innocent. I assure my self, replied the King, that he will do all that is possible for him, to appease your anger, and in those occasions of War you force him too, you will find him sufficiently favourable, to repair a part of those crimes, his ill fortune hath made him commit. He would esteem himself most happy, if with all his blood, he could satisfy the anger of those incens'd Beauties, and when I should offer it for him, I believe he would not disown it.

The Queen at this very time beheld the King with an aspect, which to those that were near her, appeared altogether passionate, and breaking silence with a sigh, I confess, said she, that an Intercessor like you is capable to appease the most incens'd soul, and whatever hath been published of the person of the King of the Franks, were he like you, it would be difficult to hate him. These words slipt between the fair lips of Amalazontha, possibly against her intention, and no sooner had she pronounced them, but her countenance was covered with a blush, which yet made her seem more fair to those that beheld her. Her confusion increas'd from minute to minute, instead of diminishing, and whatever endeavour she us'd to recover her self, she could speak no more but in disorder. The King fearing that she began to know him, and that this knowledge of the murderer of her Brother, had caus'd this trouble which he observ'd in her face; having told her he would return to the Prince Sumon, and that he doubted not, but that Prince would come to render her in person, what he ought her, he took leave of her with a profound reverence, and return'd towards the Hill. Amalazontha followed him with her eyes so long as she could distinguish him from the others, or rather, her heart followed him more than her eyes; and by the prodigious effect of an extraordinary merit, like that of King Pharamond, a heart, which possibly till that fatal moment had been insensible of assaults of love, or rather, a heart, which till then, neither love, nor the merit of many great men, could touch, possibly by the revenge of a God whom she had cruelly despis'd, and by an effect of her ill destiny, began to burn with a fire she had never felt, and to burn for a man, who though sensible and too sensible of love, could never pay to hers, any acknowledgment could content it; she sigh'd with grief as well as love, at this change of her condition, and though she felt it but imperfectly, she did all that was possible to excite her anger against this presumptuous passion, which hitherto, not having been able to open its passage to her heart, seem'd now to be in a moment established with Sovereign Authority: But her anger languish'd, notwithstanding the force she us'd to incense it, and refusing to serve her in this affair, it seem'd to yield to a more lofty power, which disarm'd it of all its forces. She for some time flattered her self against the knowledge of her evil, but scarce had she consulted a small time, but she found she truly lov'd, though she were little experienced in the knowledge of an evil which she had never well prov'd, and she perceiv'd more, than she was willing, that the Idea of that person she yet sought with her eyes, was fixed in the middle of her heart, in such manner, as it had appeared to her in his converse. This knowledge wanted little of drawing tears from her fair eyes, or, that she had not open'd that stream which her unfortunate passion ought to have made her many days let flow. Alas, (said she at present to her self) what am I? where am I? and into what terrible misfortune am I fallen? She who amongst her attendant Ladies was most dear to her, and who was at present seated near her, observ'd in her face the trouble of her spirit, and demanded with great eagerness and affection, whether she were indispos'd; but the Queen pressing her arm, and reaching her lips to her ear, Let me alone Erudice, said she, thou wilt know possibly but too much, would to the Gods that I were dead. Concluding these words, she remain'd in this posture, her head leaning on the shoulder of that Lady, without thinking of her departure, or without so much as speaking a word to her Officers, who with infinite difficulty rallied their affrighted men.

In the mean time, King Pharamond was returned amongst his men, ravish'd with the beauty, and what he had seen of the merit of Amalazontha, and willing to render to that fair Queen, what he ought to her degree, to her beauty, and to the esteem she testified for his person, he commanded the Prince Sumon to go himself with a thousand Horse, to accompany her as far as she desired, and to endeavour by his carriage, and by the respect he should testify, to blot out a part of the anger she had against him. He order'd him to discover himself to her for what he was, and to signify to her, that the Brother of Pharamond was highly honoured, in finding an opportunity to serve her, but he forbid him expressly to let her know, or to give her place to imagine, that he who had before spok'd to her was King Pharamond, fearing to have been wanting in the respect he ought to her, in presenting to her eyes the person who had slain her Brother. Sumon descend'd the Valley with a thousand Horse (whilst the King with the rest took their way towards the Camp) and advancing with the principal Officers some paces before the Troop, he approach'd the Chariot, Chariot, and accosting the Queen, saluted her with infinite submission; but when he fix'd his eyes on her fair countenance, and was about to have spoken to her, the splendour of that Cœlestial Beauty dazzled his eyes, and amazed his spirit at the same time, troubling him in such sort, that he forgot in a moment, both what he had to say, and what he ought to do in an accident of the same nature.

The Queen having understood that it was the Brother of King Pharamond, had put her self into a posture to receive him, with a civility due to his Rank, and to the treatment he us'd towards her, and all things in this Prince being truly conformable to his Dignity, his aspect being admirably accomplish'd, his Arms of the fairest and most magnificent, and all sorts of external appearances denoting truly what he was, she easily conceiv'd him Brother to Pharamond, and rendred him all the thought due to his Dignity; but though she saw all things in him worthy remark and consideration, she saw not Pharamond, or rather, that unknown person whom she lov'd, and whom she on all sides sought for with passionate eyes. The trouble she had, not to see him near the Prince, made her grow pale, but neither that paleness, nor the languor which by reason of that trouble seiz'd her, did any thing diminish her Beauty, nor hinder the French Prince, from finding too many charms to preserve a liberty which he had till that fatal moment defended against all other Beauties. In fine, were it by the merit of Pharamond and Amalazombha, or the ill destiny of the Queen of the Turingiens and the Brother of Pharamond, two Souls were on the same day enflamed under unhappy signs, and in an ill conjuncture both for the one and the other. The young Prince was soon sensible of his evil, but being ignorant of the most cruel circumstances of it, and the hard obstruction which his ill fortune oppos'd, he beheld his slavery not as a misery, but permitted himself with pleasure, to be transported by a torrent of passion, sufficiently violent in its birth: He had accosted the Chariot, and beheld a long time the Queen with the countenance of an astonish'd man; and if he had not had to do with a person whose spirit was at present no freer than his, he had been in great danger either to discover to her all the disorder in which he was, or to create in her a very bad opinion. He at length by force overcame what he resent'd, to acquit himself of what he ought, and breaking silence, which according to the Laws of Civility he had too long kept, Be pleas'd to pardon Madam, said he, the faults which a too just astonishment makes me commit, nor think it strange, that having so great a subject to admire, I have spent some minutes in admiration. I believe I come hither to render you in the absence of King Pharamond, that which he would himself have rendred you with too much joy, if his ill fortune had not oppos'd it; and I see, that I am come to deplore the misfortune he hath to be odious to the fairest person in the world. I hope however Madam, that your hatred will not extend to the innocent, but that you will permit a Prince who truly is so, though he be the Brother of Pharamond, to present you the Duty of a Country you honour with your presence, though the intention which hath conducted you be not favourable to us.

The Prince spoke in this manner, and notwithstanding the trouble of his spirit, express'd himself with a grace, which assist'd by the other advantages of his degree and person, might have oblig'd the Queen to a very particular esteem for him, and it is most certain that an hour before, in despite of the hatred she bore the King his Brother, he might have been received in a manner as obliging, as he could reasonably desire; but in the estate he at present found her, she scarce lent him any attention: Not but that she forc'd her self, to receive with civility a Prince, whose carriage was so obliging to her; in a time whereof she might well have dispens'd with a part of what he rendred her; but her soul was in such manner repleat with the Idea which wholly possess'd it, and with the grief she felt, that it seem'd she had neither eyes nor remembrance for any other thing, and therefore turning her self towards the Prince, with a languor which in his sight rendred her yet more fair, It is to me a very great misfortune, said she, to see my self oblig'd to those persons, against whom I come to make war, and to find at present so great an obstruction in the just desire I have to revenge the death of my Brother. I should not have been expos'd to it, but by the error of my Guides, and some accidents that are befallen us. But however it be, I will again tell you, my Lord, what I told to him who made me the first offers on your part, and confess that my trouble is much less, to owe to you for the entertainment you give me, than if I received it from King Pharamond. I can assure you, (replied the Prince, with a trouble she might easily observe on his face) that King Pharamond would render you with too much satisfaction the service which his Brother comes to offer you, nor hath he possibly ever so much resent'd his misery, as he would this day do, if he could know, to what his misfortune hath rendred him odious. My beauty, replied the Queen, is in little esteem in the world in comparison of that of Rosamond, and the love which Pharamond hath for her, and that which Renown hath published, leaves him apparently in little Sensibility for other Beauties. I have never seen the Queen of the Cimbrians, replied Surron, but whatever renown may speak, I can difficultly imagine that there can be any thing so fair in the world as what now appears to my eyes: and if I could hope, added he with a sigh, that the hatred you have for a Prince, who hath attracted it rather by his misfortune than design would not extend, I should value with little grief that of all other enemies which our unhappiness may raise us. You ought not to doubt, replied the Queen of the Turingiens, that my thoughts are conformable to justice, so far as I understand it: But in the mean time (added she, seeing that her men were rallied) if you will not treat me like a Prisoner of War you shall permit me to pursue my journey, and to retire towards the Queen of the Cimbrians. You will rather make Prisoners, (replied the Prince, casting her a passionate look,) than be in danger of being a Prisoner, for the liberties of those that see you, are not in the same security with yours. You may depart when you please, (continued he, making a sign to his men to march,) but you shall permit me if you please to accompany you through those places where you may yet meet some troublesome encounter, and you shall receive this light service from a Prince, who would with all his soul sacrifice to you something more precious than his life.

He pronounced these words with a behaviour which might easily have made the Queen observe a part of what he felt, if she had taken notice, but her soul was prepossessed entirely with a thought which left no place to all others, therefore instead of replying to these last words, which had something in them very passionate, she contented her self to oppose the design he had to accompany her, and to refuse it if it were possible; but she oppos'd in vain, for the Prince who had done her this office, had he been obliged by civility only, joyning to the power it had in the soul of a high-born Prince, all that love could most violently contribute, to fix him to the sight of the beloved object, would not permit himself to be overcome, though he had yielded up his Arms to this imperious beauty; and having represented to her that she was not out of danger of encountering yet some Party, from whom the might receive displeasure, he made her in the end resolve to suffer him to accompany her beyond the Wood, the other end of which was little distant from the Enemies Camp.

Having obtained leave he marched on the side of the Chariot, finding in her sight somewhat to enflame him more and more, and swallowing down at every instant, the fatal bait which had already intrapped his heart. The charming Queen did not so much as think of this last effect of her beauty, nor suffer but with difficulty, any other object but what she had in her breast, and turning her eyes from time to time on those who nearest followed the Prince, she fought with little success but infinite trouble, that admirable figure she had too well engraven in her remembrance. She was oftentimes tempted to demand his name of the Prince, but the fear she had either to discover something by this curiosity of what she would willingly conceal from her self if it were possible, or to rencounter in the person whom she would know, him whom she desired not to know, stopped her mouth, and as she had a design to oppose this passion with all the force her virtue could fortifie her with, instead of seeking the knowledge of what she loved, she resolved to do all was possible to banish it from her memory.

In the mean time, the King of the Franks was return'd towards the Camp, from which not being far distant, he in a short time appear'd before the first Troops which he found in Arms as he had commanded, whom passing by, he order'd to repose themselves, and to give the word to the Rearmost. All the considerable men of the Army presented themselves to him, so soon as he had set foot on the ground, and he having endear'd them all according to his usual custom, and as by his natural sweetness he used to do, without aversion or affectation, he went to the Chamber of Constance, thinking himself obliged to demand pardon for the incivility he believed to have acted towards him, before he took any repose, or caused a wound he had receiv'd in his Shoulder to be dressed, which was not so slight that it ought to have been neglected. Entering into the apartment of the illustrious Roman, he found him risen from his Bed, and saw with him Prince Marcomire, who could no less than he keep his bed longer for a little wound, whilst the King his Brother was fighting, whom he prepared to go seek, if his return had been a little longer deferred. He was troubled to find them in that condition, fearing that their health might receive some prejudice, and was about to complain both to the one and the other, of the little care they took of themselves, when they prevented him by their complaints, and the generous Constance accosting him with sweetness equally natural to both, Do you believe my Lord, said he, that my grief hath made me forget a Mytery I have practis'd all my life? Or is it possible that I could be suspected, by reason of the alliance the Sueves have had with the Romans?

If neither the one nor the other be true, as I will believe for my own consolation, permit me to complain and to tell you, that possibly you ought not to have left me in the bed, when you went to the field. Though you had been in perfect health, replied the King, I had very great reasons not to abuse your goodness nor your friendship in such hazards, but I know not whether I have any strong enough to justify my self, for absenting my self so long from you as I have done, nor had I done it, had I believ'd that the enterprize I went about, would have retarded me longer than till you awaken'd. And for me my Lord, said Prince Marcomire, what reason had you to forsake me? For you Brother, said the King, I had not forgot you, had I thought you in a condition to mount on horseback with us, but if you had I assure my self you had found some diversion, by the encounter of a Lady who with a very good grace asked news of you. These words made Marcomire blush, either with anger or jealousy, but having soon after recover'd himself, I doubt not at all, said he to the King, but it was Theodora demanded news of Ericlea and I believe they might have diverted you with their conversation had they encountred. The King was about to reply, when Artabure who was in the Chamber, coming to him, My Lord, said he, though I am a Roman, mine wholly conform with the thoughts of the great Constance, and those he hath for you are so just, that without informing my self whether your Enemies be Allies to the Romans, I dare offer you a Souldier and a Sword against them.

As Artabure made this discourse with the best grace in the world, so Pharamond received it with the same, and taking the hand of the valiant Roman, which he pressed in one of his with infinite affection; You have reason, said he, to believe you may offer me a Souldier; the valiant Artabure is a Souldier so famous that what ever party he embraces may hope a victory from his Sword: I receive the offer he makes me with all the acknowledgment is due, but the advantage I may receive, will not oblige me to abuse your goodness, unless reduced to the greatest necessities. He had spoken more, and he had possibly stopp'd to inform Constance of the particulars of the Combat he came from, if he had not prayed him to disarm himself, and take some repose after the travel he had undergone; and if Charamont who was near them and to whom the King's safety was much more dear than his own, visiting all parts of his Armour, which were in several places besmear'd with blood, had not observ'd, that with which they blushed on his shoulder, was his own and not his Enemies: He had no sooner perceived it, but he complained to him of the neglect he had for the preservation of his life, and Constance and Marcomire having signified their trouble at it, Pharamond to satisfy them departed the Chamber, having told them laughing that that which so allarm'd them was but a scratch, though he received it from one of the strongest Arms in the world. So soon as he was in his Chamber, Marcomire and Charamont caused him to be put to bed, and soon after the wound to be dress'd; which they found sufficiently great though not dangerous: After he was dress'd they constrain'd him to take some nourishment; and presently after, knowing well that his wound oblig'd him not to silence, he gave an account to Priam, Phalarert, and the other Commanders who were near him of the particulars of the Combat, and his meeting the Queen of the Turingiens; and if he spoke advantagiously of the beauty of this Princess, he exalted all that he had seen that day of the Valour of Balamir and Gondemar, in terms which made them about him know; that in a Soul like to his, no interest could make Merit lose the esteem was due. All the world gave infinite praises to the great actions of Balamir, though the death of Theodmir and Elimir, and the great wound of Adelard had incens'd them against him. But Prince Marcomire stopping with an interest wholly particular at what he understood of Gondemar, hearkned to him with alterations which made themselves observable in his eyes, and on his countenance; when the King had done speaking, It contents me much my Lord, said he, that Fortune hath given me a Rival whom your self judge worthy your esteem, and I hope before this War be ended we shall breath one another, he may in the mean time want to have tryed himself against the three Brothers, but after the glory he hath acquired in Combating against you, he hath not much more to seek. He went off however; replied the King, in a better condition from the Combat he made against me, than from that he made against you, and by the proof he hath made of the strength of Pharamond, he hath no reason to despise Marcomire's: but however it be both in Love and War I highly esteem his manner of acting, and I could wish both for your and for my sake, that he were neither your Rival nor our Enemy. But Brother, if I make this observation for you as to Gondemar, you may render me the same as to Balamir, for it is most certain that among all men Fortune cannot raise me up a more formidable Rival, not but that Gondioch is possibly in greater esteem than he among his, both because he is a King, because he hath a powerful Army, and because he is in truth no less a great Warriour than he, nor less capable to command Armies, though he had the disadvantage against him in the particular Combat; but with all these advantages I fear little that Rosamond should look upon him favourably, and I doubt not at all but she hath conceived for his carriage that disdain he hath merited, while both in the person and actions of Balamir, all things are worthy her esteem; nor is it but too much to be feared that esteem may grow to an affection for a man continually employed in occasions to serve her, against a man who by an invincible Obstruction can never be happy: besides, Rosamond being at present a Queen her self, since by espousing a Prince she can lose nothing of her Dignity, a Royal birth is sufficient for Balamir, nor hath he need of any other Scepter but what he will receive from her, if he be so happy to possess her. I have seen him however to day, said Geneband who was present, and I have seen him with all his Valour thrown to the ground, and forc'd to tumble at the Horses feet by the shock of King Pharamond. The disadvantage he had in that encounter, replied Pharamond, came from his Horse which was more feeble than mine, for in the proof I have made of his Valour both at the Lance and Sword, I have not known that his strength was inferiour to mine. It is true, added Prince Meroveus, that I have seen him this day do an hundred Actions worthy eternal memory. And I doubt not at all, concluded the valiant Ihere, that it was only by the obstruction he brought, that victory did not do that this day in our favour, which it hath hitherto done in so many great Battels.

Whilst before a vertuous Prince, justice was thus rendred to virtue, in the person of his Enemies, Prince Sunnon returning from accompanying the Queen of the Turringiens, arriv'd at the Camp, and came presently into the Chamber of Pharamond: So soon as he saw him, he made him approach his bed, and beholding him with a sigh, And well my Brother, said he, Have you accompanied Queen Amalazontha, and have you found her as fair as I represented her to you? The young Prince blush'd at this discourse of the King, finding himself in such a confusion, that for a long time he was not able to answer him: The King who did not presently perceive his alteration, gave him all the leisure was necessary: and the Prince having a little recover'd himself, My Lord, said he, I have done what you commanded me, and have accompanied the Queen of the Turringiens within sight of the Tents of the Enemies Camp. I could never doubt, replied Pharamond, but you had acquitted your self of that employment with a very good grace, you are too gallant to have in this enterprize been wanting in the least duty of a Cavalier, but you answer me not to what I have demanded of the beauty of Amalazontha, though in my opinion it sufficiently merits your mention of it. It would be difficult for me my Lord, replied Sunnon, to tell you what Amalazontha appear'd to me, I have found her so much above all that my imagination can fancy, as she is above all discourse I can make of her.

Speaking these words he chang'd colour several times, and appear'd to the eyes of Pharamond who took notice of him, in a condition which discover'd to him a part of the truth; scarce had he suspected it, but the eyes of the Prince, and his behaviour confirm'd it, and permitted him no longer to doubt but this misfortune was befall'n him: Being full of Wisdom and Moderation, he would not declare his thoughts before all the World for fear of displeasing him, but a little after seeing that there was none but Marcomire near the bed, and that the rest of the company were a good distance off, taking him by one hand and Prince Marcomire by the other, Is it possible, (said he so low as not to be heard by any others,) that you should have a destiny equal to ours, and that it should be equally fatal to three Brothers to love their Enemies. These words made the young Prince utterly lose his Countenance, and Marcomire having observed him as well as the King, Ah my Lord, said he, you need not doubt, but that we are not possibly more amorous of the Queen of the Cimbrians, and the Princess of the Sueves, than Sunnon is of the Queen of the Turringiens. Sunnon answered no more to this discourse than he had done to that of the King, but by his silence he as truly perswaded the King of what he had begun to believe, as if he had made an entire confession of it. No my Brother, said he to Marcomire, I doubt it not at all, and truly the beauty of Amalazontha is such that I can easily pardon Sunnon all the effect it hath produced in his Mind: "After this pardon my Lord, said Prince Sunnon in the end, I confess that my misery is such as you have imagin'd, and that none can be more passionately amorous than I am of the divine Amalazontha: had I had a design to conceal it from you it had been very difficult, for a passion like that, which hath rendred it self Mistress of my Soul, could not remain without breaking forth. But my Lord, it is of you alone I can complain in this misfortune which is befall'n me, and since you knew well that I had eyes, and a heart that was sensible, you could not be ignorant of the danger to which you expos'd me. I confess yet once more, replied Pharamond, that the danger was great for a man who was not prevented by any other passion, and much more for a Brother of Pharamond and Marcomire, but certainly I did not foresee it, and as I judge well that we cannot all be so happy as Marcomire, I contented my self with my misery with communicating it to my Brother. I do not believe my Lord, said Marcomire, that you are more unhappy than I: For though

“though the inclinations of Albifinda should be as favourable to me as I could desire, I find “no less Impediment in the Authority of the King her Father, than you do in the engage“ments of Tesamond for the revenge of her Brother. As you have caused my misfortune, said
Prince Summon to the King his Brother, You are obliged to assist me, and it is from your assis- ance that I must hope all my happiness. “I fear rather, replied Pharamond very sadly, that in“stead of serving you I obstruct your affairs, nor do I believe you have any greater Obstacle “in your love than that of being Brother of Pharamond, however it be, we will run the “same Fortune, since Fortune hath made us Companions, and we will be miserable together “by the effect of a destiny with which never any could compare.

After this he caused Prince Summon to recount to him the particulars of all that befel him, and all the conversation he had with Amalazombha, and by the discourse he made him he judged well that there were for him but few favourable inclinations in the Spirit of the Princess, though he could not judge the true cause, and that it were far from his thoughts to believe himself below'd by a Queen who came her self in person to make War against him at the head of her Armies. Having spent some longer time in this conversation, they desir'd that he would dedicate to repose that little which remain'd of that day, as well by reason of the blood he had lost and labour he had suffer'd, as to repair the preceding nights watch, great part of which he had passed on horseback, and he consented to the prayers of all his Friends, having sent to make his excuses to Constance, and charged Prince Marcomire to yield him the honours of the House till the morrow. The young Prince acquitted himself with an admirable grace, and in the company he kept with Constance, he made him find those charms in his conversation that augmented infinitely the esteem he had for him, and especially when he knew that he was not ignorant of any important particulars of the Adventures of Pharamond. He would not let his be more reserved to him, but by the agreeable recital he made charm'd for some moments that cruel grief that perplexed him.

Pharamond that night repos'd very peaceably, at least for his Body, for his Mind had few quiet minutes, the image of his strange misfortunes being continually fix'd to his remembrance. Marcomire passed some hours in a mixture of hope and fear, which confounded his imagination. And the young Summon, whose wound was more fresh, and whose Soul less accusom'd to what it began to resent, was he of the three Brothers who gave the least time of that night to sleep. But the desolate Constance scarce clos'd his eye-lids, but as the cruel remembrance of his irreparable loss incessantly afflicted his memory, he neither found nor sought repose. The recital he had heard of so many fair adventures of Pharamond, Honorius, Varanes, and Marcomire, seem'd to have drown'd for some time what his grief had of most lively and pressing: and in truth the love he had for virtue, made him find near Pharamond a sweetness capable to suspend some part of it: but in those hours wherein silence and solitude brought back to his Spirit the true Image of his misfortunes, his deplorable condition appeared in its own form, and without any cloud which might shadow the knowledge of it, so that he scarce found in all his courage, in his piety towards heaven, or in his respect to the orders of Placidia, helps against that despair, to which he was not permitted to hearken in these mournful disturbances which perplexed his Soul with so much cruelty, sending forth a thousand sighs from his oppressed breast: “What seekest thou mi“serable? said he, Or to what reservest thou thy self? Can there be yet among Mortals “any good for thee or any shadow of hope to make thee love thy life? Whither dost thou “lead thy self not to offend the orders of Heaven and to obey the commands of Placidia? Is
 “it as she hath commanded thee for the defence of the Empire and for that of thy Religion “thou preservest thy self? Or believest thou that a Religion defended by an infinite power “hath need of thy Arm to maintain? Or that the Arm of a miserable person hated both by “Heaven and Fortune, and expos'd by the forsaking of the one and persecuting of the other to “those misfortunes that render him incapable of all things, should be capable to hinder the “fall of the Empire, which the Anger of Heaven, and the Arms of all Nations which rise a“gainst it threaten with general ruine? Ah since Placidia hath given thee this counsel, “she ought to have put thee in a condition to execute it, and she ought to have restored thee
 “that courage and virtue she hath made thee lose; but as the Sister of Honorius and not as an “affectionate Princess she hath given it to the deplorable Constance: She is Sister to the Empe“rour, she is a Roman, she is passionate for the conservation of the Empire, she hath believed “that a Sword which for the time pass'd hath so well serv'd would not now be useless, but she “hath not at all considered that he who at other times carried it, is not the same Constance who
 “so happily made use of it for the glory of his Country and for his own, and she believes “without doubt that having lost all, we can live with all our courage and all our virtue, be“cause she sees her self in the Arms of Antalphe with a full repose, having lost the miserable
 “Constance:

He remained a while in these thoughts, which insensibly incens'd him against what he adored, but a little after he banished them as criminal, and regaining his natural patience, and natural moderation; But why? (said he) may not we bewail our selves without doing injustices? And why do we not accuse our misfortune without accusing the innocent and virtuous Placidia? It is not by her will that we are fallen into these miseries, it is not by her inclination that she hath espoused Autalph, though she live with him, as she hath been obliged by her virtue; nor hath she possibly appeared more content in her condition than we are in ours, though espoused to a Husband that adores her, and to a Husband neither despicable for his Birth nor Person. Let us content our selves then with what she hath done for us, and content our selves with what she hath given us, though it be nothing but tears, since it is nothing but tears she could give us; and if it be impossible for us to live and obey her, let us seek death by those ways that are permitted us, and upon those occasions wherein we may find it without offending Heaven, or the respect we owe to the commandment of Placidia. Yet know we not to what place of the earth we should yet carry the rest of our unfortunate life, we will no more see the deplorable Italy, nor the desolate City which hath given us our Birth, for alas, we shall no more there see the deplorable Constance, but instead of that beloved object, and in that pompous Court, in which we have passed so many blessed days, we shall now see nothing but the terrible mark of a barbarous fury; and in the person of Honorius, who at other times was a great Emperour, dear to Heaven and men, and an Emperour who had promised me Placidia, we shall find nothing but a Prince lost and dishonoured by his feebleness, and a Prince who hath suffered the ruine of his Country, and the loss of Placidia. We will not go into Spain, to appear there in this miserable estate, having left there so famous a memory of our actions: Nor will we stay among the Gauls, where we fought unhappily, though with sufficient glory, and sufficient good success, whilst we lost all in the unfortunate Italy. 'Tis only that virtue which I have found in the person of Pharamond, more than in all the rest of men, that can beget in me any settledness, and I would say love, if after the loss of what I have loved, I can yet love any thing. Let us seek in the interests of a man whom we judge worthy of our affection, that end of our misfortunes, so desireable and desired; and since in the abandon we have made of all things, we have no farther considerations neither for alliances nor parties, let us follow our inclinations without delay, and not other where seek what we may here find fighting for a friend, and for a quarrel full of justice. 'Twas this thought which busied him more than any other, and he sought the means to execute what he projected, without exposing himself to those reproaches he might fear.

On the morrow so soon as he was risen (for he would no longer keep his Bed) and knew that Pharamond was awakened, he went into his chamber, accompanied with Artabure, to render him the first visit; they found the Princes, and the principal Officers of the Army with him, who all retired, out of respect, when Constance approached the Bed: Pharamond having thanked them both for their visit; complain'd to Constance that he so soon left his Chamber, and testified to him, the fear he had lest his health should be prejudic'd. Constance desired to know the state of his, and blamed him no less for having so long neglected his wound, and being after seated in a Chair near the Bed-side, and Artabure near him, with Marcomire, Pharabert, Ibere, and some others, Constance, after a small silence, spoke to Pharamond in these terms, "Since in the stay I have made with you, in " a time wherein I find my self insensible of all things, I have encountred those charms
 " in your person, which have wrought their effects on my heart, and have engaged me to " those thoughts I did not believe my self longer capable of, be pleas'd, my Lord, to let " me give you this day more ample assurances than I have hitherto done, and that I a" gain tell you, that no considerations of those which might in all likelyhood give " me some scruples to serve a Prince, who hath, and may yet have great controversies
 " with the Romans, against those Princes who have been, and are possibly yet their Allies, " are capable to stop the design I have made, and in which I am entirely confirm'd. But " because there may be possibly something done for your service more advantageous, than
 " the assistance you can receive from a man who is in no condition to serve you, but with " his Sword, and since by the knowledge I have of the love you bear the Queen of the " Cimbrians, I judge that peace will be more desireable for you, than the war you can " wage against her, and that besides the ease and solace it may give your people, you may
 " much better find your repose, and possibly your entire felicity, than in these continual " occasions, to commit new offences against her you love, I have been willing to under" stand your intentions concerning it, and to demand of you, if you find it to the pur" pose, that I employ the credit which the authority of Honorius, and the power I have " had my self in the Empire, may give me amongst those Princes, who as I yet believe
 " are

“are still in alliance with the Romans, to effect a peace, and finish these affairs, if it be “possible, with an entire reconciliation between you. I know that the King of the “Sueves was not only an Ally to the Romans, but that it was for the interest of the Ro- “mans that he began this war against you. The King of the Cimbrians was conjoined by “the same interest, and I doubt not, but the Queen his Daughter, hath yet some con“sideration for the Roman Name. For the Kings of the Burgundians, the Alares, and “the Herules, since they make war only for the interest of the Queen of the Cimbri- “ans, if she and the King of the Sueves, who after her is the most interested, will give “their consent to the Peace, the other will have no great desire to be obstinate in the “war, and will possibly with no small difficulty continue it, being disunited from the “Sueves and the Cimbrians. No person better than my self, who since the death of Stu- “licon, have had the most considerable employs of the Empire, and who was destined to “the glory to espouse the Sister of the Emperour, can interpose in this negotiation, and I “doubt not but the King of the Sueves, who without doubt is the most incens’d, and the “most interested, will have some consideration for my name, and for my mediation. It
 “I am successful in the design to procure peace for you, I shall find more happiness for “my self in that good success, than I expected in all the remainder of my life, and if I la“bour in vain, as that may happen, either out of the obstinacy of the King of the Sueves, “or those other obstacles which the Lovers of Rosamond may cause, I shall be justified as “much as I can desire against the accusation may be made, that I have embraced your “Party against the Allies of the Romans, by making the whole world know, those Al“lies of the Romans, despised my mediation, whilst those who were less obliged, acted “with me with more candour and consideration.

Constance spake in this manner, and Pharamond having hearkened to his discourse, with all the marks of a tender resentment, made him know by his countenance, a part of what he had to speak, Your goodness, said he, puts me in a confusion, which leaves me not in an en- tire liberty to express my self, but it draws me at present out of a great trouble, by offering me a favour, which I can better accept, than that you offered me yesterday, and wherein you have confirmed me, in the beginning of your discourse. Doubt not my Lord, but I affectionately desire peace, not only because it is Rosamond makes war against me, but because so many thousands of innocent persons are enveloped in my disgrace; and so many lives, more happy than my own, expos’d to the daily danger that threatens them, not for the preservation of their liberties, but for my particular quarrel: It is this that makes me lament my misery with tears of blood, and renders more odious to my self this unfortunate life, to the defence of which, so many others have been sacrificed, than it is possibly to those enemies who come with so many forces to assault it. Be pleas’d therefore to believe, that I not only desire peace by your mediation, since you have the goodness to offer it, but without fearing what judgments might be made in the world, I would demand it of Rosamond, as of the Sovereign Mistress of a life which I have often offered her, for the reparation of those injuries I have done her; I will demand it of the Queen of the Turingiens, with pardon for the death of her Brother; I will demand it of the King of the Sueves, whose Son I have slain, defending my own life which he assaulted; and I will demand it of Gondioch, whose friendship I have innocently offended, and who with more indignity than all the rest, hath armed himself for my ruine; I will receive it likewise as a grace from all the Lovers of Rosamond, and I should be content that our pretensions might be ended by the hazard of our lives alone, rather than so many thousands more should be offered up as Victims to our interests: But my Lord, I know too well I shall demand it in vain, from enemies obstinate to my ruine, and from Rivals who at the price of my head, hope the possession of Rosamond. If any consideration can make them hearken to this proposition, it will without doubt be what they owe to you, and by the beginning they cannot so well hope the success of this war, but they may as well as we fear the event; I am content likewise, they should have all the advantages they could desire, only the possession of Rosamond, which I will dispute with them till death: Nor is there any reparations which I would not willingly make by your orders, to the King of the Sueves, to the Queen of the Turingiens, and to the new King of the Basternes, for the offences I have committed against them. “In truth, (said the great Constance to the King of the Frank, when he had done speaking) “I did “expect no less from your virtue, than what I find true in this condescension, and I now “know better than I have done, the difference between a courage truly great, and truly “generous, and those who have only the appearances of grandeur and generosity. You “make it more appear in desiring peace, and in speaking as you do, than your enemies “have testified it in the ardour with which they have made war against you, and you have “this advantage, that it will never be believed, that it was the fear of their Arms which “hath

“hath made you submit to conditions you voluntarily impose on your self. I will try
 “my fortune, since you permit it, and if you think it good, I will this day send Valerius “to the Queen of the Cimbrians, and to the King of the Sueves, to incline them to “hearken to the propositions I have to make them, and to demand of them a cessation of “Arms for three days, and to entertain them in their Camp, whither I will go seek them till “that time be expired. You may act as you please, (replied the King of the Franks) since not only both our enemies and we, ought to hold it to be an infinite honour, to have the great Constance the Arbitrator of our differences; but that on my side, there is no Law which you may not impose with Sovereign Authority, save only, (added he with a sigh) to make me renounce Rosamond, and I believe you have not so much cruelty as to oblige me to it.

They were in these terms, when there came one to tell the King, that a Trumpeter from Prince Balamir, was arrived in the Camp, who demanded to speak with him on the behalf of his Master. This news made them turn pale, who remembered themselves of the adventure of Prince Viridomar, and the fear they had of a like began to excite a murmur in the Chamber. Pharamond, without amusing himself to examine their thoughts, demanded permission of Constance to let the Trumpeter come in, and Constance having answered that civility as it deserved, he was a little after led into the Chamber. All that were there approached him, so soon as he appeared, and assembled about him when he drew nigh the Bed. He accosted the King like a man who well understood his business, and the King having demanded of him the cause that brought him to his Camp, Mighty Sir, said he, I come on the behalf of my Prince, to demand of your Majesty permission, to inform my self, if a Knight who was bred up with him, whom he dearly loved, and whose loss he infinitely laments, were either dead, or prisoner, in the fight you fought yesterday, and to seek him amongst both if you please to grant that liberty. “I would do something more “difficult for the satisfaction of Prince Balamir, replied Pharamond, and though by his “valour and merit, he be the most dreaded of my Enemies and my Rivals, I will not “lose the opportunity to render what we owe to virtue in the very persons of our En“emies.

After this, he demanded the name of the man whom he sought, and in what place he believed him to have been ranged. He is called Telanor, replied the Trumpeter, and he fought yesterday near the Prince, when his Horse was thrown down, and maintained a great Combat to remove him. The King immediately commanded an Officer to go with the Trumpeter, and seek either amongst the Dead or the Prisoners, for the person he demanded, and to bring him with him if he found him living, and in a condition to come, and this Officer having obeyed him with infinite diligence, whilst the King entertain'd himself with Constance, on the design he had to employ himself for Peace, a little after was seen return into the Chamber, with the Trumpeter and the Prisoner he sought, who was a man of a noble aspect, and who by all appearances, seem'd of no small merit. He saluted the King in person, having been accustomed to converse with great Princes, and the King being informed of the particulars of his taking, by those which took him, and of the usage he had receiv'd, and having understood from him, that he had been taken by the Officers of the Sicambres, after the Combat which was fought in the Valley, and in which he was engaged under his Horse, which was slain under him, from whence he could not recover himself, but by the assistance of those which took him, and from whom he had received very courteous usage. You had received yet better, (said Pharamond, having peaceably hearkened to him) if you had made you self known: for besides what is due to your merit, of which I judge by sufficient great appearances; the great interest which Prince Balamir takes in you, had obliged us to consider you particularly, and to do what I do at present, which is to restore you your liberty, and power to return to your Prince when you please.

Telanor received this favour of Pharamond, with great marks of acknowledgment and respect, and breaking silence, with a behaviour full of assurance and modesty together, My Lord, said he, though I have not merited the care Prince Balamir takes of me, I assure my self, he will remember your carriage towards him, in the person of one who is his, and that if he finds the occasion to acknowledge it, he will certainly and gladly do it. “He doth but “too well all he doth, (replied the King of the Franks) and it is by that, he gives “me more cause to fear, than he would do with all the power of the King his Father, “were it at his disposal; he is but too valiant, too generous, too amiable, and too great
 “in all things, but with all these great qualities, you cannot justify him of a fault he “makes known to all the world, and of which I ought particularly to accuse him, be“cause I believe he is not fallen into it but for my misery; for in fine, though the fair “actions

actions which have given him so much repute, are pass'd into Crimes. I dissent from ours, we have however heard speak by the voice of Renown though very cautiously; and as we have understood something of his great exploits of War, we have not been ignorant that he bore love to a fair Princess, and a Love which hath made sufficient noise and caus'd no new alterations to him. It seems to me that in whatever manner the beauty of Ros-mond may excuse this change, yet that it is a blot in a fair life like his, and I believe he had not been capable of it if his inconstancy had not been destin'd to augment my misfortune, by the encounter of so great a Rival.

It seem'd to Pharamond and those about him, that these words had begot in Telanor some profound thoughts, and after the King had done, lifting up his eyes from the earth, where he had held them fix'd during his discourse, "It is not however just, said he, to condemn men upon an uncertain rumour, which may prejudice the truth; and I am much astonish'd my Lord, that this same renown which hath made you understand some part of the adventures of Balsmir, hath not given you a knowledge of the latter, which without doubt are no less important, and by the knowledge of which he would possibly be justified of the infidelity with which you reproach him. I have reason to speak in his justification, since I can do it more than any man in the world, and that there is none to whom like my self all the Actions of his life and all his most secret thoughts have been known. "If it be so, said Pharamond, you are yet for some hours a prisoner, and for the price of that liberty which I give you, I demand of you not only the knowledge of what we are ignorant of in the life of Prince Balsmir, but the entire recital of his adventures, at least of those which you are not oblig'd to keep secret, for those we have no right over you to oblige you to violate your fidelity. "In all that I can relate to you of the life of Prince Balsmir, replied Telanor, there is nothing which at present requires to be kept secret, the things have made all the noise they can make in those places where it had been possibly the most important to conceal them: But the discourse you demand of me is not so short but that you must of force afford it some hours audience, and I have need to employ some time to recal to my memory the particulars, which time and accidents that have since fall'n out may have made me forget. "You shall then if you please; spend this day with us, replied Pharamond, and the Trumpeter may return to the Prince his Master, and telling him the cause of your stay assure him you shall be with him tomorrow. Pardon me added he with a sigh, if I offer you some violence but you are so sufficiently oblig'd to justify Balsmir in the spirit of the great Constance whom you see as well as in mine, that you ought not to have any concern for the trouble we give you. I shall never have any to obey you my Lord, replied Telanor, and besides that I thus pay my ransom easily, I take so much pleasure to speak of a Master who is dearer to me than my life, that you will possibly have some difficulty to make me silent when I have begun.

After these words he demanded permission to speak to the Trumpeter who return'd, and the King commanded Cleomer to take care of him as of a person of merit and quality, and to bring him back after Constance had din'd, who desir'd as well as he to take part in the Adventures of Balsmir. Constance desir'd that Valerius should depart with the Trumpeter, who took charge to conduct him to the Queen of the Cimbrians; and Valerius being a man of spirit and capable of a commission more difficult than that he gave him. Constance explain'd himself to him in few words concerning what he had to say to that Queen, and to the King of the Sueves, and permitted him to part, with assurance that he would acquit himself well of this employ. A little after this Dinner was served in to Constance, at which the Princes and many other illustrious personages bore him company, the wound of Pharamond obliging him to keep his bed for one day or two though he did it with infinite restance.

The End of the First Book of the Fourth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

After dinner Constance return'd into the Chamber of Pharamond, and with him Marcomire, Artabure, Samon, Pharabert, Genebaud, Merovee, Antenor and Charamont: All these Princes and illustrious men being touch'd with an equal curiosity to hear the Adventures of Balamir: Telanor having testified that he was not at all troubled to have so great a number of Auditors at the recital to which he was engag'd. Cleomer led him into the Chamber a little after this fair Company was entred, and after they were all rang'd within the rail, Telanor by the command of Pharamond took a seat near Charamont, and without permitting himself to be importun'd for the discourse he was to make, seeing that they lent him a quiet and attentive audience, he began in these terms addressing his speech to King Pharamond, though the King would a long time have denyed it, to have granted that honour to Constance.

The History of Balamir,

IT is not without reason, my Lord, that you have been struck with admiration, that a virtue like that of Balamir could be guilty of infidelity, and though among persons little scrupulous inndelity in Love hath not been condemn'd with so much rigour as that which is practis'd in friendship, in which they hold honour to be more strongly engag'd; it seems to me that a noble Soul ought to be equally faithful as well in the one as the other, and though the prodigious beauty of the Queen of the Cimbrians may deprive any Man of the knowledge of reason, and the remembrance of his duty, yet if Prince Balamir had nothing to alledge in his justification, I should not believe him sufficiently justified in the opinion of virtuous personages. It is not necessary that I extend my discourse to the Original of the Huns, a people fierce and warlike, who in these last Ages have by their Arms struck a terrour into a great part of the world. You know that their original progress was out of Scythia, as well out of that part which is in Europe as out of that part which extends it self into Asia beyond the Mountain Imaus, and I believe you are not ignorant that the Grandfather of my Master a Prince descended of the Royal Family of the Scythians, who from the first Foundations of that Monarchy numbred an hundred Kings among his Ancestors, not being satisfied with his part nor fortune quitted his Native Countrey, with an Army composed of valiant souldiers, and forgetting the ancient Scruple of the Scythians, who by a religious custom never made War but for the defence of their Limits, bent his mind to conquest, entred the Territories of his Neighbours, and by many great Battels made himself before his death Lord of Dacia and Sarmatia. The Father of my Prince named his Son Balamir or Balamber, for they gave him both those names who succeeded him very young and inheriting his Crown inherited no less his warlike inclinations: He found likewise the extent of the dominion obtained for him too little for his Ambition, and resolving farther to pursue his Father's Conquests, carried his Arms into Mesia and Macedonia, and into the Provinces bordering on the Palus Meotis. A part of this Country which by a name newly imposed on it was called Scandia or Scandinavia, was at present possessed by the Goths, who under the Reign of Hermaneric and Fridigerne, had absolutely established themselves, selves, and under that of Atharic became peaceable Masters thereof. It was against these that the King of the Huns made War, after having subdued Mesia and many other neighbouring Nations, finding a facility so much the greater because the Emperour Theodosius was at present employed against Eugenes and Arbogastus, and afterwards against Maximus in those Wars which gave him neither time nor means to provide against others. Balamber making use of this advantage and having pretences sufficiently great and possibly just reasons to make War against Atharic, entred his Dominions with a mighty Army. This War hath been too well known in the whole world for me to believe it necessary to recount its particulars, and it will be possibly sufficient to tell you that at the beginning many Battels were fought between these two, in which Fortune was various, but in the end the King of the Huns made her incline to his Party, and having gained two Battels against Atharic, he rendred himself Master of the greatest part of the Cities which obeyed him, and finally expelled him entirely from his Kingdom.

The unhappy and despoiled Atharic possessing no longer one foot of ground, nor having any more Forces to oppose the Vanquisher, retired to the Emperour Theodosius, who at present returned triumphant from his Expeditions; and though he had formerly waged war against him, he made no difficulty to seek for refuge in his Court, and go in person to demand assistance against the Usurper of his under his power. He was likewise in such manner pressed in his retreat, that he had not the means to lead with him the Queen his Spouse, who had at that time newly brought forth an Infant into the world, and who not able to follow him in that estate, remained in a miserable condition, which three days after surrendered to the discretion of the Conquerour. All the world have known with what humanity the infortunate Atharic was received by the great Theodosius, who treated him in his misfortune, not like an exiled King, but like a Prince his equal whom his ill fortune had nothing deprived of his dignity, and not only content to promise him aid against an Enemy whose power he was bound by his proper interest to repress, he prepared truly to restore him to the Throne he had lost; when he fell ill and in few days dyed at Constantinople, as all the world have known. The Emperour caused magnificent Obsequies to be celebrated as for a great King, and having converted the design of assisting him into that of revenging his quarrel, and making war against a man whose greatness was not only suspected by him, but who advanced himself in part on the ruines of the Empire, raised a great Army to fall upon him. In short, our King had reason to have feared so ill effects, if his good fortune had not diverted them by the death of Theodosius himself, who survived Atharic but a very little time, and left his Empire to Children much different from their Father, who (through their tenderness permitting themselves to be governed by Strangers little affected and more especially by Ruffinus, who through the simplicity of Arcadius remained absolute Master in the Orient) gave him but too much opportunity, not only to establish himself in his Conquests but to pursue them into other Provinces. The Widow of Atharic with a little Daughter which she had then brought into the world, lost almost at the same time her Crown, her Spouse, and her Liberty: The King of the Huns did in truth neither restore her to her Husband nor her Crown, but he treated her in the best manner she could hope from a generous Prince, preserved her entire dignity, left her wherewith to maintain her House in an honourable estate, and in fine, used her in all things in such manner, that that Princess who naturally had her Spirit sweet; an admirable patience, and a great devotion towards Heaven, instead of going into the Courts of other Princes to demand assistance or revenge, contented her self to live peaceably in that of her Vanquisher, offering to Heaven as it is said all the losses she had made with an admirable resignation, and tying her self in a very particular friendship with the Queen, Spouse of our King, a Princess of an excellent virtue; and who respecting hers in her misfortune, comforted her with all sorts of good Offices, and marks of her affection. She had already since her Espousals born to the King two Sons, and at this time she bore him a Daughter: The eldest of the Sons was named Mundisic, a name so respected in the Family of our Kings that they have almost continually added it to theirs; the second receiving that of his Father was called Balampir, and the Princess was named Theodolinda.

Our King seeing himself peaceably settled in a very ample Dominion, though he aspired at greater Conquests, and not fearing any thing of the Goths who chusing rather to quit their Countries than live under the power of the Huns were gone to seek other habitations, resolved to dedicate some time to the sweetneses of Peace and the Education of his Family. In truth he found matter to employ himself contentedly though with inequality: And to let you know in few words what was and what at present is the Family of the King of the Huns, I will tell you that the Prince Mundisic is a Prince of a noble Air, of a Majestick Port, and who hath nothing in all his person which doth not denote his Dignity, his inclinations are great and exalted, his thoughts vast, and his ambition without bounds; his Spirit is fierce, possibly to an excess, and hardly doth he suffer a resistance in any thing he enterprizes; and especially believing that all things are his due, he is led by his passion rather than reason in some enterprizes; he hath his Soul warlike, his Courage firm, and fearless in the greatest dangers, and it might truly be said, that he had indeed a gallant Spirit if it were somewhat milder than it is.

For Prince Balamir, I ought to make you a more ample description, as well because it is his particular History I recount you, as because there is certainly in all his person, both for mind and body, something extraordinary; for his aspect, it is not only nobler than that of the Prince his Brother, or at least much more taking, but it is certain that there are few men in the world who for noble deportment can equal him, and before I entered into this Chamber I believed there had not any surpassed him; his Stature is admirably complete, the straightest, the freest, and most exact that can be seen, his visage is brown, and his hair very black, but his countenance is the most amiable that can be imagined, and his hair being very long, and ringed in great curls, accompanies it admirably well; all his action is noble, but without affectation, and all the air of his person hath a particular grace.

I saw him yesterday under his Arms, (said the King of the Franks to Telanor, interrupting him) and I could not but discern the beauty of his Stature, and his excellent grace on Horseback, but I know persons that have seen him in another state, (pursued he, beholding Marcomire and Cleomer) and who describe him such as you represent him.

That which appears not to the eye, replied Telanor, is without doubt more fair than what is seen, nor ever was Soul more truly noble than that of Balamir, nor better endowed with all inclinations to excellent virtues; for the greatness of his Courage nothing can surpass it, nor is there danger, or misery, or any effect of good or ill fortune, that can shake his Constancy, nor move him from his ordinary temper; he is naturally very fierce, but his fierceness appears not but at those times when he must necessarily practise it; in all others, nothing can be found more sweet or tractable than he. All his inclinations carry him to good, and to be a mortal enemy to tyranny and injustice. He hath a greater knowledge of Learning than can be believ'd of a Prince born in a Nation which hath truly something of barbarous; and for the exercises of his body, he is so grand a Master, that few Knights in the world can acquit themselves either on Foot or Horseback like to him. He hath an admirable vigour, a prodigious force, and there are few persons which possess so great military virtues. I could say more, but it will not possibly be convenient to enlarge my self on these praises before men who are above all praises that can be given, and who will possibly attribute to my passion a part of those I believe with justice to give my Prince.

The Princess Theodolinda might well merit a particular Elogium, and though the beauty of her body hath few parallels in the world, yet I may say with truth, that that of her mind is not at all inferiour; and I would enlarge my self farther, if I did not know my Lord, (said Telanor, addressing himself to Constance) that you have seen her at Rome; and though I did not believe, that you knew all that I could represent to you, yet at present I have little to say of her in my recital, but it is upon the adventures of another Beauty, to whom Heaven hath possibly given advantages over hers, that I must extend my self more particularly.

It is true, said Constance to Telanor, that I have seen the Princess Theodolinda at Rome, where she was companion in the misfortunes of Placidia, and I have conversed with her so particularly as to bear testimony of her merit, and to assure those to whom it is least known, that for beauties of body and mind, she is one of the most excellent persons in the world: I know likewise of her affairs more than you think, and I can (continued he, turning himself towards Pharamond) inform you something when you desire it.

You may believe, continued Telanor, that our King seeing himself Father of so fair a Family, forgot nothing which he deem'd necessary for their Education; and I will tell you, that he contributed all he ought, and that for that of the two Princes, he caused Strangers to be sent for from those Nations where men are at present most polite, whom he employed with all the success he could desire; it was however with some inequality, and they would willingly have found in the spirit of Mundisic the same sweetness and docility they discerned in that of Balamir; the difference was easily observed in their very youth, but that excessive fierceness was more pardonable in a man born to command; as they knew Mundisic to be, and they judged, that the sweetness of Ealamir agreed better with his fortune, which, by the order of succession, ought to be much different from that of his elder Brother; they therefore began to love him so soon as they began to know him, and besides the advantages he had receiv'd from nature, to gain the hearts of all by the grace of his person, that of his carriage soon attracted the affections of all the world. But it was not only those Masters the King gave him, which laboured to form in him an excellent person, he had soon another, which contributed possibly no less than all the instructions they had given him.

The Queen of the Goths, Widow to Atharvic, who, as I have told you, sacrificing to Heaven by her piety all the prejudice she might have against him who had despoiled her Husband of his Dominions, or preferring a repose, to a tumultuous life, which she must have pass'd, in seeking an assistance, or revenge, which it would have been difficult for her to have found against a power like that in which the King of the Huns was at present established, had reduced her self to a private life, because it was full of quiet; and contenting her self with her condition, by the conformity she found in it with her inclinations sweet and peaceable, had lived without murmuring, either in the Court of our King, where the Queen his Spouse stay'd her as much as it was possible by demonstrations of affection, against which she could not defend her self; or in those houses the King had left her, with revenues much greater than was necessary to maintain her according to her humour, and indeed considerable enough to permit her to live without care, and in port most magnificent. It was for these particular reasons that she had lived for seven or eight years in a solitude more conformable to her fortune and temper than a Royal Court, and which she had employed, as it was said, in the Education of a Daughter, the only issue Heaven had left her of her marriage, and on whom she had fixed all her hopes, and all her affection. It was believ'd, that if she had followed her own desire, she had ended her days in this manner, but she could not resist the prayers and affection of the Queen of the Huns, who loving her dearly, and reverencing her for her admirable virtue, left her not at quiet till she had obliged her to return to the Court to stay with her: she was soon persuaded by so virtuous a Princess, and return'd to the Court in a time wherein it was truly great and magnificent, and like that of a puissant Monarch. But it may be said with truth, that it received its greatest splendour by the arrival of the young Princess Hunnimonda, who presently appeared as a Star sufficient to eclipse all other brightness; she was at present aged about twelve years, Balamir fifteen or sixteen, and Mundisc two more, and Theodolinda was a year elder than she, and in that age had already made her beauties be admired, when they were a little eclipsed by the arrival of the Princess Hunnimonda.

Is it possible, (said Constance to Telanor, interrupting him) that the beauty of the Princess Hunnimonda should exceed that of the Princess Theodolinda? Or is it not some particular interest you have taken, which makes you make this judgment? It belonged not to me possibly to judge, reply'd Telanor, nor had I done it, if the general opinion had not created mine; but without deciding particularly the merit of these two Beauties, I will tell you, that in our Court, all those who have travelled most, do concur, that there is nothing in the world can equal the beauty of Hunnimonda; and I should likewise be of this belief, if I had never seen Queen Rosamond, I can yet very hardly believe, that in all her person, she hath any charm greater than Hunnimonda, though she hath a greater Splendour; nor that she is more capable to insinuate a tender passion into a Soul, though possibly she may surprisè, and dazzle more.

I will not make you a particular description of this Beauty, distrusting the weakness of my abilities to represent her to you as she appeared to me; nor will I speak to you of the whiteness of her complexion, which scarce hath its parallel in the world; of the beauty of her eyes, which may cause to dye with love all those that see them; of that of her lips, of her hair, of her admirable shape, of a grace spread through all her person, in which there seems to be something of Divine and Supernatural. But without making this particular description, I will tell you only, that Hunnimonda is in every part made to make her self be beloved, or to speak better, to snatch the hearts of the fiercest persons with a sweet violence, against which it is impossible for them to defend themselves. But the charms of her Body have no advantage over those of her mind, though by her constitution there appears in all her person more languor than vivacity; and if ever any Soul appeared fair by marks of piety, wisdom, greatness of courage, and all other excellent virtues, a too confirmed truth may affirm that of Hunnimonda to be so. It is likewise most certain, that never any person was so generally, and so truly beloved; and though she contributed not to that love all the world bore her, but by the advantages she could not conceal, and by a sweetness so insinuating and engaging, that it was impossible for any to de-send himself: and though she had nothing of affected or flattering, yet it seemed that there was somewhat in her person, which attracted with a supernatural force, and which men followed by the effect of a power that none could resist. It is thus, (said Artabure to Constance) that I should describe her, and she is absolutely such as Hunnimonda presents herself to my thoughts, by the discourse I hear.

All these wonders, continued Telanor, do not at present appear equally in this young Princess, but her beauty, though it was not yet arrived at a perfection which years have since given it, charm'd and surpris'd all the Court, so soon as it appear'd, and after-time hath but too much discovered the rest. There were few young men, among those whom merit or quality rendred considerable to the Court, which at this sight did not resent a part of that effect it could produce, though they dissembled it out of the respect they bore the Queen of the Goths, to whom, by the will of the King, and the particular diligence of the Queen, the same honours were rendred, as in her Royal Fortune; but he who appear'd so, and who without doubt was the most lively touch'd, was the Prince Balamir, though he had yet scarce arriv'd at his sixteenth year; and if the sight of Hunnimonda made him presently feel, what hitherto he had not known, in a little time his familiarity and conversation begat in him as much love, as a person of the age of Hunnimonda could create, and a Youth of the age of Balamir was capable to receive. The first impressiion which seiz'd his heart, establish'd it self with sweetness, and his evil at first seem'd pleasing to him, though it troubled the repose in which he had before lived, interrupted his sleep, and gave him no small trouble; hitherto his thoughts had been intent on nothing but War, nor had he flattered himself with other hopes, than those to acquire fame, and to render himself renowned among great men, by the effects of that courage he knew in himself, though he had yet found no occasion to make proof of it. But so soon as his heart had submitted to love, that imperious passion would entirely possess him, without leaving place to other thoughts, than those which it inspir'd, and that desire which he before had in his tender age, to go to the Wars, and seek occasions to signalize himself, could not enlarge it self in him, at least, it began to languish, and to stir him up much less than it had formerly done. Every instant of the sight and conversation of Hunnimonda, gave new additions to his love, as every moment seem'd to add to her beauty, and he seeing her every day, and almost every moment, it was every moment his passion felt a redoublement. He had the liberty to see her when he pleas'd, at least when she was to be seen, and besides that the Queen her Mother us'd great circumspectiions, that she might not give any cause of complaint to the Son of a King, whom her ill fortune had rendred Master of her destiny, that affection which all the world had for Prince Balamir, was very particular to her self, and besides what she ought to his fair qualities, which rendred him amiable, the obligations she believed to have to the affection of the Queen her Mother, to whom she was absolutely dear, obtain'd with her greater complacencies, than possibly she had for any other consideration.

Hunnimonda her self, by her natural inclination, and by the knowledge she had of his merit, beheld him with delight, and by a manner of acting with him full of sweetness and freedom, engaged him more and more, and in the end, reduc'd him to a condition, that rendred him incapable any more to think of the return of his liberty. This great change which he suffered in his intentions, caused the same in his humour, and in his manner of living, and as it is very ordinary in like occasions, he began to become melancholy, to seek retirement, or at least, not to love any company, in which he could not see Hunnimonda. I had been plac'd with him from his Infancy, and being of an age little different from his, and he knowing in me a strong passion for his service, had honoured me with his particular affection, and a greater confidence than he had entrusted any persons about him with, so that I may truly say, I was the first to whom he gave the knowledge of what he had in his heart. With this, though the tender age of Hunnimonda might give him more boldness, and more liberty with her, than he durst have taken in riper years, and though in that, wherein she at present was, discretion is not ordinarily so great, as to impose silence to a passion so violent as his already was, yet most certain it is, he durst not determine to discover his love to this young Princess, and that he for a long time made his eyes and sighs speak, before he open'd his mouth, to make her know, what her beauty made him suffer: Not but that he gave very particular testimonies of it upon all opportunities which offer'd, or that in all those little diligences which love can inspire, he did not appear what that which he truly was. But in fine, he durst not publicly declare what he resent'd, though he felt nothing but what was full of innocence and virtue, but his love had imprinted in him, a respect which rendred him timid, and made him fear to displeas the Princess he adored. The

The beauteous Hunnimonda, who was not yet of an age ripe enough, to make these observations she might have done in another, and who, by a Mother wholly fix'd to piety, and to a solid virtue, had been educated in a manner, that might for a long time make her ignorant of all those things, which might give the least knowledge of love, perceived not any thing which the heart of the Prince suffered for her, but following the inclination she had, to esteem him for his virtue, and for his fair and obliging carriage towards the Queen her Mother, and towards her, gave him with infinite sincerity, many marks of her affection; nor made she any difficulty to let him know, the precedence he had in her esteem before Prince Mundisc. Balamir considered with infinite joy this beginning of his hapiness, yet he was not able to rest satisfied with it, but as he had wholly given up his heart, so he would have that of Hunnimonda, and fixed all his thoughts to the desire to win her, without daring to demand, or making her know what he desired. He hazarded however one day more than he had ever before done, and open'd his soul in part before the Queen her Mother, whom he met happily at that time, to advance his affairs much more than he durst have expected.

He was in her Chamber seated near the Princess, and the Queen was at some distance from them, busied about some little affair, in which, the presence of Balamir, whom she daily saw, and with whom she liv'd very freely, hindered her not from employing her self, when on a sudden Hunnimonda, who for some time had observ'd him very pensive, and much more addicted to melancholy, than naturally he was, observing in his eyes all the signs of a profound sadness, or rather, of a lively and violent grief, by the excellency of her nature, and the esteem she had for him, interressing her self already truly for him with much affection, demanded the cause of it. The young Prince answered her not at first, but by a sigh drawn from the bottom of his heart, and a passionate look; but in the end, being importun'd by the Princess, whose desire was augmented by his behaviour, I know not, said he, *by what marks you could know the grief with which my heart is oppress'd, nor had I any design to declare it this day to you, but in truth it is so violent, that it is impossible for me to dissemble it, and very difficult to support it. I know well, that some grief afflicts you, said the Princess, but I would know the cause, if you have no cause to conceal it, and I shall then do what is possible for me to comfort it. The cause is not new, said the Prince, but I confess, that I have not for the time past felt it as I now do, but it causeth such an effect upon my spirit, that it is difficult for me in my whole life to find any consolation, if it come not from you. My grief, since you command me to tell it, comes only from a fear, which perplexes my spirit, and all the fear that can afflict me, is the only fear I have, that I shall be hated by you. By me, (said Hunnimonda, with an aspect which sufficiently denoted her surprize) and what marks have you received of my hatred? and what cause have you given me to hate you? I think I have given you none, replied my Prince, neither by my actions nor by my intentions, and I dare believe, I never had any thought which you could condemn, but I fear lest my Birth should render me odious to you; and since I must speak the truth to obey you, whatever glory may accrue to me, by being born of an Illustrious, and of a King considerable to the world, I would I had been born of any other man in the world, than of him who possesses your Kingdom, and who hath deprived you of a Crown that belongs to you.*

The Prince pronounced these words with so many marks of grief, that the young Princess was touch'd, but believing that this discourse pass'd the reach of her age and capacity, and that it was not for her to decide those Sentiments she ought to have by herself of a King that had usurped her Crown; she beheld the Queen her Mother, as if she had wish'd it; trusting in her discretion, made no difficulty to hazard the proofs of it, while she might now do, and made her judge by her countenance, that she left her in a liberty to speak her own thoughts. Hunnimonda thought some moments on what she should say, and in the end breaking silence with a behaviour full of sweetness, and with a Majesty which surpass'd her present age; *You have so little part, said she, in the misfortunes of our House, that we can neither accuse you nor hate you without too great injustice, and since the Queen my Mother testifies no resentment against you, you need not fear any from a person, all whose thoughts ought to be, and always shall be conformable to hers. I approve the answer of Hunnimonda, (said the Queen, internixing her self in their discourse) and I will add, that we not only regard you as a Prince most innocent of our misfortunes, but that by the particular obligations which we have for you, and the great qualities of your person, you ought to expect from us thoughts wholly contrary to those you fear.*

These words of the Mother and the Daughter touch'd the Prince with a joy he could not at all dissensible, and turning to the Queen in great haste he took one of her hands kissing it of force, and bending one of his knees whatever endeavours she used to hinder him; You render me a life Madam, said he, by this effect of your goodness and from an extremity of grief you make me pass to such an extremity of joy that I cannot express. Would to God, (continued he rising up by the command of the Queen, who would not suffer him a moment in that posture) that it were possible for me to make you see both the one and the other resentments which I have in my heart, and that at the price of my blood and my life, I could offer the Princess Hunnimonda some reparation of those losses she hath suffered by the Arms of the King my Father. If I were in the place of Mundisic, I could hope to present her one day with the Crown of the Goths, that of the Huns, and all that birth, Arms and Fortune have granted to our house, but since the order of birth leaves me not this power: permit me to hope Madam, (continued he speaking to the Queen,) that if by any Valour which I may inherit from my Ancestors, or by some assistance of Fortune which sometimes favours Courage and good intentions, I may be rais'd to a degree equal to that of my elder Brother, and see my self possessor of a Crown worthy to be offered to the Princess Hunnimonda, you will permit me to lay it at her feet, and present her with a heart which I have dedicated to her, and which I will preserve hers to my Tomb, though I should see my self so unhappy as to see her despise the gift I make her.

The Prince pronounced these words with a behaviour so passionate, that neither the Mother nor the Daughter could doubt of the sincerity of his intentions, nor find any thing too hardy in the declaration he made in a manner so noble and obliging; the Princess however blind and fix'd her eyes on the ground: But the Queen having dedicated some time to the admiration which this discourse had caused, broke silence, and beholding Balamir with a countenance which could not make him fear any thing; Certainly, said she, nothing could be more obliging nor more generous than what you now speak, in a time wherein the ill fortune of Hunnimonda should not draw the like declarations from a Prince like Balamir, but as instead of complaining at your discourse she hath all the reason in the world to praise your intention, neither she nor I ought to abuse you, nor permit that in a Youth and in an estate which leaves you not at your own disposal, you should engage in a design which would not be approved by the King your Father and which may ruine your fortune. See that which Hunnimonda can answer you and I am content to add to testify my acknowledgment and follow my inclination, that if Hunnimonda possessed the Crown of her Father which appertain'd to her, if the fortune of War and the Will of Heaven had not deprived our House of it, I would not that she should value the default of a Crown before the person of Balamir, but prefer him without a Crown before all the Princes that either wear one or may wear one.

At these words of the Queen the transported Prince had once more cast himself at her feet if she had not oppos'd it by all her Authority, and scarce finding in the pleasing trouble of his Spirit, words able to express himself in the disorder he felt and what he thought, Ab Madam, said he, since by a grace to which I dare not aspire and the precious marks of an esteem I have never merited, you render me to day the most glorious and fortunate of all men, in the name of the Gods, trouble not that glory and that fortune by a consideration which ought not to be able to obstruct it. The King my Father will not be an enemy to my happiness, in a marriage wherein all the glory and all the advantage is for us; and though I should be so unhappy as to fear he would not be favourable to me, notwithstanding the respect I owe to him, and which I would preserve to my Tomb in things possible for me; I am born with a heart free and with a heart that shall never acknowledge other Empire than that of Hunnimonda. You consider not, said the Queen sighing, that Hunnimonda is yet an Infant, and that you make her understand things of which neither her Age nor possibly yours are yet too capable; in another more ripe you may change design. “When this shall happen, replied the young Prince very coldly, I shall be neither worthy of her esteem nor remembrance, but if that never arrives, forbid me not from hoping I shall have some part both in the one and the other, and permit me in the mean time to seek occasions to put my self in an estate not to abuse your generosity nor offer a Prince without a Crown to a Princess, whose fortune ought not to be bounded to the youngest Son of the King of the Huns.

He had said more, and the discourse had extended farther, if the Queen had not been advertised that the Queen of the Huns was coming towards her Chamber to visit her, so that all the time she had was to tell him as she rise to go meet the Queen his Mother; “You merit more than you demand, and I would not that Hunnimonda should be so ingrateful to your good will. It was thus that by the favourable accident of that delight which the Queen of the Goths took in the conversation of Balamir and Hunnimonda, fortune seem'd willing to do for him more in one day than he could without doubt have done by other ways in many whole years; and Hunnimonda was of that humour that though to the esteem she had had for him, she had joyned a true and strong affection, it is certain that she had never given the least mark of it without the advice nor without the orders of the Queen her Mother, whilst having heard her that day explain her self so favourably for him, and knowing by all kind of marks that this design was not disagreeable, she oppos'd not at all as she had else without doubt done, that inclination which the merit of this young Prince might give her for him, but suffered the proofs in another manner than she had suffered them, if they had been less approved.

So happy a beginning began in my Prince the most acceptable hopes with which he could flatter himself, and not willing to neglect his fortune whilst it was favourable to him, the Evening of that same day knowing the tender affection the Queen his Mother had for him, for the Queen of the Goths and Hunnimonda, and the great assistance he might receive not only with the Queen of the Goths, but with the King himself, over whose disposition she had a great power, he demanded a particular audience of her, and seeing himself alone with her in the Closet, having cast himself at her feet and done many other Actions which let her sufficiently know the passion that made him speak, he discover'd to her the love he had for Hunnimonda, and all that she had made him suffer, and in the end was about to recount to her the conversation he had that day had with the Queen of the Goths, when the Queen first by a sigh and in the end by the discourse she made spared him that pains, and let him know that she had understood it all from the mouth of the Queen of the Goths, who in effect living in an innocent life, and unskilful in all sorts of deceit and artifice, and knowing her self bound to the proofs she daily receiv'd from the tender amity of the Queen of the Huns, would not keep secret any thing for which she believed she might incur her displeasure, nor attend the rebuke she might tear from her friendship, if this affection had come to her knowledge by any other mouth than her own. Balamir was astonish'd for the present that the Queen of the Goths had so readily acquainted the Queen his Mother with a business in which he plac'd all the importance of his life and repose; but a little after having made reflection on the reasons she had, and the little she had hazarded for him in discovering it to a Mother of whom he knew he was infinitely beloved, he approved her proceeding, and persevering in the design which had occasion'd him to begin to speak, he conjur'd the Queen by all the passionate words which his love could put in his mouth, to be assistant to him in his love, to which all his thoughts and all the happiness of his life was fix'd, and in the good or ill success of which all his good or ill fortune consisted.

The Queen who truly loved the Prince with the most strong affection a Mother could have for a Child, who had linked her self with a very strait friendship to the Queen of the Goths, who esteem'd infinitely the merit of the young Princess Hunnimonda and who by an inclination full of piety, believ'd that no right of Conquest could make the King her Husband retain with justice a Crown that legitimately appertain'd to this Princess, and that by no rule of policy he could marry her to any other save one of his Children to fix to his House that right which she had to a Country of which she was depriv'd, was not contrary to the design of Balamir: but instead of condemning his love she told him that he could never be enamour'd of any person more worthy than that fair Princess on whom he had cast his affections, promising him the friendship of the Queen of the Goths, who for her sake would be favourable to him: Nor contented she her self to heighten the hopes of Balamir, by the assistance which she promised him on the part of the Mother of Hunnimonda, but made it her business her self afterwards with the King to persuade him to approve his love, and she acted in such manner, that the King look'd upon the beginnings without any mark of displeasure, and permitted it to be judged by the complacence he had to suffer them, and to suffer them agreeably that he would not oppose his intentions, and that he could not condemn what he felt for that Princess, who by what might be judged in the Age wherein she was would be a person wholly admirable. And moreover besides what the beauty of Hunnimonda might persuade for the justification of Balamir, it is certain that though depriv'd of the Crown of her Fathers, she had still a legitimate right which no right of Conquest could make her lose, and that marrying any other Prince, she might with justice raise Arms and beget a War able to trouble the Rule and possession of the King of the Huns: and it was possibly in part this reason, which made the King approve the thoughts of Balamir, or at least to suffer them: and though he did not declare himself publickly upon this matter, he let it be judged by his manner of acting that he might one day consent to this Marriage. He had likewise by chance some discourse with the Queen of the Goths, by which he gave her some reason to hope he would not oppose it.

This belief which was confirm'd both with the Queen of the Goths and all the Court was very advantageous to the love of Balamir, for the Queen of the Goths seeing so happy a progress in a thing which she ought to desire, and which perhaps she had not a little desired, commanded Hunnimonda to give Balamir all marks of affection he could demand from a Princess full of wisdom and virtue, and the young Prince who without this order had much to fear, and had had much to suffer from the severity of Hunnimonda saw himself in a little time infinitely more happy than he durst have hop'd. In effect, he began to lead a life so sweet that it might cause envy in the most fortunate persons, and though he were not yet of Age to be well capable to know all his Happiness and that the beauty of Hunnimonda wanted yet much of that sublime degree of perfection to which some time after it arriv'd: yet however it is certain that the spirit of Balamir did in this design outstrip his age, to make him resent his felicity, and that the beauty of Hunnimonda though infinitely inferior to what it afterwards was, was already such that all the world judged that it would in few years outshine the greatest beauties of the earth, and all those qualities which ought to accompany it, were in such manner advanced in her person, that she might well be regarded as a young Princess truly admirable.

Balamir never stirred from her, and though he were very well treated, and that young as she was she gave him reason to believe that to the obedience she ought to the orders of her Mother she joyned something more advantagious for him, yet she acted with him with great wisdom, and no less reservedness, so that scarce with all the greatest proofs of his love, could he draw from her the least appearance of the slightest favours, but as he knew the price of them he contented himself with little and was satisfied with his fortune, when he persuaded himself that in the heart of the most amiable person of the world he was preferred to all persons in the world. Some young Princes in whom the beauty of Hunnimonda had created a love so soon as she appeared at Court, and to whom the ill fortune of her house had given the boldness to testify it, yielded the honour to Balamir, with less repugnance than they had yielded it to any other, not only by reason of his dignity but of the affection which his amiable qualities had begot in all the world for him, and if they ceased not to love nor sigh, they at least renounced their hopes, and did nothing which might give any ombrage or raise any inauspicious traverses in the love of the young Prince. For the Prince Mundise his elder Brother, were it that either his soul fierce and haughty, and which dedicated all his thoughts to ambition, had not hitherto made him resent any dispositions to love: or that the beauty of Hunnimonda as I have told you not having yet attain'd its perfection, could not work all the effect which it was afterwards able to do. He seem'd only to give him at this time what no person could refuse him, which were praises and admiration, and instead of opposing the love of Balamir with any obstacle, he favoured his commencements with a very great complacency.

You see my Lords, that not to tire you with a long recital, I have recounted succinctly the beginnings of a love, the discourse of which hath ordinarily something of tedious in it, and I was willing to pass lightly over these stories, that I might continue longer on those events more worthy your attention. To come to the discourse I am to make you, I must tell you that the condition of young Balamir was in the estate I have represented to you, and that as he loved passionately, so he had reason to believe that he was loved by Hunnimonda as much as his young Age and her severity would permit him to desire, when a life the beginning of which had been dedicated to love, was called to other things and that glory for which he was born came to trouble his prime felicity. In effect, however he had dedicated himself to Hunnimonda he had not renounced fame which he loved as well as she, and the King his Father though he consented to his love, had no design that he should consume and waste at the feet of Hunnimonda a life, which according to all appearances he ought to render illustrious by his fair Actions. Occasion offer'd it self at that time, to exercise the two Princes in the mystery they ought to practise to follow the example of their Fathers, and it seem'd to have waited for the Age necessary for them to signalize themselves. The King whose Soul was wholly warlike, wearied with a Peace of many years continuance, turn'd his thoughts to War and determin'd an expedition against Pannonia, which he had a long time thought of. The disorders which were at present both in the Oriental and Occidental Empires, and the invasion of many Nations which assaulted them, and employed their Arms on all sides, gave him that facility to execute his designs, which he had not had in conjunctures less favourable. But whilst he thought to carry a War into those Nations he would conquer, he was forc'd to think of defending those which were already under his dominion, for he understood that Mazia which he had forced to submit to his Arms, and a part of Sarmatia, which the King his Father had conquered, by the combination of some Princes, which had very apparent pretences, and who had a long time been forging conspiracies, were risen on all sides and covered all the Country with an infinite number of Souldiers.

He understood likewise, that so soon as they appeared in Arms, a great part of the Cities had declared in their favour, and that in all liklyhood, all the others would follow their example, if it were not prevented with diligence. His courage being great, this news affrighted him not, though it somewhat troubled him, but with an admirable speed he set on foot one of those terrible Armies, which by the warlike humour of our people, are raised among us more easily than in other Nations. But because it was of necessity for him to part his Forces, to send one party into Mæsia, and the other into Sarmatia, he resolv'd that the Prince Murdisc, his eldest Son, who had already attain'd his twentieth year, and was capable of command, should go into Sarmatia with one of the two Armies, with the old and experienced Captains, whom he gave him, to assist his youth with their counsels and experience, and with the other he would go in person, where the affairs were more desperate, and the Rebellion more general, and he thought good that Balamir should follow him, to serve under him his Apprentiship in War.

All the hinderance which the love of Balamir might give him with Hunnimonda, yielded to that he had for glory, and for his duty, and that martial ardour which he felt boil in his veins since his youngest years, rekindling it self at the sound of the Trumpet which called him, made him surmount all that opposition he had to absent himself from what he lov'd: Nor could all his passion hinder him from conceiving some motions of joy, out of the hope he had to see himself soon employed in affairs so much coveted, and like a young Lion, exciting all his fierceness against some tender motions which might raise themselves in his soul, he vanquish'd all that might seem to oppose the effect of his generous inclinations. That day, on which he understood the resolution of the King, and received order to prepare for his departure, being with Hunnimonda, on whose countenance he saw some marks of a very obliging sadness, I beg your pardon, said he, if I cannot sufficiently afflict my self at the misfortune I have to absent my self from you. I am ashamed to have done nothing for my glory, which may render me worthy to serve you, and if with some honour among men I ought to purchase a Crown to offer you, it is time that I begin to labour for it.

The Princess hearkened to this discourse of the Prince, with a countenance, in which he might observe more melancholy, than appeared in his, and beholding him with an eye which seem'd to speak more than her words, I see you so well satisfied to leave us, said she, that I shall have no great need to prepare you consolations, and though I conform my self as I ought to the necessity that makes you absent your self from us, yet I would believe better what you have for the time past perswaded me, if I saw less joy in your face than now you testify. Ab Madam, replied the Prince, give not the name of joy to an effect of my courage, which I have not obtained without infinite difficulty, and be pleas'd to believe, that if this first expedition should lead me to the Empire of the world, and to the glory of the chiefest Cæsar, I should not be capable of joy whilst it absents me from you. It is true that I have struggled, and do struggle with my grief, both by the necessity of my duty, and those hopes which may flatter me, but between the Combat and the Victory, there is a great difference, and I doubt not but my courage will give me in this conflict, the same assistance I hope for in those I go to seek. You may well believe this truth, my fair Princess, added he with a sigh, and would to God that in the doubt you may have, I might be so happy to see in you some sign of trouble, which would render me more fortunate than I had ever been in my life. You observe but too much, replied the Princess, and as the thoughts I have for you, are own'd by persons to whom I am to give an account, I am not possibly studious to conceal it, neither have I believed that it was necessary, nor know I any reason which should hinder me from testifying, that I am afflicted for your departure. I am unwilling however, that you believe I interest my self in your glory so much, as not to oppose my self to the desire you have to acquire it, and I cannot doubt but you were born for something else, than to pass your life with us. Go, since 'tis of necessity you must go, whither your Birth, your courage, and your duty call you, but in travelling for your glory, oblige your self not to it in such manner, that you do not always remember Hunnimonda, and in exposing this life to dangers which you go to seek, forget not the interest we have in your conservation.

These words, which truly were the most obliging which he had ever heard from the lips that uttered them, made him feel a tenderness which he had not yet experienced; and abandoning himself absolutely to a transportation of mind which he could not dissemble, "The greatest charm which glory can have for me, replied he, is that, to make me merit your esteem, and though of it self it be sufficiently fair to touch the inclinations of a Prince of my age and birth, the Gods are my witnesses, that no motive makes me feel it with so much ardour, as the desire to render my self by your assistance more worthy

“to serve you; for you must give me leave again to tell you, that being born of a Father that hath deprived you of a Crown, I should esteem my self most unhappy, if by some confidence that I have in my Sword, and in my Courage, I did not hope to oblige the King my Father to restore it you, or put me in an estate to give you another, which shall hinder you from repining at the loss of what was yours. It is to this thought, and to this desire that I am eternally fix’d, though possibly for my own interest, I should regard a Crown with sufficient disdain, but since you merit too well to be a Queen, and that there is no King in the world who will not one day esteem himself too happy to be yours, I will never desire, that you should yield to the condition of a man, who ought not to be so, if Fortune gives him not that which the order of his Birth refuses him. Alas my Lord, (said the Princess, with a becoming goodness, and a prudence infinitely above her age) make me no longer a discourse which gives me confusion, and instead of tormenting your self to seek Crowns, which are not necessary for you, to merit Hunnimonda, believe that she hath not forgot, that to fix your self to her miserable fortune, you despise that which you might find every where else if you please.

They had said more, if they had not been interrupted by the Prince Mundisc, who came to render a visit to the Queen of the Goths, with many other persons who accompanied him: He disputed with Balamir, and the Princess, concerning the discontent which their separation ought to cause in them; and as he had at present no reason which might hinder him from rendering this kindness to his Brother, he of his own free will pray’d the Princess to preserve him her affection, during a Voyage, which in all likelihood would be very long, and during which he doubted not but her absence would make him suffer much. Balamir thanked the Prince for what he said in his favour to the Princess; and Hunnimonda answered him modestly, that she did not believe, that Balamir could suffer any thing for the love of her, and that she would not be wanting, during their absence, to offer prayers to Heaven, for the preservation, both of the one, and the other, and for the happy success of their Arms.

In fine, notwithstanding the grief which Balamir had to absent himself from Hunnimonda, he restituted that day sufficient constancy and resolution, and during the time which we remain’d at Alba Julia, which was the principal City of Dacia, formerly named Apulum, seated on the River Rhabon, or Marisus, in which the King kept his Court, he gain’d from his courage a part of that assistance which he desired against his love, and with a great grace made all things ready for his Journey; but when the day of his departure came, and that he was to take leave of Hunnimonda, a part of his constancy and fair resolutions forsook him, and he could not hinder himself from making the Princess a witness how much he was sensible of the discontent he had to part from her. Then he appeared like another person, he said all that grief could put into his mouth of most affectionate, nay he likewise shed tears, Accuse me not of weakness, (said he to the Princess, drying them) but be pleas’d to believe, that it is difficult to separate a body, which I carry into Mæsia, from a heart which I leave with you, without making it suffer a violence which I cannot conceal: The better part of Balamir remains without doubt with you, and that which is to be absent, cannot in quitting you, preserve sufficient strength to support his misery, with a greater constancy, I leave you, my fair Princess, and I shall return when the Gods shall please, and my good fortune permit me; but whatever distance separates us, your remembrance shall never one moment forsake me; and I hope the desire to render my self worthy of you, will make me do things which you may own. Permit me if you please thus to flatter my self with some consolation in my grief, and forbid me not from hoping, that you will preserve me some place in your memory. I not only permit you to believe it, said the Princess, but I pray you, and assure your self with certainty, that no absence, nor no tract of time, shall ever banish you.

She pronounced not these words without blushing, though she knew well, that she did was approv’d, and the Prince was transported with a joy which made him for some time forget all his sorrow. It was confirm’d by the sight of some tears, which at the same instant overflowed the fair eyes of the Princess, and the Prince submitting himself to the charm which the knowledge of his good fortune had prepared for him, found himself in a disorder, between two opposite passions, which permitted him no longer to explain himself, but with confusion. In this estate he bid adieu to the Princess, and taking leave of the Queen of the Goths, he conjured her, with his knee bended before her, to remember her self of the marks she had given him of her goodness, and to believe, that in the confidence he had in it, he had built a good part of his fortune. This virtuous Princess, who loved him as if he had been her Son, and who found no misfortune for her Daughter in in the love he bore her, promised him more than he demanded: and the Queen of the Huns his Mother who made him likewise remember the protection she had given him in his love confirmed the promise to him with all the affection he could desire.

We parted thus from Alba Julia, and on the same day the King with the young Prince Balamir, took their way towards Mesia, and Prince Mundisc by a Road quite opposite that towards Sarmatia. The two Armies were little different in Forces, and in the least there was near an hundred thousand fighting men. The King left the government of affairs in Dacia to men most capable, and whose fidelity could not be suspected; marching towards Mesia, with as much diligence as it was possible; without wearying his men who were to fight at their arrival. We crossed the Ancient Country of the Gepids, and that of the Burridiens, left on our left hand Ulpia, Trajana, heretofore named Zarmigetusa, passed at the foot of the Ceraunian Mountains, and by the Country of the Burres, came to the banks of the Danube, which we were to pass to enter into Mesia; by good fortune those Cities which were seated on the banks of the Danube, between the Rivers of Murgis and Ciabra, remained in obedience to the King, by which means he was Master of that famous Bridge of Trajan, which he had with so much cost and pains built over that great River, which yet stands as one of the wonders of the world; and it was that which gave us an entire advantage to pass the River, which had without doubt stopped us, if the Enemies had rendered themselves Masters of these passes, as they were from the Country of the Tribaliens, to the place of its disburthening it self in the Euxine Sarmatique Sea. The Country of the Mesians and all that which extends from the River Sava to the Tribaliens, which make a part of higher Mesia, was of our party, but all the lower Mesia which is bounded by the Danube, the Sea, and Mount Hemus, which is much greater, better peopled and stronger in Cities and Men, were Armed against us, and under the Conduct of two Princes, who pretended their Ancestors had some right over that Country, before it was subdued to the Empire, by the Arms of Trajan, and who had caused Forces to march out of Thrace. and had Armies on foot whose force was not inferiour to that of our King: The Princes were brave and valiant, the People warlike, all the plain Country, and the greatest part of the Cities were at their discretion: and thus fortified they hoped to drive us back, and remain Masters of the Provinces: but in the person of our King they had for their Captain a Warriour famous and celebrated for his great Actions, and they proved in little time that in that of the young Balamir, they had an Enemy no less redoutable.

I will not recount to you the particulars of this War, though there happened things without doubt very observable, the renown of a part of which may possibly be come to you, but because the recital would be too long, I will only tell you in the briefest manner I can possibly, that the King having repos'd some days in the Country of the Mesians, marched towards the River of Ciabra, over which we were to pass to enter into the Country of the Triballiens, and on the banks of which the Enemy had ranged a party of theirs to dispute our passage: If they had well managed this design, they had given us no small trouble, but believing themselves strong enough to fight us, and those who commanded them to give a better opinion to the people, perswading them that they would not fly the fight, they endeavour'd not at all to break a bridge which we had at a City called Vilanis, as they might have done, being absolute Masters of the other River, and ranging in battel those Troops they had on that side, they resolv'd to let pass a party of our Army, with design to charge it, and hopes to defeat it before the other could come to its succour.

There was a great likelihood in their design, and it had possibly took effect, if they had had to do with ordinary men, but by misfortune for them, it was Prince Balamir who pass'd at the head of the first Troops, who having for his entrance into Arms demanded this charge from the King, which he granted him with much difficulty, marched towards them with an assurance which struck them with a pannick fear, and instead of victory which they expected, forc'd them all to find their deaths who durst rencounter him, and carried so much affright and disorder among the rest, that the Troops which followed them had all time requisite to pass, and enlarge themselves in the Plain, where by the prodigious bravery of this young Prince, victory soon declared it self for our party. All the Infantry which the Enemy had opposed to us were cut in pieces, their Cavalry saved themselves in the Teminites Mountains, and went to rejoyne with the gross of their Troops which were beyond the Escames, another great River which stopp'd our passage unto Mount Hemus, whence it takes it source to the Danube, into which it dischargeth it self near the City of Appiparia.

By this first advantage which was great, though I have told it you succinctly, the King hop'd he should in few days be Master of all the Country of the Tribaliens, but this hope

Gave him less content than he receiv'd by the first success of the Arms of Balamir, and though by all appearances he had seen him now do things which pass'd his expectation, and would almost pass belief, if they were particularly told. I followed him the closest possible; and if before the Combat I admir'd with all the world the excellent grace he had under his first Arms, I admir'd him much more in the Combat, and could not hinder my self oftentimes from stopping to wonder then when all were most employed. For at his first blow of essay, he with his own hand deprived of life the General of those Troops who that day fought, and by this Action having begun the Victory, he seconded it with so many others worthy a particular notice, that it was to him alone the King confessed he owed most of the advantage of that day. In some other fights we had in the Country of the Tribalians, and in the assault of several places, which were carried by force, and which resolutely defended themselves, he did things above imagination, and which rendred him more formidable to the Enemies, than all the power and all the reputation of the King his Father: but it was at the passage of the Escames, having intirely subdued the Provinces of the Tribalians, that he made the world no longer question his renown, for whilst our Forces endeavour'd to force a passage on the bridges of Boats which the King had caused to be made, after a great many Bickerings, walking on the banks of the River, and from thence casting a terrible look to the other side, which struck a gelid frost into the hearts of the most hardy, he remembered himself of what Alexander did at Granica, and supporting impatiently all the Obstacles brought to oppose his generous design: Why, (said he to those that were near him,) cannot we do that which others have done before us? that which appears to us of Enemies, is it more redoubtable than an Army of three hundred thousand men, ranged on the banks of the Granica? And Alexander and the Macedonians were they not Men like us? To these words he added some others, to animate the Cavalry which were near him, and seeing that the River was neither too large nor too rapid, he put Spurs to his Horse, and swum him through the Waves towards the other side of the River, at the head of five or six thousand Horse which followed him, and amongst whom there was not a man found staying after so fair an example. The King who observed this Action, though from a place far distant; was somewhat offended at first, fearing the success would not answer the greatness of the enterprize: but as there is a fortunate rashness, this (for I may give it that name) truly was one; for the Enemies instead of making use of their advantage, to charge those which strove to get up the Banks, were so astonish'd at the boldness of this Action, that they lost the favourable occasion, and observing Balamir at the head of them by his shining Arms, and many white Plumes, which waved o're his Helmet, they had scarce sufficient confidence to maintain any fight. Elizar who was one of the two hostile Princes, ran from another side where he had been till then employed, and would by his presence have encouraged his own to have driven back ours into the River, but he found Balamir in the head who press'd him in such sort that he could scarce save himself from before him with two great wounds, which he had received from two cuts of his Sword. By this diversion which he made on this side of one part of the enemies forces, and the fear he gave to the other who so soon as he was pass'd over, fought no longer but in disorder, the King had almost a free passage, and Elizar who in truth was not strong enough in that place to give us battel, retreated in the best order it was possible, and like a man understanding in War, but yet not without leaving the Field covered with dead, and losing all his baggage.

Some days after, to pass over this succinctly, having joyned with his Companion near the City of Davidacie, in the Country of Aroteres, and beyond the famous Altar of Decius, and finding a Post advantageous for them, they presented us Battel, which the King accepted with joy, not only out of the desire he had to end the war, but to yield to the boiling ardour of Balamir, who promised him the victory; and such confidence had he not only in his valour, but even in his wisdom, (though he saw a little too much boldness in his enterprizes) that notwithstanding his youth, for he was not arriv'd to above nineteen years of Age, he willingly gave him the command of the right Wing of his Army, nor had he any cause to repent himself, and in this Battel of which no more than the rest will I recount you the particulars, with the right Wing which he commanded, he not only defeated the left Wing of his Enemies, which was oppos'd to him, and which Timagnes conducted, and having slain a part, and disorder'd the rest to a general Rout, but with his victorious Troops, he came to the assistance of the King who fought with much uncertainty of the event, and having chas'd by his arrival, all that made head against him, extended victory generally through all parts, and rendred it famous by the death of thirty thousand Enemies.

By a victory so important, the King might have hop'd soon to have put an end to that War, if the Season had permitted him to make use of those advantages it gave him, and if soon

soon after, by the rigour of the Winter, he had not been constrained to retire into the Cities, and permit his enemies to do the same with their Forces. This obstacle of the Season, did not only prejudice him by the retardment of his designs, but by reason that the Enemies had during the Winter strengthened themselves by the arrival of many Troops, which recruited the default of those which they had lost, and put themselves in a condition to maintain the War better than they had done at the beginning. The King doubted not however to overcome them, and had already such confidence in the genius of Balamir, as made him hope the most difficult things; he understood likewise by many Messengers, that Prince Mundisic was also successful in Sarmatia, that he had taken two or three Cities, and that in many Battels he had had considerable advantages, so that he had cause to be satisfied at the same time, both with the valour of the Princes his Sons, and the happy success of his Arms.

I have now for some time spoke to you of War, though the most succinctly possible; but now I must mingle love in my discourse, and you will judge well, my Lords, that it hath been still mixed, and that in all the heat of the War, Hunnimonda had a great share in the thoughts of Balamir. It was to me, more than to all the rest that were about him, that he did the honour to communicate a part of them, and few days passed, in which I did not hear him twenty times call on the fair name of Hunnimonda. When any gave him praises (and he merited them too well to have his modesty not seldom expos'd to suffer them) I shall be too happy, said he, if I can do any thing which may please Hunnimonda, and which may make me hope, that one day I shall not be unworthy of her affections, and when by the part which I take in her glory, I can rejoice with her for any happy success. Alas! (said he to me) whilst Fortune is favourable to me in Arms, I am absent from Hunnimonda, and possibly though she hath loved me, at this moment she may cease to love me more. It is difficult that in an age like hers, impressions should be strongly fixed, and I know not for what reason I cannot hinder my self from fearing some change in her inclinations, and my fortune. He was not however content to think of her, and speak of her, but making use of the liberty he had, he writ to her as often as it was possible, and had often received her Letters. It would be difficult for me to remember them, but there are some, the sense of which I have retain'd in memory, and I think the first which he writ was in these terms, or the like.

Prince Balamir to the Princess Hunnimonda.

I Have not been absent from you but some days, and I have already suffered more, than I ever felt in all the years of my life; I know not how I shall defend my self against a longer absence, if my courage fortifies not it self by the necessity which obliges me, and by the hope to render my self more worthy, than I have hitherto been, of the glory to serve you. I doubt likewise, whether this assistance will yield me comfort, and difficultly shall I find it in any thing, but the confidence I ought to have in the promise you have made me, never to forget your faithful

BALAMIR.

I believe that the Answer which he received from her, was this, or little different.

The Princess Hunnimonda to Prince Balamir.

I Believe you do not suffer so much as you would perswade me, that love you have for glory, will easily make you amends for the absence of Hunnimonda, however, if the assurances of my remembrance can serve for your satisfaction, you may be assured that I shall never while I live forget you.

Such obliging words put the mind of Balamir into disorder, through the joy that transported him, nor was he wanting to seek like consolations to his passion, as often as it was possible, and I remember, that having received a Letter from her, after the first Battel fought, of which the King had sent the news to the Queen, with the praises due to the valour of Balamir, he writ these words, or the like:

Princ

Prince Balamir to the Princess Hunnimonda.

THe praises you give me, cannot but be very delightful to a Soul wholly yours, and the part you take in my happy entrance into Arms, flatters me more pleasingly than the glory I expected, I should however, choose rather to be considerable to you for my love, than for all the glory which my Arms may give me, and I would owe much less to the advantages I may hold from them and Fortune, than to the fidelity I shall preserve for you to my Tomb.

I remember not what the Princess replied to this Letter, but I have not forgot, that after the famous encounter of Escames, at which he had acquir'd so much honour, he receiv'd one, the words of which were these, or very like them.

The Princess Hunnimonda to Prince Balamir.

IT is most pleasing news to me, to hear Marvels already publish'd of you in the world, and to take in your glory that part, which you would have me take; but you make me buy it by fears you give me, and whatever joys I can resent, by understanding that great Victories are owing solely to your valour, it is not so great, as the fear you put me in, by passing Rivers, and swimming to fight those Armies which attend you on the Banks. Remember my Lord, that Rashness is no very great virtue, and be pleas'd likewise to remember, that you ought not to expose so lightly a life, which is not wholly yours, if your words be true.

This Letter hath remain'd in my memory, rather than many others, because it made my Prince feel an immoderate joy; for I saw him a thousand times kiss these last words with an extasie that could not be caused but by a violent passion; I have likewise preserv'd in memory that which he writ in answer of this, and I believe it was to this effect, or somewhat near it.

Prince Balamir to the Princess Hunnimonda,

IT is you should only take part in what is entirely yours, for as I have no part in my self, so my life and my glory are equally to you alone; fear nothing, neither of the one or the other, since they are own'd of you, and be pleas'd to believe, that I will die rather for the love I bear you, than by the Arms of our enemies.

I will tell you no more in this place, as well, both because that I have not well preserv'd them in memory, as because the recital may be tedious to you; but to return to our discourse of the War, so soon as the Season would permit, the King drew his Army together out of their Winter Quarters, and retook the Field, to fight his enemies, who being no weaker than he, and having great advantages, by reason of the many places they held, and the Sea, of which they were Masters, and by which they received often succours, avoided not the Fight, but as he did, they sought those opportunities which might give them the greatest advantages. The King took his like an experienced Captain, as he truly is, but he was interrupted in the execution of his designs, or at least, forced to betake himself to others, by reason of the news he received from Sarmatia. Prince Mundisic had maintain'd the War with infinite valour, and at the beginning with no less fortune, having defeated the enemies in almost all places where he had encountred them. But in the second year affairs had a little changed their face, and the enemies side being strengthened, his began to be weakened, by some losses he received, and he in the end beheld himself in no small danger to be driven out of Sarmatia, if he received not some assistance.

This news not a little displeas'd the King, and held him for a whole day in an irresolution solution what he ought to do, but in the end he consulted no further, for knowing not only the admirable valour of Balamir, but his knowledge in War, he doubted not but he might leave to him the commandment of the Army, and the charge of all affairs in Mesia, whilſt he repaſſed into Dacia, which is directly between Mesia and Sarmatia, from whence he might both ſend Troops to reinforce Mundſic, and if it were neceſſary, paſſe himſelf into Sarmatia. He did it as he had reſolv'd, and notwithstanding the youth of Balamir, left all things to his diſpoſal, believing that he could not truſt them in better hands than his.

After his departure, Balamir remaining Maſter of this War, began to purſue it with vigour, which ſoon aſtoniſhed his enemies, and in a little time he beat them in ſeveral encounters, took ſeveral places by force or compoſition, and gain'd ſo much of the Country from them, that in the end, they cealing to flee before him, and believing themſelves able, and in a condition to give him Battel, avoided not occaſion to do it, but expected him in fair order, in a large Plain, near the River Naxius, and in the Country of the Tomitans, which the exile of the renowned Ovid hath made famous. The valiant Balamir that day ſhewing in his eyes the joy he had to ſee himſelf in a condition to acquire what he ſought with ſo much ardour, embattell'd his Troops more like an old Captain, than a young Warriour. He gave his left wing to the famous Kenz, a Captain illuſtrious by many great Actions, and who had bore no ſmall part in the Conqueſts of the King his Father; he placed himſelf at the head of his right Wing, where his noble poſture, and the grace he kept in ſpeaking to the Soldiers, wrought an admirable effect in their Courage, who look'd upon him as a Demi-God. The Battel was cruel, doubtful, bloody, and as reſolutely maintain'd as it could be by valiant men, who had deſign'd either to overcome or die; but in fine, by the wonderful endeavours of our Prince, the enemies loſt it, with more than forty thouſand men, who lay dead on the place. Balamir in the heat of the Fight, ſlew with one blow of his Sword Timagenes, one of the Hoſtile Princes, and did beſides an hundred noble actions, which truly gain'd us the Victory. By the favour of the nights black ſhades, which hindred the entire ruine of the enemies, Elizar retreated with the reſt of the Army towards the ſtreams of Naxius, and, beyond it, lodg'd himſelf in the Country of the Troglodites, where he fortified all places, and by reaſon of the ſituation of the Country, put himſelf in a poſture, for ſome time longer to ſuſtain the War.

Balamir having reaped the fruits of his Victory, which made all the Cities along the Danube, unto the Country of the Etenſes, declare themſelves for him, went to ſeek him in the place whither he was retired, but not without great difficulties, by reaſon of the reſiſtance he found from thoſe places adjacent to the Sea, Tomos, Callatis, Timogetia, Iſtria, and many others, not following the example of thoſe which bordered on the Danube, ſtood out till they were taken by force, or ſurrendred not, but at the laſt extremity. Winter for ſome time retarded the progreſs of the Prince, being ordinarily very ſharp in that Country, yet ſo ſoon as he could again take the Field, he went to ſeek Elizar, who poſſeſſed the Country of the Troglodites, and all that is behind it to the Sea. But to abridge my recital, having driven him from the Country of the Troglodites, into that of the Peviniens, and thence to the mouth of the Danube, he conſtrain'd him to engage in Battel, and gain'd it ſo entirely, that the unfortunate Elizar periſhed with all his Army, leaving Balamir no other enemies to fight with in Mesia, beſides thoſe that were in the Cities, againſt whom he immediately march'd, and having by this laſt victory acquired an admirable reputation, and being abſolute Maſter both of the Field, and the Banks of the Danube, and Maritime places, only thoſe which were in the Country of the Coralles, and from the Etenſes unto the mouth of the Danube, there were few that durſt expect a Siege, and who ſubmitted not eaſily to his obedience. His humanity towards the vanquiſh'd, ſeldom practiſed in thoſe Nations, wrought a good effect; for the people, whom deſpair of pardon had made reſolve to defend themſelves to the extremity, knowing the clemency of their Conquerour, who impos'd on them no other pain, than to live for the future under the obedience of the King his Father, now preſented themſelves at his feet, and rendered him truly Maſter of their hearts, as he was of all places, and the whole Mesia. In fine, in one year after the departure of the King, he had reduc'd all things into an eſtate as peaceable as if there had never been any war in the Country, and ſeeing that not only all things were calm, but that, by reaſon of the ſweetneſs of his uſage, as well as by the force of his Arms, the vanquiſh'd people with joy ſubmitted themſelves to the Government of his Father, not leaving him any fear of farther revolts, full of glory, and no leſs replete with a deſire, and hope ere long to preſent himſelf before his divine Hannimonda, he turn'd towards Dacia, and approached the famous Bridge of Trajan, to repair the Danube, when he received an order from the King, whereby (having understood that the affairs in Sarmatia were in a very bad condition, not only by reason of the losses which Prince Mundisc had suffered, but by a sickness which had surpris'd him, caus'd by a great wound which he had receiv'd in a Battel, and which detain'd him in one of the Frontier Cities, with little hopes to remedy the disorders of the Provinces, or to conserve them in obedience to the King) he commanded him to go into Sarmatia, with his victorious Army, and with the greatest diligence possible, coasting Dacia, to get to the feet of the Carpathian Mountains, by which he might without opposition enter Sarmatia, telling him, with words full of affection and esteem, that it was by his valour only that he hoped to preserve that Country, which he doubted not at all he would do, if he could get thither before affairs were wholly ruined.

Balamir sigh'd at this cruel order which absented him in this manner from Hunnimonda, but he obeyed it without murmuring, and having passed the Danube, he followed its Bank unto the River Tebesir, which he passed at Tebesum, with an Army compos'd of fifty thousand men, and still keeping along the Banks of that River, he cross'd the Country of the Jaziges, arriv'd at the foot of the Carpathian Mountains, and entred by them into Sarmatia, contrary to the expectation of his Enemies, who did not believe he would fall upon them on that side. He got thither just at the time that Prince Mundisc departed, who not able to recover his health in an air contrary to him, had caus'd himself to be in a Litter carried into Dacia; the Forces which he had left, and who knew the valour of Balamir, by the renown of it already publish'd through all the world, came to meet him with infinite joy, not doubting victory under so great a Captain; and Balamir being now in the head of them went to find the Enemies, whom their advantages, and the sickness of Mundisc; had rendred insolent, and made them soon know, that his party, with the change of their Captain, were to change their fortune.

I will not weary you my Lord, by this unnecessary recital of the second Expedition of Balamir, but succinctly pass it over, and only tell you, that in a year which he remain'd in Sarmatia, he not only regain'd what had been lost, but by a valour and conduct which constrain'd Fortune to declare it self wholly for him, he defeated his Enemies in more than twenty Battels, took from them thirteen or foutreen Cities, and finally, utterly ruined them, by the gaining of two great Battels, no less bloody than those he had fought in Mesia, and by which, in fine, he reduc'd all Sarmatia into the same estate wherein he had left Mesia; and by the same sweetnesses which accompanied his Victories, and in which he went beyond the orders of the King, he produc'd the same effect among the Sarmatians, as he had done among the Mesians.

I remember that at this time, having receiv'd a Letter from the Princess Hunnimonda, by which she testified the joy she had conceiv'd for his great Victories, advancing his glory in terms very obliging, he writ to her in these words.

Prince Balamir to the Princess Hunnimonda.

I should wrong my self, should I complain of Fortune, after those favours she hath heaped on me in war: but I cannot boast of her in my love; for whatsoever pleasure and delight I may have to acquire glory, I can have no less grief to live eternally absent from what I love. Believe then, if you please, that I envy much more the happiness of those persons which are near you, than they can envy the honour of some actions sufficiently glorious; and that it would possibly be less delightful to me to gain Battels, than to see you dayly.

He had however soon after that felicity which he desired with so much ardour, for the King knowing there was nothing more to be done in Sarmatia, commanded him to return to Court, where after three years absence, and actions which had throughout all the world given him a name equal to that of the greatest men, he was impatiently expected. He obeyed this command with all the joy which his love could in this occasion inspire him with, and having given necessary orders to his Army, he, with his Equipage, took the nearest way, and by the Mountains which border on the Country of the Agatirses, entring into that Dacia which is called the Mediterranean, he followed the course of the River Rabon, or Marisus, unto Alba Julia, where the King at present kept his Court.

After an absence so glorious, he was admirably well receiv'd, both by the King, and Queen,

Queen, and the whole Court, of which by reason of his great and noble Actions he was the whole delight, so that the King had without doubt causted to be prepar'd for such the honours due to such great actions, if he had not feared to give greater cause of envy to Prince Mundfic, in whom the ill success of his Voyage had begot no small malice, and melancholly: He treated him however as much as his paternal dignity could permit, like a person extraordinary: And the Queen regarding him with thoughts more tender than she had all her life had for him, shewed him all those endearments he could hope from her affection. The Princess Theodolinda his Siller, who now appeared in an admirable beauty, and truly was in a condition to dispute with all other Beauties, welcom'd him with all the demonstrations of the strongest and tenderest affection: But Prince Mundfic received him very coldly, though he embraced him, and was constrain'd to some violence to hinder his countenance from expressing a discontent: Balamir perceiv'd it with infinite sorrow, but judging that his discontentment came from his envy of the happy success he had had in a war, and in a Country where he had been a little unfortunate, he hoped he might in this satisfy him, by a carriage full of that respect he ought to his elder Brother who might one day be his King.

But when after he had paid his first duty to the Royal House, he went to visit the Queen of the Goths, and having saluted that Queen it was permitted him to see the so much desired Hunnimonda, whose Effigies he had still preserv'd in his Soul, he found himself at the sight of her in a surprisal, for which he was not prepar'd; and though the Queen his Mother and many other persons had several times writ to him of the increase of her beauty, it was difficult for him to imagine it what he found it. In effect, the change was so extraordinary, that the sight alone could make it be apprehended; and this prodigious Beauty being arriv'd to its perfection, both for Stature and all other advantages, which it could not have gain'd at the time of Balamir's departure, appeared to the lost Prince like something Supernatural and Divine, so that the astonishment he received tyed his tongue, and held him a long time in a profound Contemplation, which permitted him not to do any thing but behold her.

The fair Princess saluted him with a civility in which if he had been less surpris'd, he might well have observ'd the joy she had to receive him; and seeing that he still remained fix'd to an admiration, by beholding her without speaking a word to her: What look you for my Lord? said she, Do you no longer know Hunnimonda? I have too well engraven her in my memory, replied my Prince in the end, to be able to forget her; but though I expected wonders which appeared not to me formerly, I confess to you I see things which have prevented my very imagination. I have possibly believed it since your departure, replied the Princess, and there was some appearance it ought to happen, but there is yet less difference from what Hunnimonda at that time was, and what she now is, than there is between the young Prince Balamir, and a great Hero, who already Eclipses the glory of the greatest men in the world. I would to God, said the Prince, that there were as much truth in what you say of me, as there is in what I observe of you, and the Gods are my witnesses, that I do wish it much rather out of the hopes to merit your esteem, than out of a desire to eclipse the glory of other men. As before these great Actions which have rendred you such as you are, replied Hunnimonda, I already infinitely esteem'd you, you ought to believe that by this increase of your glory, my thoughts cannot be changed but to your advantage.

The Prince was about to reply, when the Queen of the Goths not being satished with the first reception she had made him, came again to welcome him, and knowing well that this was neither suspected nor troublesome, mixed a long time in their conversation, which pass'd, as is ordinary in these entertainments, in demands they mutually made of what happen'd to each other since their separation, though the Prince at every moment interrupted all other discourse, to enlarge on that which appeared to him of the beauty of Hunnimonda. In fine the Queen again left them alone with an entire liberty to entertain each other, and the Prince having employ'd a part of the time in recounting to the Princess that which his absence had made him suffer, and given her assurance of a fidelity which he ought, and would preserve her to his Tomb, had the satisfaction to understand from her fair lips all that he could desire of most obliging, and to know that he was truly loved as much as he could hope from a virtue like that of Hunnimonda.

He departed that Evening from her full of joy which he could not dissemble, and as hitherto both in Love and War, all things had been favourable to him, the reflection he made of the happiness he received both in the one and the other, made him pass the night in the most delightful manner possible. But on the morrow returning to visit the Princess Hunnimonda, so soon as he believ'd he might see her, he had been there but a very small while, but he beheld Prince Mundific enter, who looked upon him with a coldness yet greater than that of the preceding day, and who being seated near the Princess, departed not the rest of that day, testifying no less trouble to enjoy her company, than she might have to suffer his. On the morrow the same thing happened again, as it did many others after, in which he observed in the Prince his Brother, an impression equal to his, and in the end knew by too many marks, that he was enamour'd of Hunnimonda.

This knowledge afflicted him with a mortal grief, and as amongst all men there could not be found a Rival more formidable to him, than a Prince to whom he owed all things, and a Prince who ought to be his King, if his valour gave him not other Crowns than those now appertained to his House, he regarded this misfortune as the greatest, and most terrible that could ever befall him. He complained to Heaven, accused his fortune, examined all things in it, but in the end knew not how to support it, the more he made reflection on it, the more dangerous he found it, but in what manner soever he regarded it, he found for him neither remedy nor consolation. O Gods (cryed he walking in his Closet, where he had confin'd himself, debarring all persons from the sight of him) O Gods! must it be that I should so miserably fall into that sole snare of misfortune, which can ruine my happiness and the whole repose of my life? Ah Hunnimonda, how great and dangerous a proof must the affection you have for me be put to, if it be not already so? And when I might hope thee sufficiently generous to prefer the Love of Balamir before the Crown of Mundific, I have reason to fear that the Queen thy Mother will not persevere in her first thoughts, but that to see her Daughter in a place will no more permit her to regret the fortune of her House, she will let her self be blinded by the fortune of Mundific. What reason hast thou, (said he again reproving himself,) to suspect of such baseness a Princess in whom thou hast known so much virtue, and of whom thou hast received so many marks of a true esteem, and sincere affection? Ah! I have but too much, added he, And when this change should come to pass in the Spirit of a Princess, and a Mother interested in the fortune of her Daughter, I cannot condemn it. I ought not perhaps my self to desire, if I truly love Hunnimonda, that to fix her self to the fortune of Balamir, she should refuse that which presents it self for her, in the love of Mundific, and to act both as a disinterested Lover, and a true one. I ought to counsel her to turn her affections towards Mundific, who may make her one of the greatest Queens of the world, and abandon Balamir, who hath nothing but love and hopes to offer her. I might be perhaps capable to do it, (pursued he some minutes after) if I believed Hunnimonda would be more happy in Mundific, than in Balamir: but Crowns do not often Crown felicity, and I despair not one day to give her one, either by the goodness of the King who hath many at his disposal, or by the assistance of a Sword which may conquer one, since it knows so well how to preserve one: I will not then give her this proof of a disinterested love, I will not, nor ought I, nor can I, but I will sooner abandon my life to the unjust and cruel Brother, than those just pretensions I have to the heart of Hunnimonda. He ought rather to renounce it, if he hath any knowledge of virtue, he who hath scarce begun to sigh for her, and if he doth it not, I will reproach him of his inhumanity and ingratitude, I will give him my blood if he pleases, but I will not yield to him Hunnimonda.

He entertained and tormented himself in this manner the rest of that day, during which he would not be seen by any person; and on the morrow taking his time to see Hunnimonda before Mundific, by reason of the liberty he had at all hours to visit her, he went to her, and found her in her Closet, in the best estate he could desire to entertain her: He seated himself by her as he was accustomed, but he had scarce the power to speak a word to her, and whilst she demanded of him why he had passed the preceding day without visiting her, instead of answering her he contented himself to behold her with a countenance which spoke what he felt better than words could do. The Princess soon doubted the truth, but she would understand it from his own mouth, and not her self pronounce it, and therefore prayed him with infinite sweetness to tell her the cause of the trouble she observed in his countenance, and to let her understand whethet it were not the same had hindered him the day before from visiting her.

The Prince in the end preventing with some sighs what he had to say, I came not hither Yesterday, said he, because Mundific spent the whole day with you, and I am troubled or rather mortally afflicted doubting lest he should be amorous of you. I know not, said the Princess, if he be enamoured of me, but it is most true, that he every day tells me he is, and gives me all those proofs men most passionately affected can. I would not tell you this at your arrival, believing you would too soon have the knowledge of it, nor advertise you of it during your absence, hoping that reason, or the little satisfaction he received, might vanquish his passion before you could have the sorrow to know it. Ah Madam, cryed the Prince with a great sigh, I am lost: And repeating again these words without adding more, he remain'd in the Chair whercin he was seated in the posture of a man overwhelm'd with a mortal grief. The

The Princess beholding him with an eye which made him well know the part she took in his grief, and rehearsing those words he had said with a tone which appeared a little severe: You are lost, said he, and why are you lost? Or what do you fear if it should be true that Mundific bore love to me? I fear all things, replied the afflicted Prince, nor is there any thing I ought not to fear from this terrible misfortune; would to God that my death might have prevented it, or that some Sarmatian Lance had pierced my heart before I had had the knowledge of it. I know not, replied the Princess, whether you give me not a just cause to complain, or if I ought to attribute it to the little knowledge you have of me, or the less you have of your self. There is nothing in your person nor mine can make me fear, said the Prince, but there are things in our fortunes, which foretel me the ruine of mine, and possibly the intire loss of all my hopes. I did indeed believe, replied Hunnimonda, that the love of Mundific might displease you, and cross us; but I never believed it could lose or ruine you as you say; nor ought you your self to believe it, if you will not do me an injury: For his person, you need not in my judgment fear that I should prefer it before yours, and for the advantages his fortune may have over yours, if you have believed that I did ever value them, know Balamir that you have never well known me. “I know you sufficiently well, said the Prince, never to suspect you, of any thought unworthy the greatness of your Soul, and I know that the Crowns which Mundific may possess, are too much below your courage, to make me fear your preferring them to the virtue and fidelity of my love; but alas! who can assure, that the persons whose thoughts rule yours will to the end persevere in the same generosity? Or who can likewise assure me, that I ought to desire it? Or that if I truly love you, for the love of your self, that I ought to prefer my fortune to that you will possibly find in Mundific. Will you then yield me to Mundific, (said the Princess, beholding him with a discontented aspect) Or can you have so great a respect for your elder Brother?” “I will rather yield him my life, replied my Prince, and whatever respect I owe him in other things, in this, he shall rather have my Blood, to the last drop, than oblige me to the least complacence for his satisfaction. I know likewise, though he be my elder Brother, how to dispute with him my just pretences till death, and he will possibly find in my courage, more difficulty than he hath yet proved; but I doubt whether I ought oppose my self to your advantages, if Crowns can make you find any against love, or whether I ought to desire, you should give your self to Balamir, if you might be more happy, or at least more high, in the Fortune and Dignity of Mundific. This is to love generously, (replied the Princess very coldly) but I am not so much engaged to you, as you persuade your self, and I declare it to you, since you oblige me to it by this discourse, that in this you do nothing for me, and though I should never be yours, I will never be Mundific’s.” “But if the Queen your Mother commands you to espouse him, said Balamir, as it may be feared, from a Princess who will prefer your establishment before all other considerations, would you disobey her? You know not the Queen my Mother, replied Hunnimonda, nor know you yet the greatness, and constancy of her Soul, she hath once commanded me to love, and without her command you had not possibly obtain’d all that was owing to your merit, I am assured, that she will never act a contradiction, nay so strong an assurance have I of it, that I dare this day assure you, since you constrain me, that if I be not to you, I will never be to any.

These words were so sweet to the enamoured Balamir, that all the grief with which his Soul was oppressed, gave place to the alteration which they caus’d; and losing the remembrance of all things else, he at the same time fell at the knees of the Princess, and held them a long time embraced, whatever endeavours she us’d to lift him up; she in the end oblig’d him to it by all her authority, and the Prince returning to his place, having kissed that hand which she with some little force stretched out to him; After the assurance which you give me, said he, I will defend my fortune, both against Mundific, and against all the world; and though in his love I foresee great crosses for me, and great obstructions to my felicity, I will overcome all by your assistance, nor shall my courage abandon me, if you forsake me not. “No Balamir, said the Princess, to give you this final consolation, I will never during my life forsake you, nor will I have you to be obliged to me, that I prefer you before Mundific. I will likewise tell you with truth, that the knowledge I have had of his thoughts, hath not been more pleasing to me than to you, and I had possibly let him know it, if I had been to act with a man, who believes he ought one day to be Master of our fortune, as with another person. She here gave him an account of a part of what had passed between her and Prince Mundific, and easily made him know, that it was no hopes she had given him made him obstinate in his love.

They were in these terms when the Queen of the Goths entered into the Closet, and having ving understood the cause of Balamir's displeasure, which she had before likewise suspected, she confirm'd what the Princess her Daughter had said, in such terms, as made him believe he need fear nothing on her side. He departed soon after, fearing to see Mundisic, and choosing rather to pass some hours without the sight of Hunnimonda, than enjoy it in the presence of such a Rival. Departing from the Queen of the Goths, he went to the Queen his Mother, who was allarm'd, not having for two days seen him, and at what she had heard speak of his sadness, by those who had seen him, and particularly by my self, who had better observ'd than all others, having more access to his person, and having found her at liberty to hearken to the complaints he had to make, Ab Madam, said he, is it thus that you have remembered the protection you so much promised me? and whilst I fight for the defence of Crowns which ought one day appertain to Mundisic, cannot I hope that you will defend me against his cruelty, which would deprive me of Hunnimonda? I dispute nothing with him of the Heritage of our Fathers, but would willingly defend it for him against all enemies which would trouble his possession, so that he would leave me Hunnimonda, over whom he hath no right, and over whom no advantages of Birth can give him any. Against any other but him, I should know how to defend mine, other ways than by words and complaints; nor is there possibly a man among the greatest of men, who would not look upon it as an enterprise sufficiently daring, to deprive Balamir of his Mistress; but he is my elder Brother, I have not forgot what I owe him, and I will pay it him, so long as reason shall remain Mistress of my soul.

To these words he added many others, which he pronounc'd with a behaviour wholly passionate, and which the Queen hearkened to with great patience, and no less signs of her displeasure, and breaking silence so soon as he had done speaking, When I promised you my assistance in the love you bear to Hunnimonda, I thought it had been with the Queen her Mother, and with the King your Father, that I was to do that service for you, and possibly you know well, that I have not forgot it, and that to encline the Queen of the Goths to your interest, and make the King agree to your design, I have not been useles to you; but as for Mundisic, I confess to you, I did not think I had any kindness to desire for you of him, nor that precaution was to be taken against him, and if he be truly enamoured of Hunnimonda, as by many great appearances he makes me believe, it must be from another power than mine, that you must seek assistance; you know his spirit fierce and impatient, and you know, that the King himself can with difficulty govern it.

She was about to say more, when the King entred the Closet, and finding her in this particular dispute, he divin'd the cause, by the marks he observed in the countenance of Balamir. The knowledge he had of the love of Mundisic had displeas'd him, though he had not yet entirely resolv'd the Marriage of Balamir and Hunnimonda, and having as well other designs for him, as truly considering the satisfaction of such a Son as Balamir, he endeavour'd to withdraw his Brother from that affection, however without using his authority, knowing well, that if he began to make use of it, he should be forc'd to come to extremities, against a spirit that would not easily brook them. The Queen conceal'd not those complaints which Balamir had made, nor made the any difficulty to represent to him, the just cause he had, and the King having hearken'd to her discourse, with an anger easily observable in his face, having a long time walked without speaking, This is not the first day, said he, that the disposition of Mundisic has begun to give me trouble, and I doubt not but it may give me more, if age and reason do not soften and humble it; I approve not his proceeding, and I shall without doubt make him know it. 'Tis not (said he, turning himself towards Balamir, after he had yet for some time walked without speaking) that this adventure ought to cause in your spirit, all the effects which we observe, or that a Prince, who by so great beginnings may aspire to all things in the world, should bound all his thoughts and all his fortune on the possession of Hunnimonda. Hunnimonda is a Princess truly worthy the affections of a great Prince, but such a man as Balamir should have an ambition equal to his valour, and find his consolations in those hopes, which his great courage should create in him should he lose Hunnimonda. "Ah my Lord, (said Balamir to the King) be pleas'd to believe, that there is nothing in the world capable to comfort me after the loss of Hunnimonda, nor can I, if I lose her, regard the Empire of the whole world were it offer'd me. I have courage my Lord, and I have possibly some valour, nor want I ambition, but these qualities are not only firmly compatible with my love, but I may say with truth, that nothing is so powerful to rouze up my ambition, or spur me forward to seek occasions of Glory, as the love of Hunnimonda. It is by your advice my Lord, or at least by your License, that she hath rendred her self Mistress of my heart, and if Mundisic wil snatch her away, he need but tear my heart from my breast, and facilitate by “my death, the possession of a happiness he would unjustly rob me of. I foresee, said the King, that this love will beget some strange affairs, but though reason be on your side, and that you may hope that I will not oppose you, there is a respect you must pay to Mundisc, and you know well, that there are few things with which he can dispense as to what you owe him. “I know it my Lord, replied the Prince, nor do I believe he can complain to have ever found me wanting, he shall still see me act with him with all that respect he can desire, and if he demand from my respect and my duty but things that are possible, he shall be satisfied from me, as soon as from the meanest of your Subjects; but for my love, and those hopes which are a thousand times dearer to me than my life, I will preserve them my Lord, and will defend them till death. “Go, said the King, and settle your mind, remembering that the greatest Conquerours, of whose number you may, if you will, be, have not abandoned themselves to love as you do. I shall do both what I can, and what I ought to do for your repose; in the mean time you know how you ought to live with your elder Brother, and what you ought to do, not to expose me to those displeasures this division may cause. Concluding these words he departed from the Closet, and led the Prince with him, without giving him any probability to judge, whether he ought to hope any thing from his assistance, or not.

"my

On the morrow, by what was afterwards understood, the King called Mundisc into the Palace Gardens, where he walked, and having made several turns in the Alley with him, talking of other things than the affairs of Balamir, he insensibly let his discourse fall upon the Queen of the Goths, and the Princess her Daughter, and having observed that on this matter he spoke with much alteration, I know not, said he, whether I ought in the end permit my self to be led with the general opinion, and believe with the whole Court, that you are enamoured of Hunnimonda; there are sufficient appearances not to doubt it, but not sufficient to perswade me, if I understand it not from your own mouth.

The Prince blush'd at this discourse of the King's, but by his natural boldness recovering himself very readily, I know not, my Lord, said he, why your Majesty should so difficultly believe any one amorous of Hunnimonda, for after having seen her, as you daily do, in my opinion there is much more reason to wonder, that I should hitherto have seen Hunnimonda, and not become enamoured of her. “I confess, (said the King, not a little surpris'd at this presumptuous answer) that the beauty of Hunnimonda is great enough to beget an infinite love, without reason to be astonished at it, but you have so great and powerful reasons to defend your self against this love, as may well make me believe you would not easily yield to it. You know my Lord, said the Prince, that love is not always the effect of our will, and that our souls permit this passion to vanquish them with a violence, against which, reason is not always capable to defend us; and when my Lord I gave any consent to it, I do not yet well know the reasons that may hinder me from loving Hunnimonda. “There are some, said the King, which you cannot be ignorant of, and since that you know well I had other designs for you, than to let you espouse Hunnimonda, and that Hunnimonda though of a Birth not inferiour to yours, yet is endowed with a virtue that will not permit her to suffer the love of a man, whom she hopes not to espouse; this had, in my opinion, been sufficient to divert your thoughts. As my Lord, (said Mundisc, hindring him from continuing his discourse) I am much obliged to your goodness, for what it makes you speak in my favour, and since you confess that Hunnimonda is neither for Birth nor Virtue unworthy of me, in my judgment the love I bear her is sufficiently justified. “It would be without doubt, replied the King, nor indeed had it any need of justification, if my intentions were conformable to it; but besides that they are contrary, you know the love and the engagement of Balamir, and you ought to have so much value for a Brother, and such a Brother as Balamir, as not to trouble his repose, whilst he fights for ours, nor take from him, what you ought to defend for him against all other men who should have such thoughts. As! for the interest of Balamir, (replied the Prince with a hasty vehemency) I did not believe, my Lord, that it was that you would alledge; and if the repose of one of us be considerable to your goodness, I should believe that among your Sons, he who has the honour to be your eldest, should have the advantage. “You should have it without doubt, answered the King, if you had begun to love at the same time, you know well nothing is disputed you; but after five years of a love which I have suffered, and which you your self have approved, in my opinion a Brother like Balamir ought not to have cause to fear his ruine from his Brother, though his elder. What you say, my Lord, were just, replied Mundisc, if the Law were equal between Balamir and me, but the difference which the order of our Birth hath made, leaves no concurrence between us; and surely my Lord, if you have any design to marry Hunnimonda to one of your children, it should in all appearance be with no other thought than to restore that Crown to her of which you depriv'd her Father: and I believe not Sir, that you have any design to separate it from your Dominions, and give it to any other than him who ought to succeed you. "This is possibly a thing, replied the King, of which I am not yet determin'd, and concerning which there is without doubt no necessity that I explain my self at present to you; but to convince you of that error I see you in, I will tell you, that holding from my Sword and not by inheritance from my Fathers, that Land I have conquered from the Goths, and a part likewise of those others which are under my obedience, I have a right to dispose of them according to my will, and when I should give to Balamir and Hunnimonda what once appertained to Atharic you would in my opinion have in the possession of Dacia, Mesia, and Sarmatia, so fair a Monarchy, that you would have but little reason to complain of your fortune. Well my Lord, said the Prince very fiercely, dispose of your Provinces and Dominions by the right you have over them, against which I neither ought nor will oppose myself, but for a Soul I have received from Heaven, and submitted to Love, leave it in the disposition of Heaven and of Love, and permit that it yield not to other Empire than theirs. I owe you all things my Lord, and I will pay that duty until death: but Balamir owes me something, and if he forget to render it, think it not ill that I make him remember it. These words wanted but little to transport the King to a passion, but being before well prepar'd, knowing the obstinate Spirit of Mundisic, and fearing some dire effect if he should break into a fury against him, he moderated himself with infinite prudence, and returning towards the company he had left, contented himself to tell him that he should be wise, and that if he departed from his duty, he should know how to make him return to it.

In the mean time Balamir visited Hunnimonda, as he had been accustomed though he almost every day found Mundisic with her, who cast upon him but an ill eye and scarce at all spoke to him. In these visits they reciprocally disturbed each other, for the one not willing to speak before the other, they were both silent of what they felt. Mundisic acted very fiercely with Balamir, and Balamir though much displeas'd at his proceedings, still rendred him the respect he thought he owed him, and comforted himself for the discontent he received at his rivalship, with the assurance he had of being beloved; besides he observed that in all those constrained conversations they had together, all the favourable looks were his, and nothing but civility used towards Mundisic. The Princess Hunnimonda likewise to exempt her self from the trouble of daily receiving him, so soon as she could went to wait either on the Queen of the Huns or the Princess Theodolinda, with whom she had contracted a very strong friendship, and who standing for the interests of Balamir, much more than those of Mundisic, though she durst not openly testify it, rendred him willingly all the good offices he could desire, and facilitated as much as possible, the satisfaction of Balamir. He was highly grateful to the affection of his Sister, and certainly that Princess was very worthy of his, for if Hunnimonda had not been in our Court, we might well have believed that there was nothing in the world more fair nor more amiable than Theodolinda.

Hunnimonda was one day with her, and likewise the two Princes with many Ladies and other persons the most qualified of the Court, when Mundisic who never knew Justice, supporting impatiently the advantage which Balamir had over him in the heart of Hunnimonda, and not able to dissemble the discontent he had, though he knew well he had no reason on his side finding himself near Hunnimonda, and seeing that Balamir entertain'd Theodolinda on the other side, and the other persons out of respect kept a distance, having drawn his Chair nearer to that of Hunnimonda, than before it was, that he might be understood by her alone, Shall I be always miserable? said he, and will not you in the end consider that it is not just, that in the person of two Brothers fortune should make one the most happy, and the other the most wretched of all men? For in sum, I am not inferiour to Balamir, neither in nobleness of blood nor greatness of courage, and our Birth hath put a difference between us that merits some consideration: I am likewise assured that he hath not more love for you than my self, and yet in the mean time it is but too true, that he is dearly loved by you, and that I cannot touch your heart with the least thought of good will. Ah my Lord, replied the Princess Hunnimonda, make not this judgement of me, but believe if you please, that though I esteem Prince Balamir as I ought, the esteem I have for him makes me not lose the respect I have for you. You owe no respect to any person, replied Mundisic, but are of a birth and merit worthy to receive it from all the earth; but you owe me possibly a little affection, and it is possibly too much against reason that you so cruelly make a younger Brother triumph over the fortune of his elder. Your fortune, replied the Princess, is not fixed to those thoughts that Hunnimonda may have for you, and these I have for the Prince your Brother, and with which you reproach me, have for many years

years been inspired into me, and possibly committed by persons whom I ought to obey. If I believed, added the Prince, that only obedience had procured them, I should find in that belief an infinite consolation, and I could with no small appearance hope for orders as favourable for me, as the first have been for Balamir. I confess my Lord, replied the Princess, that without my inclinations agreed with my duty, and they have without difficulty permitted me to do what I could not have done, had they not been conformable, but the orders I have receiv'd cannot be revok'd, nor would your self approve that contradiction. If I have nothing more difficult to do, said the Prince, than to gain to my party those persons from whom you receive them, I do not despair of my happiness, nor do I believe the Queen your Mother to be so great an Enemy to her own advantage or to yours, if you will permit me to use that term, as to prefer a subject to his Sovereign. That quality of Subject, replied the Princess, renders not the Prince your Brother despicable to those that know him, and there are few Sovereigns in the world to be preferred before a Subject like Balamir. All the world, added the Prince, have not possibly thoughts like to yours, but that is my misery, and it would be much more advantageous to me, that those of all the earth were contrary to me, and yours less favourable to my Rival. Ah my Lord, said the Princess, give not that title to the Prince your Brother, and be pleas'd to remember that after so many years that he hath been the same to me he is to day, you have never call'd him Rival. He was not so at that time, replied Mundisic, but he is at present, and I should chuse rather that he had been so all his life, so he were not so to day. He is however, added the Princess, but what he hath always been, nor see I any person that can accuse him of having changed; I believe likewise that if he had seen you engag'd in any affection, he would rather have suffer'd death, than any thought to trouble it, and rather have attempted all other enterprises, than that of becoming your Rival. Well Madam, said the Prince, it is I then that am his, and who by my misfortune or his shall be so until death, if the remembrance of his duty make him not cease to be mine.

He had done speaking these words when the Princess Theodolinda came within the rail, at the importunity of Balamir who suffer'd with infinite impatience the particular entertainment between Mundisic and Hunnimonda, and who not able to remain longer distant came presently after: Mundisic saw him approach with infinite despite, nor could he entirely contain himself, and though at that time he spoke little to him, beholding him with asierce countenance, You come to the purpose, said he, to understand what I am speaking to the Princess of your happiness, and she can hardly disown you to be the happiest person in the World. It must be believed if she say it, replied Balamir, for there is certainly no person can speak of my happiness or misery with so much knowledge as she. All those who can say the same thing, replied Mundisic, are not for that more happy, and few persons are there in the world who may not envy your condition. We are not always to judge by appearances, answered the Prince, the greatest felicity may sometimes be troubled with that displeasure may hinder the enjoying it. It would be too much, (said Mundisic with a sigh full of pride) if Fortune were equally favourable to you in all things, you are too happy in War, to desire with reason the same happiness in Love. It is not always happiness, (replied Balamir very fiercely) which governs success, either in War, or Love: for I have always believed merit might bear its part; however, the good Fortune that I have had in War, hath redounded more to others advantage than my own, but that which I shall have in Love, will be so much more sweet, because it will be entirely mine. 'Tis enough advantage you have gain'd in War, said Mundisic, to have done your duty, and acquired glory, but I know not in Love, whether you will accord so well, either to the one, or the other, as to have the same success.

Balamir had so much difficulty to command his passions under the injustice he suffer'd that there was no small danger, lest he should reply to Mundisic, in another manner than he had done, in a time wherein his spirit had been more free, and the Princess Hunnimonda, who feared it, and would hinder it, having made a sign to him to be silent, began to speak of other things with the Princess Theodolinda, who had the same fear and the same intention, and they acted so well together that they hindred the continuation of that discourse. They had oftentimes the like or little different in which Mundisic always treated the Prince his Brother with infinite pride, and Balamir still suffer'd it with a moderation and wisdom admir'd by all the Court, and told his friends that he would suffer all things only the loss of Hunnimonda.

In the mean time that fair Princess was lively afflicted at this effect of her beauty, fearing continually those disorders she might cause between the two Brothers, which with an admirable prudence, she by her good conduct diverted as much as possible. The trouble she had conceiv'd might easily be observ'd on her visage, and one day Prince Balamir finding himself alone with her, and having demand'd with great trouble of mind, the cause of her sadness; "Do you wonder to see me sad? said she, knowing that I have as much reason to “be so as any person in the World?” “I know that you have great reason, replied the Prince, and the misfortunes of your House have been so important, as to preserve a long time your remembrance, but in my opinion you have by the greatness of your courage in part comforted your self for them, nor have I ever seen you in that condition wherein you have for some days past appeared. “It is true, replied the Princess, that I am comforted for our ancient misfortunes, and after the assistance of Heaven, I can say it is from you I have received my greatest consolation: but it is difficult for me to receive any against those new misfortunes to which I see my self exposed, or to regard without mortal grief the danger in which I am, to cause troubles in your house, and disorders among those Brothers whom no other interest had possibly disunited. “Ah Madam, said the Prince, how good are you thus to interest your self in the repose of a House hath ruin’d yours, and which merits so little the sorrow you testify for it?” “We live in a Religion, replied Hunnimonda, which teacheth us to pardon injuries easily, and though it might not have made me forget those we have received from our Enemies, it would be difficult for me to hate a House from whence you are descended, or see my self on the point to beget a War in it, without being overwhelmed with grief. “You ought to pardon this effect for its cause sake, said Balamir, nor ought you to be ill satisfied to have received from Heaven a beauty can overturn Empires, and act yet greater disorders; yours will not be the first that hath caused such things in the world, and if for any beauty we may with justice take Arms, it is without doubt—“Seek, (said the Princess interrupting him) Seek for me some better consolation, my beauty is very ordinary, but whatever it be I shall heartily hate it if I receive not from it better offices, and instead of showing it longer in a Court where it produces not but such ill effects, I will carry it to a retirement where it shall be conceal’d for ever from the sight of all men. “Yes from all others if you will, said the Prince, but from Balamir you shall with difficulty conceal it, into whatever place of the World you retire, and you may believe my Princess, that there is no place so secret, as to rob you of his knowledge. “I shall difficultly resolve my self to fly from you, said the Princess, but if I am obliged to it by misfortune, and by the esteem I ought to have for you, I shall find those retreats where it will be difficult for you to discover me. “It would be much more facile, and it will be much less cruel, replied Balamir, to pierce my heart with a mortal dagger: for with whatever specious pretext you would cover your cruelty, the death you would make me suffer by forsaking me, would be less pardonable by Heaven than that you may give me by ordinary ways. But my Princess, (added he beholding her with a passionate behaviour) if it be true that you love me, what reason can hinder you from diverting those misfortunes you fear by an infallible remedy; and oppose an invincible obstruction to the pretences of Mundisic by espousing Balamir? “I would consent to it with all my heart, said the Princess, if the King your Father and the Queen my Mother should so order it, but without their consent I believe you your self would not counsel me to it. “I will never counsel you any thing, replied Balamir, which may give you the least offence, whatever interest I may have in it; but I believe it will not be impossible to obtain from our parents their consent for my happiness: the Queen your Mother hath sufficiently testified she will not be contrary to it, and the King’s so open approving my design makes me believe he hath no aversion to it. “I am of your opinion, said Hunnimonda, but I judge that though the King should have this intention, fear to provoke the Spirit of Mundisic, and transport him to some violent resolution, would make him delay the accomplishment, and since neither you nor I are any thing far gone in age, I believe it would not be to the purpose to press it. “I will obey you all my life, replied my Prince, but I think there is no danger in desiring the Queen my Mother to present my intentions if you permit it. Hunnimonda consented to what Balamir desired, and few days after he in effect found what she had said was true, and the Queen having entertained the King on this matter, reported to him that she doubted not but he would consent to his marriage with Hunnimonda, but that the time was not yet come, that he must attend till he had either made Mundisic change his design, to effect which he would employ all his Authority, or that he had put his affairs in an estate not to fear any disgust, which considering the humour he was of might cause great troubles.

Thus things remain’d for some time, but in the end Mundisic grew perplexed at his condition, not contenting himself to find only civility whilst all the affection was for Balamir, The fear he had to displease the King, though he had without doubt much less than he ought to have had, hindred his fury for some days breaking forth, but in the end he resolved to pass by all things and not suffer longer a competitorship so disadvantageous to him, in a place wherein he believed all things his due. Resolved on this design going one day to visit the Princess

Princess Hunnimonda, he found Balamir, who came thence, and having stopp'd him (as he pass'd a great Hall belonging to the Apartment of the Queen of the Goths) to speak to him, before many persons, who followed both the one, and the other; My brother, said he, I believe I have let you know what I have in my heart so sufficiently, that I need not further explain my self to you, but because I see that you are yet ignorant, or will be ignorant, I thought it good in fine to declare to you, that I love the Princess Hunnimonda. It is true, my Lord, reply'd Balamir, that I have been ignorant, and hitherto thought that I ought to be ignorant of what you now tell me, and though many great appearances might have perswaded me to it, I have still thought I should do you an injury in believing what you now by your own mouth let me understand. And for what reason, said Mundisic, have you believed to offend me, by believing me amorous of Hunnimonda? Because I ever believed, reply'd the Prince, that honour and virtue kept you from it, and that knowing the ancient engagement of a Brother, and a Brother not unworthy the honour he hath to be so, you would not be guilty of so much cruelty, as to trouble his fortune, and carry a death into his bosom. Everyone may deceive himself in his own opinion, reply'd Mundisic, and to draw you from your errour, I advertise you, that my telling you, that I love Hunnimonda, is to let you know, you ought no longer to think of her. That I should no longer think of her! (said the Prince, stepping back.) No, (reply'd Mundisic, with a voice louder) You ought no longer think of her. Ah my Lord, (added Balamir, beholding him with a fierceness which he could not then dissemble) I know what I owe you, but I know that this duty hath other limits than those you would give it: for when the King, who can do all things over me, should command me no longer to think of Hunnimonda, he must pardon me if I cannot obey him. He may act according to his own pleasure, reply'd the proud Mundisic, and I will possibly act according to mine, and make you remember, when time is, that you have for your Rival, a man who is to be your King. “You may be my King, said Balamir “very boldly, but my Lord, you are not, and there is yet more difference between the “King and you, than between you and me. I hope likewise that you never shall be: for “by the Symptoms you already give of your manner of Government, you will not oblige “a Prince like Balamir to remain among your Subjects: Yes my Lord, I will depart from “your Dominions so soon as you begin to reign, but in quitting your Dominions, I will “not quit Hunnimonds.

These words stirr'd up all the choler of Mundisic, and having cast a look at the Prince which made his anger observable, You forget the respect which you owe me, (said he, carrying his hand to the guard of his Sword:) but had I no other consideration than for you, I should know how to make you remember it. All those who observ'd what he did, cast themselves before him, to prevent a greater disorder, and Prince Balamir recoyling two or three paces, and beholding him in a disdainful manner; You threaten me my Lord, said he, but I hope, that the injury I suffer, will not dishonour me among men, but that it will be believed, that none else but his Brother durst threaten Balamir. Finishing these words, he retired, not like a man capable to fear a power exalted above him, but like a man, who by his virtue made his just resentments submit to the knowledge of his duty.

This disorder presently caus'd all that noise in the Court which in all probability it was like to do, by reason of the importance of the persons; and almost all persons in the Court, ran whither they were call'd, either by their own inclination, or other considerations. Those who may with reason be call'd Courtiers, that is, whose fortune is more considerable than their virtue, flock'd about him whom their interest made look upon as who should be their King; but notwithstanding what might be feared from his power and distaste, there were found a great number of generous personages, who passing by these low and mean considerations, declar'd themselves for virtue, and ranged themselves with Balamir, especially the men of war, and those great Commanders and Officers who had fought under him in Mesia and Sarmatia embrac'd his party, without other considerations than for his person, and he had not possibly found his party weaker than his Brothers, out of the love his virtue had gain'd him in all hearts capable to esteem it, if he had not himself oppos'd it, out of fear to give too much cause of jealousy to Mundisic, by this knowledge of his great credit, and the displeasure of the King his Father, by reason of the ill effects it might produce; and for these reasons, instead of testifying joy for the zeal of his friends, he appear'd afflicted, and having made known to them the apprehensions he had of their good will, by great marks of his acknowledgment, he pray'd them to retire, to deprive the Prince his Brother of all cause of envy, and to preserve their generous friendship for an opportunity wherein he should be oblig'd to make use of it.

By this so wise, and so moderate carriage, he increas'd his power in the hearts of all virtuous virtuous personages, and gave Mundisc a greater cause to fear, than if he had us'd other ways. The King understood what was pass'd, with a very sensible displeasure, and after having employ'd some hours to deliberate what he ought to do in this affair, he sent to seek both one and t'other; but because he would speak to them apart, before he saw them together, he commanded that Balamir should go into a Chamber near his Closet, whilst he spok'd to Mundisc. This proud Prince approaching the King, saw well upon his countenance the marks of his anger, yet he was not much astonish'd, but accosted him with as much assurance as if he had not feared any rebuke. The King was walking in his Closet when he entred, and after he was entred, having made three or four turns without speaking to him, he stopp'd on a sudden, and fiercely beholding him; "How Mundisc, said he, Do you already act the King in my Realms? And not content to be obstinate in a passion which I disapprove, do you imperiously forbid Balamir from thinking more on Hunnimonda? Do you treat him already like a Subject, and threaten him, by carrying your hand to the guard of your Sword? Believe you, that such a Brother as Balamir, to whom you owe the greatest part of those Dominions you already look upon as yours, doth merit this usage? Or think you, that without that advantage which your Birth gives you over him, he fears your Sword? He, who hath carried one by his side which hath rais'd him to a glory equal to that of the greatest men of the world.

The King stopp'd at these words, out of the abundance, rather than default of things he had to say, and the Prince breaking silence with a very confident behaviour, "I am very sorry, my Lord, said he, that what I have done hath offended you, but I did not believe I should incense you, by making Balamir know what he owes to his elder Brother. Balamir is not ignorant of it, replied the King, but you deceive your self in the opinion you have, and you ought to expect that the course of my life be ended, that you be seated in the Throne, and that Balamir remain among your Subjects, before you treat him like a Sovereign, as you now do, and when this change arrives in your condition, Balamir doth so much honour to the Blood from which he is descended, to merit a particular consideration, and by those things he hath already done, in an age so little advanced, you may judge of those he is capable to do for your repose, or the increase of your Dominion. I see well, my Lord, replied the impatient Prince, that you are dazzled with the glory of Balamir, and because Fortune hath been more favourable to him than others, you believe that all the valour of your blood is in him alone, that I shall not be able to defend the Dominions you shall leave me without the assistance of that Sword which renders him so glorious to the world. "I believe rather, (said the King, whom this discourse displeas'd) that you behold with envy the glory of your Brother, and that it is out of this vice, rather than any other passion, that you are resolv'd to cross and thwart him; however it be, I shall soon give you opportunity to shew whether your valour be superiour to his or no: This is that to which you ought to prepare your selves, instead of dedicating your lives, either the one, or the other, to love, and consider, that if the King my Father, and my self, had acted like you, your fortunes had at this day been very mean, though your Birth was illustrious. That love you condemn my Lord, replied Mundisc, cannot hinder me from seeking all occasions of glory, when they are offer'd me, and if Heaven be not contrary to me, I hope I shall have no cause to envy that of Balamir. But Sir, though I am not his King, and possibly never shall be (as he tells me) there is yet some difference between us, and without expecting a greater for the future, if one of us ought to yield Hunnimonda to his Rival, I may hope you will not command me to do it. "I would command it to Balamir, said the King, if it were my intention that you should espouse Hunnimonda, but though Balamir should yield her to you, your love would be nothing more advanced, since I shall never have that design while I live. I shall always have that to obey you, replied Mundisc, but my Lord, it must be only in things possible, and you know, that Love acknowledges no other power but its own, nor doth that of the Gods themselves extend over hearts. "I cannot hinder you from loving Hunnimonda, replied the King, but I will hinder you from espousing her, and I know her too highly born to approve any other design you can have for her. You are absolute Master, replied the Prince, and I have nothing to dispute against your Authority, but with forbidding me to espouse Hunnimonda, I believe not my Lord, that you have any design to give her to my Rival, for there is no extremity to which I should not be carry'd, if I see my self expos'd to this disturbance. "You know but too well, replied the King, that I would never consent to that Marriage, though there be possibly no reason to make me disapprove it; nor is it of the Marriage that the question ought to be made of either, my thoughts being far distant for both; but I will, that attending a farther knowledge of my intentions, not only, that you take care “ care to return with Balamir into those terms wherein you were, but that you live with “ him as with a Brother not unworthy of your affection.

To these words the King added many others, by which he explain'd himself to the Prince with so much authority, that he had not the assurance to disobey him, though his countenance sufficiently made appear the reluctancy he had to love a man whom he no longer regarded as his Brother, but as a Rival more happy than he. The King afterwards caus'd Balamir to be called, and though he knew well he was not guilty, and though possibly his inclinations were favourable to him, dissembling his sentiments by a policy which kept him from whetting the spirit of Mundisic, he spoke to him fiercely, and blamed him with no less rigour for having been wanting in his Duty to his elder Brother. The Prince hearkened to him with infinite patience and submission, and breaking silence when he had done speaking; “ My Lord, said he, if the truth hath been reported to you, you will “ understand that it is Prince Mundisic who hath been wanting of respect to those persons to “ whom he owes it, and not Balamir to Mundisic; for besides that I never had any un“ willingness to pay it him, I know well, nothing can keep me from it, and that I do my “ self honour by respecting my Prince. But my Lord, it is not concerning respect we “ dispute, it is Hunnimonda, whom Mundisic, with an injustice, and cruelty, never to be “ parallel'd, would deprive me of, and it is this, my Lord, I will not yield to him, if with “ Hunnimonda he take not away my life: I have possibly Sir, merited your protection in “ a love which you have not condemned, and in which I had not engaged my self, as I “ have done, if you had not favoured the beginning; if I have rendred my self unworthy “ of it, I am content to die, for to me there is no mean between death and the loss of “ Hunnimonda. “ You would do better to turn all your thoughts to glory, said the King, “ and by that valour which hath given you so fair a reputation, put your self in an estate “ never to fear the power of Mundisic: All things are in this design favourable to you, if “ you will attempt it, and I will give you those Arms which shall open you the way to a “ Dominion little different from that of your Brother. When it shall please you to replace me at the head of your Army, replied the Prince, you shall see my Lord, that love renders me not incapable of what you judge favourably of me, and if you persevere in the design you have had against Pannonia, and if it please you to give me that employment, I hope that I shall yet add that fair Province to the Crown which Mundisic ought to possess, and I will add it without regret, if the time which I employ in fighting, makes me not lose a happiness for which I would with joy abandon to him all the Crowns of the Earth. “ Whilst you travel for your “ glory, said the King, you need not fear as to your love, for giving you employment, I “ will not leave Mundisic with Hunnimonda; I would that he might, as well as you, make “ himself worthy the glory of his Ancestors, and have therefore other thoughts for him, “ than to fix him near Hunnimonda; in the mean time, my will is, that you live with him
 “ as you ought, and that by your wisdom, you shun those occasions which may carry him “ to the extremity he is but too incident to.

After these words, and many others, to which the Prince answered with infinite submission (though he remain'd still firm in his design, to dispute Hunnimonda till death) the King caus'd Mundisic to return, and having commanded him to embrace Balamir, he ordered Balamir, in his presence, to give him the respect was due to his elder Brother. Balamir did all things with a good grace, though he had too much reason to be more incens'd by reason of the injustice he suffered from a cruel Brother; but Mundisic acted not only with so much pride as displeas'd the King, but with all appearances of so great a constraint, that he gave but little reason to hope any good effect from this reconciliation.

In the mean time, the fair and wise Hunnimonda had been sensibly afflicted at the disorder between the two Princes, and knowing well, that she was the cause, she had some difficulty to find any consolation in the sorrow she received, Balamir found it on her face so soon as he again saw her, and having obtain'd an opportunity to entertain her in particular, in the Closet of the Queen her Mother, having made her read in his eyes the part he took in all might offend her; My fair Princess, said he, is it the pity you have of my misfortune, or the persecution your self doth suffer, which makes me observe that sadness in your countenance? And ought I fear, that the goodness you have for Balamir, diminisheth not the troubles to which his ill fortune exposeth you? The Princess remain'd for some time without reply, and in the end breaking silence with a sigh; I have always judged, said she, that I could not but be unhappy, and that beginning of happiness with which the knowledge of your affection flattered me, ought not to have made me forget the fortune of our House, or leave me any hopes, that in the continuance of my life, it would falsifie its beginnings. In effect, it is a happiness too great for me, to possess the heart of such a Prince as Balamir, and I ought not to believe she would let me possess it without trouble. Say with more truth, replied Balamir, that it was not for one so unfortunate as Balamir that you were born, and that the justice of heaven stronger than the destiny of your House reserves you for a fortune more exalted than what you can hope by fixing your self to mine. I believe not, (replied the Princess beholding him with an eye which denoted some trouble) that you can be of this opinion, or that you suspect that I can find in the dignity of Mundisic anything that may touch me. No my Princess, said Balamir, I cannot suspect you, it is from my ill fortune that I fear all and not from the change of your humour: but in the name of the Gods trouble not your self as it seems to me you do, for those Obstacles wherein all the misfortune is for me and which yet cannot render me miserable if you still hold on my party. How? said Hunnimonda, Will you not that I should be troubled at those disorders I cause in your House? Or that by these troublesome beginnings I fear those consequences which cannot but be unfortunate both for you and me? Heaven had been more favourable to me in giving me a destiny like to that of Athanaic, than in reserving me to such great displeasures; and that which you and Mundisic may have found in my person to attract your affection, had not been given me but for my misery if my fears be well founded: For in sum, if Mundisic change not, to what are we exposed? Or what stay can I make in a Court where I shall kindle a War between two Brothers, and where I shall cause mischiefs greater than any I can yet foresee. You may put a period to all when you please, replied the Prince, and by depriving Mundisic of his hopes by the happiness of Balamir, deliver your self from his persecution. When I could do what you think answered Hunnimonda, I should by such a resolution but ill establish your repose: for I know the Spirit of Mundisic to be so violent, that there are few extremities to which such a resolution would not transport him upon such an action. Ah Madam, said the Prince, fear not for me, when I shall no longer fear the loss of Hunnimonda, and believe that if she be one day mine I shall know how to defend her both against Mundisic and all the Powers of the Universe. Hunnimonda shall without doubt be yours so soon as she may, replied the Princess, and you ought to hope all that you can desire from a Princess in whom virtue is not less dear to you than beauty. I should be unworthy of you if I had other thoughts, and you would not your self see me exposed to the blame of the whole world, by making me commit those faults your self would condemn. In the mean time be assured, (said she reaching him her hand with a look full of sweetness) that I will never be tied to any person if I be not to you, and that I will not only resist the persecutions of Mundisic for your love, but that though with the Crown of the Huns I should be offered both the Oriental and Occidental Empires, I would refuse and despise them to preserve my self to you alone.

These words carried a sweet consolation into the soul of Balamir, and the passionate Prince bowing down his lips to the fair hand of Hunnimonda, held it so long fix'd there, that before he could return an answer, the Queen of the Goths and the Princess Theodolinda entred into the Closet, and interrupted their familiarity. It is true the interruption they brought was not so cruel to Balamir as that of any other person but these two Princesses had been, the one of which was as favourable as he could desire, and the other entirely fix'd to his interests, though the fear she had to incense Mundisic hindred her from testifying it openly. He therefore not at all reserv'd himself at their coming, save only to render what out of respect he ought to the presence of the Queen, and this good Princess hearkned as favourably as Hunnimonda her self had done to what he said before her concerning the competition of Mundisic, and all these alterations it might produce against his repose. The Queen confirm'd to him all that the Princess had testified to him, and made him assurances that she would not be contrary to him, when the King his Father should consent to his repose and happiness; and in sum, he saw so many marks of a true affection in all the proceedings of Hunnimonda, and hop'd so much protection from the Queen his Mother in all that might happen, that notwithstanding all the thwartings which the love of Mundisic might cause and all that he might fear from his competition, he departed from the Queen of the Goths less afflicted than he entred, and with a confidence which made him judge he was not too miserable.

Some days passed, in which Mundisic maintaining some appearance of respect, in obedience to the orders of the King, and Balamir remaining continually in that duty he ought to his elder Brother things were very calm between them, and there were seen no consequences of that disorder which began to break forth. But this tranquillity could not endure: for if the haughty imperious and violent spirit of one of the two Brothers, transported him to violences which overpower'd his reason, the great courage of the other though his virtue made him submit it to his duty, could not suffer with patience the injustice done him: and in fine it was judged by all the Court that if Mundisic by the advantage his Birth gave him, would deprive Balamir of Hunnimonda, Balamir who in all other things entirely entirely submitted to him, would not yield her but with his life. Taking his time one day when Mundisc was gone on hunting, he propos'd to the Queen of the Goths, and to the two Princesses, Hunnimonda and Theodolinda, and many other Ladies of chiefest quality in Court, to go take some pleasure at a house of the Kings, not above two hours journey from the City, and which seated upon the same River surpasses the other, a place truly adorned with all the beauties Art could add to Nature. The proposal being accepted by the persuasions of Theodolinda, who sought as much as possible the satisfaction of Balamir, the Queen, the Princesses, and the other Ladies, mounted their Chariots, and the Prince with a gallant Troop of young Cavaliers followed them on horseback, and accompanied them to that delightful Palace.

The Princesses soon knew that this proposal though it seem'd to be made by chance had however been premeditated by the Prince, they found there a fair noise of Musick accompanied with a great number of instruments in use among us, and which have nothing of the Barbarism of the ancient Scythians, and a magnificent Collation and all other things which might serve for diversions in such an occasion. The Ladies chid the Prince for the deceit he had put upon them, and in the end devoted some hours to walking and to the other pleasures offer'd them. Balamir had this day had his own desire, having the happiness almost continually to walk with Hunnimonda and Theodolinda, who was not at all suspected by him, and to receive from the mouth of his Princess all the assurance he could desire of her affection. But some time before they were thinking of leaving that Palace, and had just made an end of a Collation in a green Arbour at the end of the Alley, Prince Mundisc arriv'd, who upon the news of this company of pleasure had left the Chase, and came much less to take his part in their delights than to trouble and disturb them. There were few persons in the company to whom his coming was acceptable, and fewer whose countenances could dissemble it, though they all went forth to meet him with that respect owing to his dignity. He easily knew and observ'd it, and notwithstanding all his confidence felt possibly some confusion, but dissipating it by his natural audacity, and incensing instead of amazing himself, he saluted the Queen of the Goths and the Princess Hunnimonda, scarce regarding the rest of the company; I am very sorry, said he, to trouble the pastimes of Balamir, but he knows that persons like us often want complacency. Balamir not finding himself in an estate to return him any pleasing answer, replied not at all, and Mundisc instead of expecting it turning towards Theodolinda, You are very secret in your pastimes, said he, but if you were a kind Sister you would conceal them a little less. It had been difficult for me, replied the Princess, to advertise you of this, for I am assured that an hour before none of us thought of it. All things are too proper and too magnificent, replied Mundisc, to permit me to believe there was no preparation, but it is not only to day my Sister that I have known how little favourable you have been to me, for which I shall preserve those acknowledgments I ought.

The fair Princess blush'd at this discourse of her Brother without replying to him, and her blushing made her appear fairer to those that beheld her in that condition; but the Queen of the Goths, who daily sought peace and endeavoured it with all her industry, breaking silence, justified the Princess Theodolinda against the reproach he had thrown upon her, very firmly assuring him that on the Ladies part that diversion had been unpremeditated. She would have added more to persuade him to it, when Balamir whose courage could not bend under it, losing patience at this persecution, And though it should be true Madam, said he to the Queen, that you had a design to walk, are you therefore criminal? These words displeas'd the proud Mundisc, and regarding the Prince his Brother with an eye which marked his indignation, For the Queen, said he, I know the respect I owe to her will, but for you if you knew your duty you would not do any thing might displease me. "You make me so often remember my duty," replied Balamir, that it will be hard for me to forget it, but though the knowledge I have of it makes me avoid occasions to displease you, there are some in which I shall be in danger to do it all my life. "I doubt it not," replied the proud Prince, but I shall possibly take a better order than you think. "All the order you can take," replied Balamir, is to take away my life, and I know so well how to defend it as to make them shall dare assault it, think more than once of the design before they attempt it. This answer quite depriv'd Mundisc of his reason, and things had possibly come to some extremity, if Hunnimonda with Theodolinda had not thrown themselves before Mundisc, whilst the Queen of the Goths giving her hand to Balamir led him another way; having a great respect for her, he humbly kissed that hand she presented him, and though upon another occasion he had without repining quitted the place to his elder Brother, in this he with infinite grief saw him remain with Hunnimonda.

A little after judging well that Mundisc would not that day leave Hunnimonda, he mounted on Horseback full of melancholy thoughts, and returned to the City with those that had followed him thence. In the way, having made me approach to him, Might it not be own'd, (said he, with those marks of grief he could not dissemble) that I am the most unhappy man in the world, and that Fortune hath in my love acted all that she hath of most cruel against me? For in fine, what man among all men could she choose, against whom I might not dispute Hunnimonda with less disadvantage than against Mundific? or, what enemy could she raise me up, whom I could not make pay, possibly at the price of his blood, for those discontents to which I am expos'd? This is not, added he, that Mundific ought to hope the possession of Hunnimonda, so long as there rests to me a moment of life, or that he ought not to fear all things from my despair, when he hath deprived me of reason. "Your complaints are very just, my Lord, (said I, when he had done) nor can there be any thing in the world less reasonable than the proceeding of Mundific; you have yet this advantage, that all the world condemn it, and all their inclinations are for you. But my Lord, you must not permit your self to be conducted only by your passion, nor yet, if it may be permitted me to tell you so, make use of all the justice you have on your side; you know what is the fortune of Mundific, what is his love, and what your Servants might fear if you should come to extremity with him. Yes Telanor, replied my Prince, I know all that you can say, and all that you can think in relation to this business, but I know likewise, that there is no consideration so powerful, as to oblige me to abandon Hunnimonda, but with my life. I know all the advantages Mundific hath over me, but that of reason is for me, and to prop up my reason, I have a courage which Mundific, though my elder Brother, ought not to despise. I will keep my self, as much as possible, within those limits which the order of my Birth doth prescribe; I will not assault the life of Mundific, as I should without doubt have assaulted that of any other man in the world, and I will hinder my self from forming parties against him in the Dominions of the King our Father; but I will hinder him from possessing Hunnimonda, so long as there shall rest a drop of blood in my veins, and if he will deprive me of life to conquer her, he shall not possibly effect it, without hazarding his own to no small danger. To these words he added many more, by which he made me judge, that he was resolv'd to transport himself to extremities, and that Mundific would difficultly bring to pass his enterprise.

Balamir had so much reason, said Constance to Telanor, that I cannot hinder my self from interrupting you, to testify the part I take in his interests against those of Mundific; and Mundific had so little on his side, that in my opinion there could be few virtuous persons of his party. "I am firmly of your opinion, added the King of the Franks, and though he be at present my Rival, I willingly declare my self in his favour; but I can difficultly apprehend, how a man so amorous, could from a passion which made him despise all considerations, pass to a second affection. Possibly my Lord, replied Telanor, you ought less to wonder than any other person; you who have so well felt the power of the divine beauties of Rosamond, but I hope you will yet wonder less, when you shall have understood those other things I have to recount you, which are without doubt more worthy of your attention, than those you have already heard.

The End of the Second Book of the Fourth Part.

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

THe last disorder which happened between the two Princes, not only obliged the King to shew his anger, with more authority than he had done for the time past, but hasten that design he had contriv'd, to send them farther off from the cause of their differences, by employing them upon other occasions. There were affairs in Sarmatia, wherein to employ one of the Brothers: for the people of that Country naturally fierce, and impatient of Command, had retaken Arms in some Provinces, and reduc'd the King to a necessity to send an Army to reduce them to obedience. He doubted not, but he might easily have effected it, if he had had only this design in his thoughts, but for many years he had fix'd all his desires to the conquest of Pannonia, a fair and flourishing Province, which the Danube separated from his dominions, and though he judg'd he should not compass it without difficulty, the great confidence he had in the valour of Balamir, made him resolve to enterprize it, and to spur him forward to it, he understood that at the same time the Alains and Gepides had assaulted the Empire towards the Coast of Spain, that the Vandals were entred into Betia, and that you, my Lord, were employed against them, (said Telanor to Constance) with the most considerable Forces; that in Germany the Franks under their great King, and the Burgundians under theirs, began already to abate the power of the Roman Eagle by many great Victories, and that in Italy it self, the famous Alaric was return'd with a puissant Army, and amus'd Stilicon near Ravenna, with the chiefest Forces of the Empire, so that it was adjudg'd, that all that could oppose him in Pannonia, could difficultly sustain the valour and fortune of Balamir. It was then to the expedition of Pannonia that he would send Balamir, and he perswaded Mundisc, in whom this employment might have stirr'd up some envy, that it was more convenient he should go to Sarmatia, whence in all likelyhood, he might return with a certain glory, and that he would not in the person of his Heir, commit the fortune of his House to such an enterprize as that of Pannonia.

Mundisc, whose spirit was great, knew well that the truth was contrary to the discourse of the King; but were it that he had already contriv'd some designs, which he could not execute with the same facility in the war with Pannonia, or that he believ'd the fortune of Balamir might fail under so great an enterprize, he appear'd content with his employment, and prepar'd himself like a man, in whom love could not blot out the remembrance of glory. For Balamir, whatever grief he resent'd to absent himself from Hunnimonda, he dispos'd himself without murmuring to run whither his honour call'd him, and seeing the eyes of all the world fix'd upon him, with an expectation answerable to his fair repute, he prepar'd himself courageously to do all that might answer to the fair hopes conceiv'd of him. But because that all things were not ready for expeditions so important, that some time was necessary for the King, to put his Armies in a posture to execute so great enterprizes, fearing lest in that time the violence of Mundisc and the just resentment of Balamir, should carry the two Brothers to some extremity, he found it convenient, that till their departure, the Queen of the Goths should retire with the Princess her Daughter to a House he had given her, two little days journey from Alba Julia, and in which she had spent some years before her coming to Court. The Queen of the Huns and the Princess Theodolinda, oppos'd as much as possible this retirement of Hunnimonda, but in the end they consented to it, to avoid greater misfortunes. Mundisc murmured, and Balamir figh'd with grief, but both the one and the other were already prepared to absent themselves from Hunnimonda, and though Mundisc could not bow his spirit to suffer an equality with Balamir in the treatment made them, he at this time made no great matter of the fight of the Princess, though it were with Balamir equally denyed to him. They would have accompanied her, but the King fearing what might fall out, permitted neither the one nor the other to do it, and they had only the time to bid her adieu apart, some hours before her departure.

I never understood what was the discourse she had with Mundisc, though I doubt not but it was very passionate on the Prince's side; nor will I recount you all the words of that of Balamir, though it had without doubt, something in it very tender, and very worthy your attention. It was in a Garden into which they descended from her Apartment by a little pair of Stairs, and the Prince having walked some time with her, and having told her the most affectionate things in the world, carrying often his lips to her fair hand, which he held, and kissing it with many tears which he could not retain, You leave me Madam, said he, and without expecting that my Duty constrains me to leave you, you, by your own will, advance that cruel hour I have so much feared. I make you this complaint, my fair Princess, because I know well, that it is by the desire of the Queen your Mother, and by yours, rather than by the design of the King, that this retreat is resolv'd on, and it is possibly as much to flye from Balamir as from Mundisc, that you absent your self from us. Though a part of what you say were true, answered the Princess, you know well that I cannot agree that the other should be so, nor can you doubt, but that to flye only from Mundisc, I have consented to this retreat; our separation will be but a few days distance, for you are upon the point to quit me, and that for an expedition longer, and more dangerous. I know not what may be the success of it, (said Balamir sadly) but I can hope no good; my heart tells me, if it be happy to my honour, it will be unfortunate to my repose, and to all the felicity of my life. I have for some days had those presages which I cannot vanquish, and I am almost ashamed to go to the War unwillingly, possibly not to be pardon'd in a great courage. I know not what you feel at our separation, replied the Princess, but it is certain I have those fears with which I have never before been assail'd, and if I am not deceived, I am threaten'd with some strange misfortune. "I foresee not, answered the Prince, what misfortune you can fear, you may on all sides your self create your own fortune; but for my self, all that I have to fear in mine, is the change of Hunnimonda, and you ought to pardon me, if the advantages Mundisc hath by his Birth over me, hold me in a continual fright. "Fear rather for your self than me in this matter, replied the Princess, and reassure me if you can, against that fear I have to see you one day unfaithful. On my side you are in an entire security, and if occasions offered themselves, I would give you such proofs of a fidelity, as should shame you, should you be wanting in what you have promised me. "If I become unfaithful, said the Prince, I shall not only be worthy of this shame, but deservedly merit all the pains Heaven can inflict, and I protest to you, my fair Princess, I should submit to them without murmuring; being perswaded you have not this truly to fear, I make you no greater protestations to assure you, and I know not likewise, (added he, beholding her with a passionate look) whether you have need of all your constancy to support the infidelity of Balamir. "I have a succour to flye to in my misfortunes, replied the Princess, which you have not in yours, and I hope that I shall find it, should any such thing befall me. "Would to the Gods, replied Balamir, that you have never need of it in others, for for that you are in an eternal security: but my Princess, added he a little after, will not you permit me to come and bid you adieu in the place of your retreat? or, will you refuse me so dear a consolation in a time wherein it is most necessary, "I desire it no less than you, answered the Princess, but besides that the King hath equally denyed it to you and Mundisc, you cannot come without four or five days absence, and you know well, this absence being observed by Mundisc, he will desire no better an example to disobey the orders of the King, and come and torment me. "Ah Mundisc, (replied the Prince, lifting his eyes to Heaven) Inhumane Brother, what Devil hath armed thee for my ruine? and, why must thy persecution, from so happy beginnings, force such cruel consequences?

He made many other complaints upon this subject, whilst Hunnimonda comforted him with all the assurances he could desire of her affection, and when at the cruel hour of departure she was forced to bid him adieu, seeing him in a condition wherein all his constancy seemed to have forsaken him, Farewel Balamir, said she, love me always if you can, and be assured I will be faithful to you until death. She accompanied these words with some tears she could not refrain, and soon after went into the Chariot with the Queen her Mother, who

who had, on her part, forgot nothing, to assure the Prince as much as it was possible, of the continuance of her affection, and the care she would take to preserve Hunnimonda for him.

After the departure of Hunnimonda, the Prince remain'd in the Court as in an obscure night, and not finding there any more pleasure, thought only of his departure, not only because by hastning it, he hastned his return, but because he hoped that by the success of this voyage, he should increase the esteem the King had for him, and oblige him to do justice, and protect him against the persecution of Mundisic. That Prince, who had other thoughts, prepared for his voyage with no less diligence; and in fine, by the care of the King and the two Princes, all things were in few days in a posture convenient, to attempt the execution of such great designs. Before this Balamir had been often comforted by many Letters he had received from the Princess, which the length of my narration hinders me from reciting, and the same day he departed, he received a Paper, the words of which were these, or little different.

The Princess Hunnimonda to Prince Balamir.

GO Prince, since of force it must be so, whither Heaven and your Duty call you, and compel Fortune, if it be possible, to yield to your Virtue. In the mean time remember, that you leave the disconsolate Hunnimonda without other consolation, than what she can find in the hopes of your return. She daily demands it of Heaven, with the preservation of your life, and the happy success of your Arms; but she demands with no less ardour, that you shall continue faithful, since it is only on your fidelity, she hath established the whole repose of her life.

Before the departure of the Princes, the King would have reconciled their Spirits, but the Authority he employed proved vain; and as Mundisic was so bold, as to tell him, that he should never love Balamir, if he yielded not to him Hunnimonda, so he observed by the countenance of Balamir, that he would never while he lived yield up Hunnimonda. In fine, all things were ready, and the Troops that were marched, arrived at the places where the Princes were to put themselves in the head of them. They departed on the same day from Alba Julia, and at this departure, Prince Balamir received from the King, the Queen his Mother, and the Princess Theodolinda, whose eyes overflowed with tears, all the marks of a tender affection. The Troops that were to follow Mundisic into Sarmatia, expected him in the Country of the Agathirzes, at the foot of the Mountains which separated Dacia from Sarmatia, and it was towards that part that he took his march, with a magnificent Equipage, and having joyned with the Army, few days after he passed the Mountains, and entred into the revolted Country, with an Army of fifty thousand men, which was to be strengthened, if it were found necessary, by other Forces which the King had in Sarmatia.

Balamir took a way quite different, and following the Banks of the River Rhabon, unto that place where it disgorgeth it self into the Tebesis, he found the Army he was to command, and having passed that River, at the head of twenty thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot-men, he advanced towards the Danube, and passing it without any difficulty, at Tentoburgum, he entred into that Pannonia which is called the lower, or inferiour, and which is separated, like another Province, from that which is called the higher, or superiour. He advanced into the Country of the Amatines, between the Sava and Drava, two great Rivers, which water the two Pannoniaes; and because he did indeed surprize them, he rendred himself Master, both of all that Territory which lies between the Danube, and those two Rivers, unto the foot of Mount Alinus, and of the Marshes of Hiula, before the Lieutenants of the Emperour could oppose themselves with Forces sufficient to stop them. I speak to you of this War succinctly, not doubting but all the most memorable passages of it are come to your knowledge, and I will tell you with the same brevity, that it was only at the City of Cibalis, seated on the Banks of the Marshes of Hiula, and in the Country which is called Pannonia Cibaliensis, that we began to find any resistance worthy the valour of our Prince, and that this City, strong by its situation, and fortified with all things necessary for its defence, though it were assaulted with an admirable vigour, amused us so long time, as to give leisure to Philip Governour of Pannonia to bring all his Army into the Field, and march towards us with Forces not inferiour to ours, whilst Pontianus his Lieutenant levied fresh Souldiers, and prepar'd to joyn with him to soon as he could get them in readines.

The advice which the Prince received of the march of our Enemies, instead of amazing him, prick'd him forward with a generous desire to fight, but he judg'd that he ought first if it were possible to make himself Master of the besieged City, believing that he could not continue the siege before an Army stronger than his, nor advance to fight them, without making himself Master of the pass which that City commanded, from the foot of Mount Alinus to the Marish. For this reason he resolv'd to venture something of hazard, and against the opinion of the famous Kena, his Lieutenant and many other old Officers, he assaulted the City by force on all sides, and after a resolute storm with the death of a great number of men, and in which after he had done an hundred wonderful actions, he was first seen to mount the Wall, and chase with his Sword in his hand all those he found before him, he carried it by clear force, and the same day he became Master of it.

From the City he pass'd into the Country adjacent to the Marish, and to abridge my discourse, two days after entred into the Country of the Scordisques, and very near the banks of Drava gave Philip battel, and by a success due to his admirable valour, gain'd it so intirely to us, that almost all the Enemies Army perished and their Captain, and that which remain'd saving themselves in the night, in a Country known to them, endeavour'd to joyn with Pontianus who raised new levies. After this famous Victory, he made himself Master, not only of the Country of the Scordisques, but of that part of the Savia, of that which is called Bubalia, and of all that which is between Sava and Drava unto the Claudian Mountains. From thence turning on the right hand we pass'd the Drava and Limura, and march'd against Pontianus, who still kept the Country of the Andrisertes, of the Bathadates, the Jases, the Carpiens, and all that is between the Drava and the Danube: but because he well knew that the loss of one battel would be to him the loss of all Pannonia, he a long time avoided the Combat, nor had then resolv'd on it, if his Army had not been strengthned near the City of Mursella with a re-inforcement which made it stronger than ours, and put him in hope of victory.

This hope ruin'd him, for few days after presenting us battel, he lost it with his whole Army, and left us no more to fight within the lower Pannonia: the places which resist'd were carried by force, and the greatest part seeing themselves abandon'd of all hopes of assistance, voluntarily yielded to the Conquerour; and in the end he conducted this War with a valour and diligence so admirable, that the conquest of a Country so great and flourishing, was but the work of six Months: and before the rigour of the Winter constrain'd us to retire into the Cities: Balamir by force or the terrour of his Arms had rendred himself Master of all the lower Pannonia. And to those general Actions which might make him pass for one of the greatest Captains of our age, he had joyn'd a hundred particular exploits, and a hundred Actions of his own hand, either in the battels or in the assaults of Cities or in all the other Conflicts which happened, that it might by them with reason be judg'd, that his Valour was not inferiour to any man's in the world. The King his Father by many Letters full of his affection and marks of his esteem, testified to him that he had less joy for this augmentation of his Dominions, than for that of his glory, and made him judge, that he ought to hope from him an entire protection against the injustice of Mundisic.

But all the Letters of the King touch'd not the heart of Balamir so much as those that came from Hunnimonda, and they made him so well see the greatness and sincerity of her affection, that he seem'd little sensible of glory to devote himself entirely to the sweetness of his love; he understood and understood without envy, whatever interest he had to render himself more considerable than him, that Mundisic happily ended the affairs of Sarmatia, that he had gain'd one battel against the revolted, took many Cities either by force or capitulation, and that it was hop'd that in a little time all things would be peaceable in Sarmatia: but that which surpris'd him most was to understand that by lenity and sweetness, virtues in which he excelled not, he had reduced a part of the people to their duty, and that among them he had made himself be as much beloved for his carriage, as fear'd for his Arms.

Balamir as I have told you, beheld without jealousy what was published of the advantage of Mundisic: for besides that he believ'd his good success would not rob him of the least of that glory with which he was crown'd, he hop'd in the following battels not only to render himself Master of the higher Pannonia; but by his Arms to raise himself to that height that he need not envy the glory of any person in the world. In effect, there was sufficient appearance that the higher Pannonia disfurnish'd of men and other things necessary for

for its defence, would make no great resistance, so that he already carried his designs to Illyria, despoyl'd of its greatest Forces by reason of the absence of the great Constance its Governour, who was at present employed against the Vandals in Hispania Bética. But in the fairest of his hopes he was stopp'd in his designs, by the news he had of a treaty made between the Emperour and the King his Father, and an order which he receiv'd from the King not to enterprize any thing but expect his Orders in the Cities whither he was retired, without doing any act of Hostility.

This change in affairs and of the King's designs surpris'd him: but he was confirm'd in his surprisal, when about a month after he understood that the peace was agreed and signed between him and the Emperour Honorius, or rather Stilicon who governed the Empire with an absolute power, that by the treaty the lower Pannonia which he had then newly conquer'd should remain to the King of the Huns, on condition that he should content himself without any farther invasion of the Lands of the Empire, the necessity and great affairs of which reduced them to make so disadvantageous a peace; that for the greater assurance of it the King had sent the Princess Theodolinda to Rome, to accompany the Princess Placidia; that there were secret Articles which the King would not discover to the Prince but with his own mouth at his return; and the Courier added that the King had given him in charge to say, that in all likelihood the voyage of Theodolinda was not without some great design, and it was believed that in what had been concluded between the King and Stilicon, there had been propositions of an alliance, and that Stilicon had given the King hopes of the Marriage of Mundisic with the Princess Placidia; and that of the Princess Theodolinda with the Emperour, who had for some time been a Widower by the death of Stilicon's Daughter.

These Propositions (said Constance to Telanor not being able to hinder himself from interrupting him at these words) were kept very secret, if it be true that they were made: for I not only had not the least knowledge of them, though I convers'd very particularly with the Princess Theodolinda, but during all the stay I made at Rome with her, have never judg'd by her Actions either that she had any design on the person of Honorius, or any thought to marry the Princess Placidia with Mundisic: for if I had suspected her I had made complaints to her instead of returning her those thanks I did, for many good offices she did me. It may be my Lord, replied Telanor, that the Princess Theodolinda finding at Rome little disposition to those things she had been made hope for, dissimul'd her intentions, and having a great and magnanimous Soul would not torment her self to create a love in the Emperour; if by her sight and the knowledge of her merit he received it not himself: she had possibly likewise sufficient complacence not to contradict or oppose the inclinations of Placidia, finding them engag'd to so great a Merit as that of Constance: besides those things which fell out a little while after, obliterated those designs which the King might have had for Mundisic, and left no place to speak of them, however it was, it was believed that it was not without reasons more important than those which appeared to the publick, that the King sent the Princess his Daughter such a journey, and we had possibly known more if after that time the Prince could have cleared his doubts from the King as we hoped.

With the news of the peace, the Prince received orders from the King concerning all that was to be done in Pannonia, and he saw himself engag'd to a longer stay than he desired, to settle that Country, disorder'd and made miserable by the War, place Garrisons in the Cities, establish Governours, and do all other things which are necessary to be order'd in a new and important Conquest. Love which still reigned in the Soul of my Prince, and whose force absence had increased instead of diminishing it, made him think it too long a time that he was compell'd to devote to his employment, notwithstanding he pass'd it over with an admirable patience, and by the diligence of the famous Kens, whom the King at his entreaty approv'd Governour of Pannonia, he put that Province into the best estate that could be desired. He likewise made himself be in such manner beloved, both for his amiable carriage, and generous proceedings that that people out of the respect they had for him and for his Nation though he had been their Enemy began to suffer, and have ever since peaceably suffered, that they should take from them their ancient name to give them that of Huns, and they beheld without offence that of Pannonia insensibly forgotten, to give place to that of Hungaria which both the one and the other impos'd.

But whilst my Prince crown'd with glory by the greatness of his Actions and repleat with all hopes he could conceive of the protection of the King, prepar'd himself to go-re-vise Hunnimonda, with a joy which the concurrence of Mundisic could not expel, fortune treated him with a strange cruelty, and if he received orders for his return they were very sad ones and much different from what he had hop'd. They had been foretold by ill-boding Dreams, and by other presages which had given him all the fear a courage like his was capable capable to receive, and he that brought them to him, made him presently know in his countenance, a part of that misery he was to inform him of. The Prince was affrighted, and beholding the messenger with a frost which chilled all his blood, What news do you bring me? (said he) Or what misery have you to make known to me? The Messenger, instead of answering, presented him the Letter of the King, and the Prince having opened it with an impatience much different from what we might have for acceptable news, found these words.

The King of the Huns to Prince Balamir.

GO my Son, go revenge your quarrel and mine against our common Enemy; and if hitherto the duties of your Birth have hindered you from turning your Arms against your Persecutor, by another duty which you ought to obey, carry the Arms of the King your Father against an unfaithful Son who hath betrayed him. Mundisic hath raised all Sarmatia against me, and that which is more grievous to tell you, he hath taken away Hunnimonda, and carried her into that revolted Country, which takes Arms in his favour: the Queen her Mother is dead with grief, and I should be more sensible of mine than I am, if I did not hope to reduce this Rebel to Reason, by the valour of his Brother. Hate from Pannonia with these Forces you have in readiness, you will find others in the Country of the Jaliges, whom I will send to the passage, and you may enter into Sarmatia by the foot of the Carpathian Mountains, with a power not despicable to Mundisic. Go release Hunnimonda from the hands of her Ravisher, and you may possess her without difficulty, if you redeem her from your Rival; and I forbid you from sparing any thing to compass it, save only the life of Mundisic, who, however ingrateful, and however unfaithful he is, I cannot but remember I am still his Father.

It would be difficult, my Lord, to represent to you, what was the grief of my Prince, at the reading of this Letter, you may better imagine it, than I make you apprehend it by my discourse; to his grief was in an instant joyned all other violent passions, and he saw himself, at the same time, assaulted by jealousy, fear and anger, which in a short time reduced him to a most deplorable condition. The loss of Hunnimonda, or at least, the great danger he was in to lose her for ever, if Heaven, and his Valour, wrought not miracles for her succour, cast him into such an extremity of grief, as wanted but little to bereave him of his life; and the sorrow he had for the death of the Queen her Mother, whom he had so tenderly loved, pierced his heart with affliction. The resentment of the cruel injury he received, excited his courage to all that it could be inspired with of most violent, and the jealousy he had to understand that the Princess he adored was in the hands of his Rival, and of a Rival, from whom, by the knowledge he had of his humour, he might fear all things, both for himself, and for Hunnimonda, expos'd his Soul to all that grief it could possibly suffer, and cast him into the fear of all things most cruel and dreadful. As he was a man, as he was sensible, and as he was a Lover, he could not become Master of so many passions as tormented him; he sigh'd, he grievously complain'd of the ravishment of Hunnimonda, he dedicated tears to the death of the Queen of the Goths, and by words full of choler, he made his displeasure thunder forth against his cruel enemy. But in fine, having a courage as great in all things as in feats of War, he became Master of himself, and considering that Hunnimonda was neither dead, nor espoused to Mundisic, he suspended his grief to let his other passions act, and prepared himself to force Hunnimonda out of the hands of Mundisic, instead of amusing himself to deplore her loss by tears, and words of complaint; "Ah! (cried he in the end, with a behaviour which appeared to us wholly different from the first marks of his grief) Ah! let us march, since it must be so, let us march against that Barbarian, whom his cruelty permits us not any longer to acknowledge for our Brother, nor consider any more Duty in a man who hath unworthily violated all. By the orders of the King we are dispensed withal, and much better dispensed with by the cruel injury he hath done us. Thou shalt feel inhumane Brother, or rather cruel and unjust Rival, what a just resentment can work over a Spirit like mine; and that same hand which hitherto hath not fought but for thy greatness, shall at present without reluctance arm it self against thee: I will go seek thee in the midst of those barbarous people that favour thy crime, and with all that thou canst fear from a despairing Lover, bring against thee the thunder of an incens'd Father.

After

After these words he remain'd some time without speaking, revolving in his mind those different resolutions that presented themselves, and which all with one consent tended to the design he had to fight the Ravisher of Hunnimonda; and a little after, casting his eyes on that place of the Letter, where he promised him, that he should without difficulty possess Hunnimonda, if he redeemed her out of the hands of her Ravisher, he found in this promise a cause of joy sufficient to comfort a part of his grief, and judg'd, that it was not impossible, but it might prove for his happiness, that Mundisic had taken away Hunnimonda, and that one of the greatest obstacles he had was taken away, since the King, who hitherto had not declared, and who possibly durst not have done it, had not the ingratitude of Mundisic oblig'd him to it, had now freed him from that difficulty, and engag'd himself by a promise he could not violate. "Let us comfort our selves, (said he, having for some time entertain'd this thought) let us, with those reasons we have to do it, comfort our selves, and believe, that we are not absolutely miserable, since we march to the conquest of Hunnimonda. Hitherto have we fought for glory, or for the greatness of Mundisic; Mæsia, Sarmatia, and Pannonia, have seen me gain Battels, either for their Repose, or Conquest, but at present it is Hunnimonda must be the price of my Victory, and since I am assur'd, that delivering her from the hands of Mundisic, she is to pass into my Arms, and be mine, without any Rival to dispute her, let us march with joy to an assur'd Victory. I could overcome at other times without benefitting my self by my advantages, but it is for my self I must this day vanquish, and thou shalt with difficulty Mundisic oppose any thing to stop me, when I fight to possess Hunnimonda."

After these words, and by the thought which made him pronounce them, he in part comforted himself for his grief, and being willing to instruct himself more largely of what he had succinctly understood by the Letter of the King, he asked the Messenger who had brought it, and he being an intelligent person, and capable of something more important, made the Prince to understand, that it was most true, that all Sarmatia, in which Prince Mundisic had acted politickly, with a sweetness and lenity not natural to him, had taken Arms for him, and entirely joyn'd themselves to his interests; that he had chased from all places those Garrisons which were suspected to him for their fidelity to the King, and had placed in them his own creatures; that he had done the same with all Officers of Troops, which were not at his devotion, and not doubting but that for what he had done, and for what he had a design to do, he should have a War to sustain, he had made also great Levies through all Sarmatia. That the King would not believe this truth at the first news he received, but having the confirmation of it by the cashier'd Officers, and the Governours which Mundisic had sent back, and not being able to doubt it, before he would commence a war with his Son, he had sent one of the most considerable persons of his Court, to endeavour by sweetness to reduce him to his Duty; but Mundisic instead of answering the goodness of the King, retain'd the person he had sent, and while the King expected his return, not at all imagining that Mundisic would come into Dacia, he was secretly departed from Sarmatia, concealing himself diligently in all places where he pass'd, giving out, that they were Officers driven away by Mundisic, which retired, and in fine, managed his design with so much secrecy, that without being discovered he came one night to Adramita, (which is that House in the Country whither Hunnimonda was retired with the Queen her Mother, before our departure, and where she had ever since remained) forced the House, and took away the Princess with only one Lady; that this had proved so much the more easie to him, because the House stood near the way between Alba Julia and Sarmatia, by the Country of the Agatirses, and that before the King could have any advice at Alba Julia, Mundisic was got four days journey on his way; that the King had not been wanting to send after him, and to go himself to Adramita, to see the Queen of the Goths, who not able to support this affliction, had been taken with a Fever, which in six days had bereaved her of life, to the great grief of all the Court, and particularly of the Queen of the Huns, who would not be comforted; that the King had done all that it was possible for him to do, to succour Hunnimonda, but that all his endeavours had been in vain, and that he understood by those whom he had sent after Mundisic, that he had repass'd the Mountains with his fair prey, and was re-entred into Sarmatia.

This recital again renewed the grief of Balamir, but having already taken his resolution, he render'd himself Master of his griefs, to acquit himself of his Duty, and the same day having given to the valiant Kena, an absolute power over all that was to be done in Pannonia, of which Province he remained Governour, he gave orders to cause his Army to depart the day following, and in effect, they departed on the morrow, with himself at their head, from the City of Herculia, where we then were, in the Country of the Arabisques. We marched

marched towards the Danube, which we passed at Aquinum, and came to the Country of the Jafiges, where the Troops which the King had sent, arrived as soon as we, and of which, with those he led back from Pannonia, he formed the Body of an Army stronger than that which he had led to the conquest of Pannonia, with these Forces he marched towards the Carpathian Mountains, which are not far distant from the Jafiges, and entered without difficulty into Sarmatia.

Though the violent passion which agitated him, seemed to have abated somewhat of his natural sweetness, and that he marched to this War with more anger and animosity than he had done to all others, yet he amused not himself to lay waste those places where he found no resistance, though he looked upon the whole Country as an enemy's; but seeking only Mundisic and Hunnimonda, he marched towards the places where he believed to find them, without stopping, save only there where his passage was disputed, and it was disputed with him in many places, and that with infinite obstinacy: but not finding any thing hard to overcome in that ardour which carried him to the Combat, he passed violently through all that opposed him, and having harassed like a violent Torrent, the Country of the Roxolans, and that of the Almanobiens, whom he first found in his passage, he advanced into Sarmatia, and marched without delay towards the City of Cephalonese, where he understood that Hunnimonda was with Mundisic. It is true, that the respect the Sarmatians had for him, since that glorious expedition he had made into their Country, and the remembrance they had preserv'd of the good and fair usage he practis'd toward them, hindered them from doing all that was possible for them to endamage him, and finding before, more appearance to hope victory should attend his party, than that of Mundisic, they would not incense him so much as they might have done, that they might be in a better estate to make their peace according to the event of the War, and by this means they gave him greater opportunities to approach what he sought, than if they had obstinately resolv'd to maintain the interests of Mundisic.

In the mean time that Prince slept not, though his passion was strong enough to make him forget all things but a care to preserve Hunnimonda; but as neither in valour nor intelligence in war he thought himself inferior to Balamir, and as he knew well that in revolts safety consists in diligence, and that if Rebel-parties produce not their effect with speed, they destroy themselves by time, and by those incommodities which the people suffer, in sustaining a long war, knowing himself stronger in men than Balamir, he resolv'd to decide that war by one Battel, the event of which he hoped would be favourable; rather than amuse himself to defend the Country by foot and foot, and draw the war to a greater length (as it had been easie for him to do, by reason of the large extent of the Country, and the great number of fortified places in Sarmatia) not being assured of the constancy of the people, and fearing, after the miseries of war, they would accept any conditions of peace, and forsake his interests.

There was some appearance that it was this which obliged him to act as he did, being sufficiently experienced in war to know the fault he committed in exposing all his Forces to the hazard of a Combat, without keeping any reserve to supply and re-enforce him in those necessities he might be driven to, if Fortune were contrary to him. Balamir understood with infinite joy that he took that resolution, and though he knew himself the weaker in number of men, yet confiding in the valour of his own, and the justice of his quarrel, he easily resolv'd to give him Battel if he presented it, and understanding that he was parted from Cephalonese, to come to us with an Army of a hundred thousand Soldiers, he went to meet him by little journeys, that he might not too much weary his Troops, and by his confidence and discourses, prepared his men not to fear the number of their enemies in so just a quarrel, and under the conduct of a Captain, with whom they had hitherto been invincible.

Before Mundisic approached us, he caused certain Pamphlets to be cast among our Troops, by which, having set forth the rashness of Balamir, who durst come to make war against his elder Brother, he exhorted all the men of war to quit his party, and to take that of a Prince who was one day to be their King; and to those offers which he made them of all sorts of good usage, if they would betake themselves to his party, he added threats of all they might fear from his anger, when he should come to the Crown. But this Artifice was very unprofitable: for all those either of the Soldiers or Officers, who found those Pamphlets, either tore them without any regard, or brought them to Balamir. My Prince acted with him in a manner much different: for before the Armies were within a days journey of each other, he writ him a Letter, wherein, after all the submissions to which Mundisic could pretend, he prayed him to pardon his boldness to come in Arms against him, and to accuse for it the obedience he ought to his Father, and the despair it to which he had cast him by taking away Hunnimonda. In fine he conjured him by all that honour and the duties of his blood could have in them of most obliging, to return to the obedience of his Father, who held out his Arms, to him and to render liberty to a Princess whose heart he should assail by other Arms than violence, and promising him on the behalf of the King, according to his charge not to preserve any remembrance of the injury he had done her, protested to him that for this Action he would not pretend any advantage with Hunnimonda, but what his love and services might procure. There were many other things in this Letter sufficient to flatter the pride of Mundisc, and to make him see the advantage he might find in the propositions of Balamir, if he would hearken to them: But instead of having any consideration for them, he tore the writing in a thousand pieces, and had caused him to be taken Prisoner who brought it, if the Officers had not used all their credit with him to hinder it.

After this they marched without delay to the battel one against the other, and Mundisc not being so well assured in a rebellious and unconstant people, as to trust them with a treasure much more precious than his life, and fearing that their inclinations might change according to the events of War, and lest if fortune should be contrary to them they should deliver Hunnimonda to the Conquerour, he led her with him at his departure from Cepharonse, and the day before he gave Battel shut her up in Pasiris, a Castle strong both by its situation and the diligent care he had taken to fortifie it, and left her under the guard of Bela him of all his dependents, in whom he had the most confidence, and who remain'd with her with two thousand men which were sufficient for the defence of the Castle, and which were chosen out of those he led out of Dacia.

It was in a fair Plain very near the River Hiparis that the two Armies first saw each other, and there it was that a cruel and bloody Battel was fought for the liberty of Hunnimonda. Before the last signals were given, Balamir gave command to all the Souldiers to respect in the fight the person of Mundisc as if he were their King, and to take care upon pain of death not to let fly an Arrow in that place where he fought; and he took thus great dilligence for the preservation of Mundisc, while Mundisc sought his particular destruction more than the gain of the whole battel, promising great recompenses to those who could kill Balamir. I will not tell you the particulars of this battel, no more than I have done of all the rest of which I have spoke to you, though there happened in this things so memorable as to merit mention. The Combat was long, bloody and resolute, the Souldiers hardy and warlike, and the two Captains both the one and the other great Commanders, though somewhat unequal: and if one of the two were animated to a fury, the other had so great an interest in victory, that he spared nothing that might achieve it, save only the life of Mundisc, whom he might had he pleased have slain in the Fight, but he not only defended him from his own Arms but from those of all his. Mundisc sought him often in the fight and many times called him with a loud voice, but Balamir used all endeavours to shun his encounter, and contented himself to vanquish in all parts where he shewed himself without seeking victory in the person of his Brother: But to obtain it for us he did things past belief, as well for his good conduct as for a thousand effects of a prodigious valour: and in fine he forc'd it to declare in our favour and remain as entirely to us as we could desire. The greatest part of the Army of Mundisc was cut in picces, and the rest disperced in such manner that it was almost impossible for his Captains to rally any, I say his Captains, for, for himself he used no endeavours, though he had nobly behav'd himself during the fight: but so soon as he saw the Battel was lost, having exclaim'd against heaven and his ill fortune, he forsook all things to return to Hunnimonda, and ran with all the swiftness possible to the Castle where he had left her. This diligence was necessary to prevent that of Balamir, for my Prince having understood from some Prisoners taken in the Battel in what place the Princess was shut up, no sooner saw the victory incline to us, but instead of amuting himself to pursue it as he might have done if he had had any such design, he commanded my Father and another Commander, who had one of the principal employments in the Army, to hinder them from rallying, and do what other things are necessary in these occasions in which he knew them very well experienced: and having commanded me to cause ten thousand Infantry to march after him with the greatest diligence possible, he flew towards Pasiris with three thousand Horse, and made such speed that though he arrived not so soon as Mundisc who in effect gain'd the place before him, yet he came time enough to prevent the design he had to carry away Hunnimonda, and conduct her to some other place where he might better defend her than in a Castle which in all likelihood could not long hold out against our Army. He foam'd with anger and grief when he saw our first Troops appear, which straight stopp'd all the passages and deprived him of all hopes of a retreat. The ten thousand Infantry which I led arrived some hours after, who wearied as they were readily placed themselves in the Posts appointed by the Prince, and the next morning the rest of the Army being arrived formed the Siege, and assaulted the place in their orders on all sides.

Mundisc now knew the fault he had committed, by permitting himself to be closed in, which he had not done, had he feared the loss of the Battel or foreseen the diligence of Balamir. My Prince praised the Gods for this happy progress of his good fortune, though he beheld with a mortal grief what Enemy his fortune gave him to combat, and the necessity to which he was reduced either to besiege his Brother or to abandon Hunnimonda. This mixture of good and ill, of hope and fear held him for some time in a cruel disturbance, and he made it known to those of his to whom he open'd himself more familiarly by words which sensibly touched them. I hope, said he to us, that we shall restore liberty to Hunnimonda, and if some strange misfortune befall us not, I foresee not how they can any long time defend her against us. But alas! what Enemies hath Heaven and my ill fortune pleased to give me? Or what repose can I find in my life, if to recover Hunnimonda I make my Brother lose his life? He is unjust towards me, he is cruel and seeks all ways to deprive me of my life, but his Arms cannot authorize mine, and though in the opinion of most part of men I am not at all obliged to spare him, the Gods are my witnesses, that if this misery should happen I should never more be capable of comfort. But what must I then do? added he a little after, Must I leave to him Hunnimonda? and with Hunnimonda must I give him my life? Or ought I to give him my honour engaged in her defence, and which permits me not to leave her to the mercy of her Enemy? But this Enemy, replied he to himself, is a Lover that adores her, and a Prince who may one day be one of the greatest Kings of the world, a Prince with whom she can never be unhappy, if she can but resolve to love him. But dost thou wish, continued he, that Hunnimonda should love Mundisc? Or whatever generosity thou wouldst practise, canst thou so soon and so easily forget thy own interest, as to desire Hunnimonda should be happy with Mundisc? fear rather lest that should happen against thy desire, and confess that death would be a thousand times more sweet to thee than the knowledge of so great a misfortune. It would but too soon come to pass, if the confidence thou hast in the promises of Hunnimonda, did not re-assure thee, there is but too much appearance that she would let her self be overcome, either by the great advantages of Mundisc or by the greatness of those difficulties Fortune hath opposed to us. This thought tormented him more cruelly than all others, so long as it could find any place in his mind, but it established it self there but weakly, and by the good opinion he had of the constancy and courage of Hunnimonda, all these fears were easily dissipated.

In the mean time he found himself much troubled to deliberate in what manner he ought to assault the Castle, not doubting but that if he gain'd it by storm, both the life of Mundisc and Hunnimonda her self might be exposed to some danger, but he saw himself soon delivered from this trouble, by the advice which he receiv'd that Mundisc having only shut up Hunnimonda in that Castle to keep her in security till after the Battel and not to sustain a siege, had not fortified it with any stores of victual, or at least with so little that two thousand men which were in it could scarce have enough for six days, and that there was some appearance that so soon as they should see themselves pressed with hunger, all the affection they might have for the interests of Mundisc, would not persuade them to attend the last extremities. Balamir found consolation in this advice, and resolved to starve his Enemies without making any enterprize upon them, and to guard the Avenues so well that nothing should enter into the Castle. This was easie for him to do, though he had not had the fourth part of the men he had. And in effect he gave such good Orders that the besieged soon lost all hopes of receiving any relief of provisions.

Mundisc soon knew his design, and the knowledge he had of it transported his Choler to extremity, and he made some of ours feel the effects of it by several Salleys which he made, and which he once or twice headed in person near the most neighbouring quarters of the Castle. He would likewise one day endeavour to pass through us, and retire with Hunnimonda whom he led with him: and to this purpose having made all his Cavalry mount on horseback he ordered them into three great Squadrons, which for the present overwhelmed all that stood in their way, and had opened a passage large enough to execute their designs, if Balamir whom the fear to lose Hunnimonda still kept awake, had not arriv'd in that place, and charged them with so much vigour, that Mundisc doubting lest he should lose his fair prey from which he durst not be absent, was constrained to retire and once more shut himself up in the Castle.

After that day he was shut up closer than before by the great diligence of Balamir, and in few days more he saw himself in that condition we expected for want of victuals, which so great

great a number of men had soon consumed. It was now that he transported himself with fury against Balamir, and that he writ him a Letter not like a vanquished man or one reduced to that ill estate in which he was, but like a Sovereign to his subject full of reproaches and injuries and all possible marks he could give of his fury. Balamir returned him an answer full of sweetness and respect, by which he declared, that though he had order from the King to pursue him as an Enemy, yet he had not forgot what he ought, and that it was not against his person he made war; that he might retire himself when he pleased either to the King his Father, who would without doubt receive him as his Son if he returned to his duty, or unto whatever place of the World he pleased; that he would give no hindrance to his retreat, nor yet to his stay in Sarmatia if he pleased, believing that out of the respect he ought him he might take the liberty to dispence with the rigour of the Kings orders; but that he demanded the liberty of Hunnimonda, which he was obliged to render her or to dye in the design. At this demand of Balamir's, and the resolution he testified for the liberty of the Princess, Mundisc transported himself with more violence than he had hitherto done, and let the Prince his brother know, that before he would retolve to surrender up Hunnimonda he would undergo the most terrible misfortunes.

In the mean time Victuals began to be wholly wanting in the Castle, where the little that remained being reserved for the Prince and Princess and a small number of those who were most dear to the Prince, all the others began to murmur, afterwards complained themselves very highly, when they felt themselves pressed with hunger, and in the end losing their patience declared to the Prince that they must either have food or of necessity yield. The Prince became furious in this extremity, and knowing well that he could not hope any assistance, and that as he had well foreseen after his defeat a part of Sarmatia had forsaken his party, and daily sent Deputies to Balamir to obtain the Kings pardon, by this intercession his Spirit began to be filled with direful resolutions, and he resolved with himself to execute them. We understood it from some Souldiers of his whom despair had made leap from the Walls in the night time; and those who were in a condition to be presented to Balamir, having been brought before him told him that all things in the Castle were in a terrible disorder: that all the souldiers and their officers, not able to suffer the terrible hunger that pressed them, were that night gone in a body to cry to Prince Mundisc, that he must of necessity either give them victuals, or yield or else lead them on to dye by the Arms of their Enemies, that this would be more sweet to them than that which they should suffer by famine, and that upon the place he should determine what to do since it was impossible for them to expect till the morrow. That the Prince at this proposition of theirs had been moved with so violent a Choler that having drawn his Sword he had slain two of the principal officers which had brought him word, and that his fury had likewise extended to many others, if the Princess Hunnimonda who was present at this Action, had not cast her self before him, praying him to kill her rather than for so long time render her the cause of so many miseries and the loss of so many thousand persons. That Mundisc had stopped at this discourse of the Princess, beholding her with eyes full of the fury which agitated him, and that he had made all those who saw him in that estate judge that he was capable to transport himself to more fatal resolutions. That by the reason of the action he had done and the despair to which they were reduced the Souldiers wanted but little to arm themselves against him, and that infallibly the day following would not pass without opening the Castle Gates, or delivering up Hunnimonda to Balamir.

This report touched the Prince with several different passions, but it wrought not on his Spirit all that effect we expected, and though he saw things proceed as he had desired, and beheld sufficient place to hope for what he had so much wished, that hope was accompanied with such cruel fears as were impossible for him to overcome, and made him only resent a joy to which he could not carry his thoughts without doubting greater miseries and terrible dangers. He imagined sometimes that possibly Hunnimonda her self was not exempted from that misery to which the others were reduced, and that he might perhaps be so unhappy as to make her perish by those Arms he employed for her deliverance: but when he recovered himself from this fear by the knowledge he had of the love of Mundisc, which in all likelihood would make him pass by all things himself, rather than see her suffer, that which he knew of his humour, and that which he understood of his rage which possessed him put other fears into his Soul, against which all his courage was not capable to assure him, and cast him into irresolutions which he could not vanquish. He passed the rest of that night in this manner without giving himself one moments sleep, walking at a great pace amongst us without speaking or without hearkning to those that spoke to him, not being able in any manner to determine what he had to do.

The day appeared before he could form any design, and the Sun was already mounted some degrees in the Firmament, before he could take any resolution, when some came to advertise him, that they founded some parleys from the Castle, which denoted some design to capitulate; and soon after, one came to tell him, that Mundisc appeared on the Rampart of the Castle, and demanded to speak with him. Balamir trembled at this discourse, and without knowing the cause, felt that fear redouble which had for some hours before tormented him; he prepared himself however to speak with Mundisc, and when we would represent to him, that in the fury which possess'd the Spirit of that Prince, and which might have blotted out in him all considerations of honour, he was not in security from those Arrows might be shot from the Castle, if he approached too nigh, Ab would to God, said he, that I had nothing more cruel to fear from Mundisc. We constrain'd him however to arm himself, to reassure us the better from the fear we had for him, though himself was capable of none for himself. He had scarce put on his Armour, when some came to advertise him, that the Princess Hunnimonda was seen with Mundisc upon the Ramparts. This last advice made him again tremble, by reason of some presentiments, which rendred him as fearful in this occasion, as he had appeared to us assured in all other dangers to which we had seen him expos'd; however, departing from his Tent, without speaking, he advanced (with a great Troop of his Friends and Soldiers accompanying him) to the very brink of the Ditch, directly opposite to the place where he saw Mundisc and the Princess Hunnimonda appear.

The Ditch was not so large, nor the Rampart so high, but from that place he might easily discern their Visages, and distinctly understand their words; and his love making him immediately cast his eyes on the beloved Object, which he had not for a long time seen, he beheld that admirable Beauty, the image of which had been so well graven in his memory, but he beheld on her countenance, in her habit, and in all her person, the marks of her grief. Her Habit, besides the sadness it expressed in its colour, expressed likewise the estate of her condition by its negligence, and that of her dressing, and all that was upon her whole person; testified sufficiently the little care she took to appear fair to the eyes of Mundisc. But however, she was so, though contrary to her design, but somewhat more wan, languishing, and pale, than ordinary, and we judged, by the estate wherein we saw her, that no accident could ruine that Cœlestial Beauty. The amorous Balamir cast his eyes on her eyes, and kept them there so firmly fixed, as rendred him incapable of all other things, and we observed with him, that the Princess beheld him with an aspect which appeared no less passionate than his.

He spoke not to her but by his eyes, and with his sighs, not being able to tell her what he had on his heart; and judging well, that he was called for some other intent, than to tell Hunnimonda what he sented for her. He acted however a violence to his passion, to turn towards Mundisc, to whom he was to speak, and having cast his eyes upon him, he saluted him with the same marks of respect that he would have rendred him at another time, and upon a better occasion. Mundisc took little notice of his civility, but beholding him with eyes in which his fury was fully pourtrai'd; Thou triumphest Balamir, said he, and see'st thy self there Vanquisher of a Brother who ought to be thy King, but thy triumph shall not be such as thou dost expect, and I hope that thou wilt weep for thy victory as well as I. I have not expected so much my Lord, replied Balamir very modestly, and you may well judge, that again'st such an enemy, I cannot obtain any pleasing victory; nor is it like a Conquerour I appear before you, nor pretend I other triumphs, or other advantages, from our victory, than that, to render liberty to a Princess, whom, both you and I adore, and whom you ought not to keep Captive, if it be true you love her. I know well, replied Mundisc, it is Hunnimonda thou demandest, and it is my life thou would'st deprive me of with Hunnimonda; thou shalt have her, if thou dost desire it, since my ill fortune hath reduc'd me to a necessity to render her to thee, but thou shalt have her in an estate will not permit thee to rejoyce in it.

These words made Balamir tremble, scarce finding speech to express his trouble to Mundisc. And in what estate, said he, can you give me Hunnimonda, which will hinder me from receiving her with joy? Thou shalt know that in few moments, replied the Prince, but thou shalt first understand, that her destiny depends on thee; and to pronounce thee the good, rather than the ill, I will tell thee, that if thou wilt see her thy Sister, if thou wilt see her thy Queen, thou mayest this day do it, by consenting that she espouse Mundisc. Balamir remained for some time silent, without being able to answer this Proposition, but in the end, seeking words to explain himself in a matter so intricate; If the Princess, (said he, with a trembling voice) will forget Balamir, to espouse Mundisc, I will not oppose her will; and if she believes, she can be happy with Mundisc, I will sooner lose my life, than trouble her felicity. No, no, (cry-ed the Princess with great precipitation) I cannot be happy with any other than Balamir, and Captive as I am, I confirm to him the word I have given him, never to be any persons, if I be not his. If it be so, (cryed Balamir, raising his courage by the consolation these words had given him) if it be so, Hunnimonda shall never be Spouse to Mundisic whilst Balamir is living, and it must be by the death of Balamir that he must open his way to the possession of Hunnimonda. If that way were open to me, replyed Mundisic, I would follow it with joy, but since my ill fortune hath stopp'd it, I will follow that it hath left me, to revenge my self sufficiently of thee, and to hinder thee to build thy happiness on my ruine; if thou dost not fear anything from thy natural Prince, thou mayst fear all things from a despairing Lover; and consider, that I am yet Master of the destiny of Hunnimonda, though thou believest to be so of mine; thou shalt have her however, since thou wilt, and that I am in no estate to defend her longer against thee, but it shall not be alive that thou shalt see her in thine Arms, and thou oughtest resolve thy self in a moment either to abandon her for ever, or receive her at the feet of these Walls in the estate I go to send her thee.

Finishing these words, he drew his Sword from his Scabbard, and by that action, as well as by his words, struck a cruel fear into the Soul of Balamir, which not being able to express, but by a cry, he pierced the Heavens with a voice so resounding, as obliged all those who were near Mundisic, and Mundisic himself, to turn their eyes towards him. How Mundisic, (cryed he, wholly transported) wilt thou be so cruel as to kill Hunnimonda? I would do more, said Mundisic, to hinder thee from possessing her, and rather than give her thee, I will sacrifice with her the whole world to my despair. Consider cruel one, (added the Prince, overwhelmed with grief) consider the difference between us, though I consent that Hunnimonda should be thine, if she desire it, yet thou wilt give her a death, to hinder her from being mine. And you who assist at this horrible Spectacle, (continued he, beholding those that were about him) save Hunnimonda from his fury, and fear, if you do not, all that rage can inspire of most cruel against you into a despairing Lover.

Those to whom these words were address'd, beheld each other with fear, and Mundisic possibly doubting some effect might hinder the execution of his design, Know, said he to Balamir, that I am Master among mine, and to give thee proofs, that I have too long deferred it, receive Hunnimonda, whom I send thee. Speaking these words, he, with his Sacrilegious hand, laid hold on the Princess's fair hair, and with the other, distancing his Sword, to put himself in an estate to drive it into her Bosom; Pardon me Princess, said he, an effect of Love, rather than cruelty, and since you cannot be mine, suffer me, that I defend you from being any others in the world. At these words he was about to pierce her Stomach, which she courageously held forth, or at least, by his action, he made all those which beheld him judge it, when he had his ear struck with a second cry of Balamir, but a cry much more resounding than the first, and a cry accompanied with the most vehement words he could pronounce to hinder the effect of his cruel resolution; Hold Barbarian, said he, I yield to thee Hunnimonda, I abandon to thee Hunnimonda.

These words, the only ones which apparently could work that effect, stopp'd the Arm of Mundisic; and in the posture wherein he was, turning his eyes towards the despairing Balamir; Think not, said he, to abuse me with words, but if thou wilt that Hunnimonda should live, make thy Troops at this instant depart hence, and afterwards out of Sarmatia. Yes, yes, replyed the disconsolate Prince, I will depart from Sarmatia, and depart from the world, if thou wilt, to save the life of Hunnimonda. How Balamir, (cryed the Princess, calling her eyes upon him), Do you give me then to Mundisic? Now I choose rather to give my self to death, to preserve me to you. I had rather give you to Mundisic, replyed the afflicted Prince, than give you to death, and much more willingly would I see you in the Throne of my Fathers, than in your Tomb. Ah feeble Prince, replyed Hunnimonda, Is it thus thou forsakest me, by a fear unworthy thy courage? Or dost thou fear, that a man who loves me, will be capable to take away my life? I fear all things from that cruel one, replyed the Prince, I fear all things from my ill fortune, to which I see my self miserably left, nor have I so much courage, as to suffer one threat of your death. Depart instantly from this fatal place, (continued he, turning to his Officers about him) depart from Sarmatia, and lead me to death, since I cannot go but to death after the loss of Hunnimonda.

Pronouncing these words, he was seized with so violent a grief, that his strength was not able to sustain him, and his eyes covering themselves with darkness, he remained without sense, or knowledge in our Arms; we carried him to his Tent, and laid him on his Bed, where he remained a long time in that estate, and when he was come to himself, turning his eyes on all sides, and remembering the miserable estate of his condition, he wanted little to relapse into a second Fit, from which possibly our assistance had not been able to recover him; so soon as he opened his mouth, he demanded if the Troops were disencamped about Pafiris; and having understood that they yet attended his Orders, How, (said he, with those sighs which interrupted the course of his words) Will they kill me by this delay? and not consider, that whilst we are here, the life of Hunnimonda is in danger? At these words he rose from his Bed, though he had scarce strength enough to support himself, and having commanded the Troops which were nearest the Castle to disencamp with speed, and leave all passages free to the besieged, he mounted on Horseback, and marched towards Toracia, which is half a days journey from Pafiris; and in his way to return to Dacia. Turning his back to the fatal House in which he had abandoned Hunnimonda, he cast towards it his eyes swollen with tears, and opening his mouth with a multitude of sighs, which scarce permitted him to speak, Adieu Hunnimonda, cryed he, and since it must be so, adieu Hunnimonda for ever. He accompanied these words but with very few others, and the rest of that day he expressed his grief only by his silence, much more doleful than if he had done it by words. All the endeavours we used to divertise him proved vain, and when we knew that we were troublesome to him, and that he answered us only by sighs, and a river of tears, which all his courage could not hinder from trickling down his cheeks, we were constrain'd to leave all repose, and to follow him, with a silence which did not ill accompany that which his had in it of dreadful. Those who marched nearest to him understood sometimes some words cut off by sobs, but as he pronounc'd them according to those thoughts, which made him open his mouth, the most common were generally these; Yesterday, said he once, I hoped, that this day Hunnimonda should be mine, and this very day I lose Hunnimonda for ever; O Gods, what terrible change is this in the space of one day? Another day, being near him, I heard him pronounce these words very low, which he address'd as it were to Mundisc; And well, cruel one, said he, see thy self now possessor of Hunnimonda, whilst nothing rests to the unfortunate Balamir, but the very despair of having a part in her.

Arriving at Toracia, he commanded my Father, and the other Commanders to take care of the Army, declaring to them, that he could no longer think of it, and that they ought neither longer to hope any orders or counsel from him, no more than if he had not been in the world. These marks of so lively and profound a grief, and of a grief we durst not condemn, after the knowledge we had of its cruel cause, touched us in the very midst of our hearts, but we were much more concern'd, when after he had passed the most cruel night that imagination could represent to us, on the morrow he was seized with a Fever, so violent, that immediately by all Symptoms it appeared dangerous. He would however have risen, but his strength failed him, and in twenty four hours he was more weaken'd, than a man, vigorous like him, could in all probability have been in eight days. When he knew the danger of his disease, he was glad instead of afflicting himself, and turning his eyes towards me, whom he ordinarily saw nearest his person, as to him who without doubt bore him the greatest affection, I praise the Gods, said he to me, that I shall not survive the loss of Hunnimonda, and if thou lovest me Telanor, thou oughtest to rejoice as well as I. O Death, saide he a little after, how much art thou desired of a heart that can love nothing but thee, having lost all it loved, and having lost it, added he, in so terrible a manner? At this discourse, and others little different, he made all those who hearkened to him, burst into tears, and reaching forth his hand sometimes to one, and sometimes to another, according to the affection he had for them, We believed not my friends, said he, that beginning so happy, shou'd have an end so deplorable; but it is the will of the Gods, and I submit to it my self without murmuring.

On the second day of his sickness, he commanded that the Troops should depart, and pursue their marching without halting, till they came out of Sarmatia, not believing that whilst he had a man of our party in Arms, the life of Hunnimonda could be in security: and he commanded it so absolutely, that whatever regret the Officers had to abandon him, they were forced to obey, and there remain'd no more than those of his own House with him at Toracia. At first his grief made him refuse all remedies, and that very sustenance which was presented to him: but being of a sweet spirit, and naturally full of tenderness and goodness, the affliction he observed amongst his Attendants touched him, and to please them and assuage their grief in a time wherein it was comfortless, he received what they gave him, but in a manner which made them well judge the little fruit he hop'd or desired. In few days his weakness encreas'd in such manner, that almost all hope of his recovery was lost; and as for his goodness and admirable virtues he was adored by all his friends, there was possibly none did not resent the danger of his Matter, as strongly as if himself had had been threatned with it, and who did not deplore with tears of blood, if it may be so spoken, the loss of the fairest hopes were ever conceived, and the loss of a Prince, who in his three and twentieth year, already by his great actions, equalled the chiefest of those famous men, which had for many past ages been known in the world. The heat of his Fever depriving him of a part of his knowledge and reason, made him sometimes extravagant in his discourses, and in those intervals, having his imagination replete with the misfortune befallen him, he spoke of nothing else, but continually address'd his discourse to Hunnimonda, or Mundisic, Ab my Princess, said he sometimes, remember that you cannot be other than mine, and that if you be not mine, you ought never to be any persons; and then turning himself towards us with as much readines as his strength would permit, Ab my friends, said he, succour Hunnimonda, whom Mundisic is about to destroy. Stop cruel one, added he, and do not dare to kill Hunnimonda; pierce rather this bosom which I present, and take away Balamir's life to make Hunnimonda die, for she will else continually live in his heart.

I abuse your patience, my Lords, though I should without doubt beget in you a pity, if I should recount to you all the particulars of the sickness and grief of Balamir; it is true they were not of the same continuance, for after his recovery of the first, his grief continued as lively and violent as it had been at its first spring. Having been reduced to the last extremity, he recovered by the will of the Gods, who gave his life to our tears and prayers; but he received without doubt the knowledge of his recovery in no other manner than he had done that of any other mischief. It seem'd likewise, that his grief, after having lain as it were, some time in a slumber, by reason of the violence of his Fever return'd with all its strength, and still gained new force as his body gained strength. How, (said he to us one day, after the Physicians had assur'd us he was out of danger) Is death it self refused to the unfortunate Balamir? and that death which often cuts off the fairest lives when not desired, can it cruelly refuse its assistance to a miserable that demands it? My Lord, (said I, finding my self now near him, as I continually was) if you had reason to desire death, the Gods would not have refused it you: but by the diligence they have to preserve your life in so great a danger, they make us judge they reserve you to a better fortune. And to what fortune can I be reserved, reply'd he, since I have lost Hunnimonda? You have not possibly lost her, reply'd I, though you have left her to Mundisic; and it is very likely, that a person whom you beheld despising death for you, when she saw it presented to her eyes, will have the constancy to resist him to the end. Though what you say should be true, reply'd the Prince, I ought not to desire it, for since by those means I have unfortunately attempted, I cannot redeem Hunnimonda out of the hands of Mundisic, I ought rather wish that she should be his Spouse than his Captive, and that she should, if it were possible, find repose, glory, and happiness with him, than continually remain expos'd to his violence and cruelty. If she could be happy with Mundisic, I should have only my own misfortune to deplore, whilst by the mixture of hers and mine, in the condition I have left her, I am doubly unfortunate. However, concluded he with a sigh, whatever consolation I can find in the constancy of Hunnimonda, I cannot flatter my self with this unjust hope, and though Hunnimonda hath had sufficient courage to despise death, there are other dangers for her she cannot despise, and misfortunes too great not to make her rather accept Mundisic for her Spouse, than be expos'd to them.

By this discourse it seem'd that the Prince foresaw the news he was soon to receive, for two days after, by the imprudence of the principal Inhabitants of Toracia, who visited him, he understood that after our departure from Pasiris, Mundisic had the same day removed, and was retired to Olbia, a fair City, seated near the mouth of the River Hispanis, and which was entirely at his devotion; that he had employed some days to settle his affairs in Sarmatia, and that in the end he had espoused the Princess Hunnimonda. Though Balamir was prepared to receive this news, and seem'd to have expected it, with a resolution to suffer it constantly, yet however he could not receive it, but with that augmentation of grief he had not before prov'd and which wanted but little to conduct him to his Tomb; he fell into those great weaknesses which made us fear a relapse of his Fever, his eyes stream'd down rivers of tears, and he uttered the most affectionate expressions in the world; and when after the first days were past, I endeavour'd to make him remember what he had told me concerning that Marriage, and those reasons by which he had testified to me, that he desired it, rather than feared it, Yes Telanor, said he, I had reason to desire it, and I have reasons at present to afflict my self. If I were of force to lose Hunnimonda, as I did believe I should, I ought to desire she should be Wife to Mundisic, and not eternally his slave: but at that time the Gods might have adied a miracle in my favour, but at present by all their power I cannot hope it, though Mundisic should die, though he would restore Hunnimonda to me, she cannot be mine, having espoused my Brother, so that where-ever I seek my remedy or consolation, I can find it no where but in death.

This cruel news was confirm'd to us from day to day, and in little time it was spread through all Sarmatia though the particulars of this Marriage were never recourted, by which it might be judg'd in what manner Hunnimonda had received the change of her condition, nor any thing else said but that after her Marriage she had been seen by very few persons. The Prince could not at present, notwithstanding what he had some days before said for her justification, hinder himself from sometimes accusing her of infidelity and weakness, and at some times likewise suspecting her to have permitted herself to be overcome by the splendour of Mundic's fortune; and some motions he had to desire this to be true that he might have more reason to comfort himself for the loss of an unfaithful person: but this belief would scarce serve him in his desire, for he was so well persuad'd of the generosity of Hunnimonda, that it was difficult for him to receive a contrary impression.

I will not extend my self farther on what I might tell you of the grief of my Prince, you will apprehend it less by the discourse I can make you than by the knowledge I have given you of the greatness of his love. In fine, notwithstanding the obstacle it brought to his perfect recovery, by the assistance of Heaven and our care he gain'd both his health and strength, and found himself in a condition to mount on horseback and carry through the world that cruel enemy of his repose which rendred it self Mistress of his Soul. He departed from Toracia so soon as he could, but it was with design to absent himself from those places where he had lost all, and from those places where he had likewise been happy, and not to return to the King his Father. He understood by advices from him some days before, that he was incens'd against him and had accus'd him of weakness for having abandoned Sarmatia to Mundic, and being wanting to execute his Orders to the full: But it was not this hindred his return to Court: he confid'd sufficiently in his innocence, and in the greatness of the services he had done for the Crown, to believe he should receive any ill usage, but he resolv'd to flee from a place where all he could see would but renew his grief and never reenter into that Kingdom where the cruel enemy of his life was to reign.

But because he would wander in the world without splendour or noise, or as one that sought death, believing in the search of it he had no need of any great train, at his departure from Toracia he sent all his household into Dacia; keeping only with him my self and seven or eight men who obstinately resolv'd to accompany him to death and whose affection he could not refuse. He gave to those he sent back the greatest part of what he had in gold and jewels, and I had some difficulty to retain what was necessary for our journey. He gave them likewise Letters of recommendation to the Queen, by which he pray'd her to recompence those services they had done him, and he charg'd them with one Letter to the King the words of which were these.

Prince Balamir to the King of the Huns.

I have not been unfaithful Sir, though I have been weak; nor is it by intelligence with Mundic that I have abandoned to him Sarmatia. I was too enamour'd to execute your Orders, and you ought to have given them to a man to whom something in the world was less dear than the life of Hunnimonda. I must confess I have sacrific'd all to her preservation, but with your interests I have well forgot my own, and with Sarmatia you know what I have abandoned. You may reduce him easily to his duty, now that he is possessor of what made him violate it; and if I may beg of you any favour, I will beg of you pardon for the Husband of Hunnimonda.

With that little Equipage I told you he departed from Toracia, and because he would turn his back to Dacia, to Scandia, to Gosbia, to Pannonia, and to all the Realms of the King his Father, he followed the banks of the River Tebesus to Harmonacie where he embark'd in the Euxine Sea to pass into Asia. It is not your pleasure my Lords that I should recount to you the particulars of our journeys, in which there is nothing of what you desired from me though there happened many strange adventures, and that in the design which Balamir had to seek death or at least to flee from life as much as possible, he did Actions truly admirable in all those occasions that offer'd themselves. We cross'd the Euxine Sea, left Ibrace and the streight of Bizantium on our right hand, and at length landed at Heraclia. We pass'd thence into Papblagonia, saw Cappadocia and Bithynia, and ran through Armenia, Lydia, and Pamphilia.

Balamir stopp'd at all places where he found War, and joyning himself to that party he believed believed most just, in the first encounters so signaliz'd himself, that he could not remain unknown, but so soon as his valour had produced this effect he stole it to other places where he believed he might better conceal it, still departing so soon as he began to be observed. In this manner he spent a whole year, during which time I can with truth say, to justify him from the accusation you have rais'd against him, that the remembrance of Hunnimonda was still as present in his memory as it had been at our departure from Sarmatia; nor saw I any hope he would ever be comforted for so great a loss, though he considered the Action differently according to the different agitation of his soul, and that oftentimes he could not hinder himself from accusing her of infidelity.

But O Gods! what increase of affliction was his, when at a Port of the Lydian Sea at which we once more embark'd to pass the Aegean straits he found some Merchants of Messia by whom he was known, and from whom he understood all that he could farther understand, which was the death of the deplorable Hunnimonda. We understood from them in effect that Mundisc had no long time enjoyed his happiness, and that in the same City where he had espous'd his Princess he had soon after lost her by a sudden death, and of which few people had known the particulars: That he had appear'd desperate and had for a long time refus'd all consolation: but that in the end he was return'd into Dacia, where the King had receiv'd him, and seeing him sufficiently punished by his grief had pardon'd what was past.

This news in all likelihood ought not to have caus'd too violent an alteration in the spirit of a man who for a long time had lost all pretences to Hunnimonda: for whether she were unfaithful or that the miseries of her condition had reduced her to espouse Mundisc, most certain it is that Balamir lost nothing more and that other persons would have understood with a limited grief the punishment which heaven had inflict'd on their enemy. But Balamir acted not in this manner, for all that I have told you of the marks he gave of his grief at the first loss of Hunnimonda, was not comparable to what he made us behold in this last. He contented not himself to weep or lament, he would dye either by hunger or that element on whose waves we floated: and seeing that we continually observ'd him, he for several days refus'd all sort of nourishment, and if we had not been continually on our knees to conjure him to yield something to those persons who had so voluntarily sacrific'd their lives to his service, and renounc'd all things to fix themselves inseparably to the miseries of his life, we had difficultly oblig'd him to live. But in fine heaven assist'd us, and by its assistance we preserv'd a life so dear to us, and continued to see the deplorable progress of the rest of our voyages.

Being a long time weakn'd by his grief, and scarce able to sustain himself he preferred the Sea to the Land, were it whether he hated the Land on which he had receiv'd such bloody displeasures, or that he believ'd to find that more easily on the Sea what he had for a long time sought, and permitting himself to be carried by the Masters of the Ship in which we were, who were Sicilians, from the Aegean Sea, we enter'd into the Mediterranean, pass'd between Sicilia and Africa, left Sardigna on our right hand, and having coasted the Baleares and the most distant part of Spain which we saw on our left we set foot on shore at the City of the Massiliens.

Wearied with the Sea as well as Land he would no more return to it, but having remain'd some few days at the City of the Massiliens, we departed thence and enter'd into Aquitaine, travell'd the the greatest part of the Gaules and by Belgica came to the Banks of the Rhine, and pass'd it below Collen to enter into Germany: We travell'd through the Country of the Catti and that of the Cherusques, and being come to the banks of the Elba we approach'd the Frontiers of the Cimbrians or Bohemians. It was not the fame of the beauty of Rosamond, however great in the world, that oblig'd my Prince to take his course this way; and I can speak it with truth, that though two years were past since our departure from Sarmatia, and one since he understood the death of Hunnimonda, his grief was yet entire in his soul; nor saw I in him any disposition to hearken to those consolations we would give him, much less to receive any new impressi'on: but having understood of the War of the Franks and Burgundians against the Sueves and Cimbrians, of the defeat of the last, of the retreat of their Kings into Suevia; and in the end of the War then begun between the King of the Franks and the King of the Burgundians: he found so much justice and generosity in your proceedings my Lord, said Telaor to King Pharamond, and had already, whatever emulation the fame of your great Actions might excite in his soul, so great a respect for your fair reputation, that without consulting he resolv'd to embrace your party against that of Gondioch, and to fight unknown in your Army as he had done in other places either to serve a just cause, and a Prince whose renown had charm'd him, or in those Conflicts to find an end to that disquietful life that had so long been burthenfom to him.

He did what he could to be present at that Battel which was fought between you, but came a day too late: yet on the morrow he found reason to comfort himself for that delay by the encounter of the Princess Rosamond, whom Gondioch led away prisoner, and the occasion he had to do her a considerable service, by delivering her from the hands of her Ravisher. You have already known my Lord all that passed in that Action: nor are you more ignorant than other men that it was here that the soul of Balamir found its remedy against that grief which had for a long time possessed it, and that by a miracle which could not be produced but by the divine beauties of Rosamond, in a second loss of his liberty he lost the remembrance of Hunnimonda. It is true that so prodigious a change astonished me, but it was by reason of the little disposition I had seen in him to it, and not by the default of power in the beauty of Rosamond, sufficient to work a greater effect; nor by those reasons Balamir might have to defend himself: for it is certain that though he had not been recovered of the wounds he suffer'd by the encounter of the Princess of the Cimbrians, he had already done enough for the love and memory of Hunnimonda, not to fear any reproach though he had been capable to find a remedy in time and reason without any other succour: and I believe that though he had not these reasons to justify him, but had committed a real intidclity, the power that forced him would make his fault excusable. I will tell you however possibly to remove you from an opinion common to other persons, that it was not by the first sight of Rosamond, that Hunnimonda was banished from his mind, though he spoke some words accosting her that made some of that opinion. It is true that he was astonished and charm'd at the sight of that majestic beauty; but the remembrance of Hunnimonda, dead as she was, and unfaithful as he might believe her, before her death defended it self for some time against her, and quitted not the place till after a greater knowledge of all those wonders against which it is impossible to be defended.

I Confess, (said now the King of the Franks to Telanor, seeing he had done speaking) that Prince Balamir could not be accused of infidelity towards Hunnimonda, and that by her Marriage with another, and after by her death, he was dispensed from rendring so much as he was pleased to do to her love and to her memory. But with ceasing to accuse him I cannot from being astonished and with difficulty can I apprehend how a soul abandoned to love like that of Balamir, and which for this love had passed by all other considerations, and come with his elder Brother to those extremities you have recounted to me, and who after the loss of Hunnimonda in the space of two years, and in so long voyages could not find any solace to his grief, could so easily give way to a second affection. Yet possibly I wrong my self by being astonished, having felt as I have, the power of those divine beauties which have produced this effect; and I am reduced in the end to say, that if any other puissance had caused this change; I should not have apprehended it. "It is true, added the great Constance, that that which Telanor hath recounted to us of the love of Balamir, hath described a passion so strong, and a Constancy so great, as might make us believe that this impression would remain fixed in his Soul till death: but it is from admirable causes that we are to expect admirable effects; and though I have never seen the Queen of the Cimbrians, yet by what I have heard of her beauty, I should not wonder if she should cause unfaithfulness. "You would without doubt less astonish your self, replied the King of the Franks, if you had seen her, for it is difficult that by the recital any should make you apprehend the beauty of Rosamond: but though no person ought better than my self to agree to the certainty of the effects she is able to produce, I will yet attribute a part of this to my ill fortune, which, against all appearances and by ways so little ordinary, hath brought me from the extreme parts of Asia, a Rival, who for his merit is more formidable than all the rest: not but that I hope to dispute Rosamond against him with sufficient courage; but we shall give each other some trouble, and we began yesterday to prove that we cannot despise each other. I know well my Lord, said Telanor to him, that he hath more respect and esteem for you, than for all the rest of men, and as he hath always been of the humour to reverence virtue in the persons of his greatest enemies, and that he hath never had reason to be your foe; I assure my self that the love of Rosamond, though it arm his hand against you, doth not at all lessen in him that veneration the greatest of men owe to your self. I have often heard him speak before the Queen of the Cimbrians, and before your other Rivals, and dare assure you you have no friend pays you more justice than this generous enemy. He hath more reason than he believes, said now Constance, and if he remembers——Constance would have continued, when Pharamond judging well that he was about to speak of the obligation Balamir had to him for the assistance given him in the Country of the Bohemians against those Assassins that had assaulted him, not willing he should in this manner have the knowledge knowledge of it, took the hand of Constance and pressing it in his, at the same time made a sign to him with his eye which made him know his intention, and diverted him from the design he in effect had to speak of that encounter; and seeing that he stopp'd and that he sought to the discourse he had begun another continuance than what he had intended, he to assist him broke silence, and beholding Telanor in a very obliging manner, But Telanor, said he, you have not acquitted your self of what you promised us, nor have you let us understand any thing of what happened to Balamir since he became amorous of Rosamond. "My Lord, replied Telanor, "I have recounted to you what I believed you ignorant of, or at least what you could only "confusedly know; but for what hath happened to my Prince since his being in Germany, I "believe there are few things hid from you. I doubt not but you have understood his war- "like exploits against the Burgundians, whom he drove out of the Country of the Cimbrians "with those Forces the Princess gave him before the arrival of the King her Father, you have "understood the favourable reception the King gave him, of his stay at Lisurgis, and the dan- "ger to which he was expos'd by the treachery of some Assasins who would have murder'd "him, and had in effect done it by what himself confesses, had he not received succour by the "valour of a miraculous person, being wounded in such manner that he was forced to stay at "Lisurgis after the departure of the Princess to attend his cure, and could not arrive with her, "till after the loss of the Battel and the death of the King her Father. "We have understood "a part of what you say, said Pharamond, but there are other things which we may better "understand from you than from Renown, and having recounted to us so at length the loves "of Balamir and the Princess Hunnimonda, you say nothing to us of his love to the Queen "of the Cimbrians, and the progress he hath made in her affection since he hath been near "her. "My Lord, replied Telanor, I have made you the recital of all that hath befall'n to my "Prince in his loves with the Princess Hunnimonda, because I believed that that dis- "course was permitted me, and that there was no need of secrecy in things known to whole "Kingdoms, and which concern but one person no longer alive; but for what regards the "Queen of the Cimbrians I have not the same liberty: for when my Prince has trusted me the "secret, you may believe well my Lord, that it would not be comely for me to tell it you. "Without the interest that I have, replied the King sighing, I would not demand it of you: "but I believe you will easily pardon to a Lover that indiscretion which only curiosity makes "him guilty of. "To speak sincerely, replied Telanor, I believe that neither my Prince nor "my self have any secret to preserve in this interest; and though I believe and see that the "Queen shews by all sorts of proofs, that she esteems him more than all the other "Princes engaged in her concerns, as to speak truth for merit there is a notable difference, "and that she would declare her self in his favour much rather than in that of all others, I "think, and my Prince will not be troubled when I shall speak it, that the sentiments she "hath for him extend not beyond civility or what is due to his desert. "Balamir may me- "rit more, said the King of the Franks sighing, and it is this which causes my disquiet; but "the miserable Pharamond would be most happy if he could hope only good will in a heart "which could banish her hatred for him. However it be, I could wish with all my heart "that the Gods would again raise up Hunnimonda for Balamir, and leave me to dispute Ros- "samond with all the rest. "Though Balamir be our enemy, (said Prince Marcombie who "had not yet spoken) I confess that I have never been more tenderly touched by any recital "than that of his misfortunes, and that I could dedicate tears to his miseries and those of the "Princess Hunnimonda. "It is true, added the valiant Artabure, that this Princess was wor- "thy of a better fortune, and by the description which Telanor hath made, I believe there are "few persons among us, have not been touched with Fortunes hard dealing with her. "I "have repented it at the midst of my heart, said the Prince Sunnon. "And I have seen, ad- "ded Phagabers, that Priam and Ibere have had their eyes moistned as well as my self. "For "my part, said Genebaud, I never weep, but I am assured there is no person in the company, "who bears more hatred than my self to the cruel Mundisic. "Would to God, said King "Pharamond, that fortune had given me him for Rival instead of his brother, I should less "fear him though he were already possessour of the Estate of the King his Father, and that "he strengthened our enemies with an Army of an hundred thousand men. "But if Rosa- "mond fell into his hands, said Charamont, you would gain nothing by this change: for you "would fear more his Sword at such a time than you would fear all those of our enemies in "in the sharpest Combat. "I should without doubt fear it more, replied the King, and I "will moreover tell you, that I would without long consulting do the same thing with Ba- "lamir. "I know not, said Meroveur, whether he did not a little too much precipitate that "Action, nor can I believe that if he had remained resolute to the end, Mundisic could truly "have transported himself to kill Hunnimonda. "Such an act of cruelty is not without “example, (replied Ihere:) for there are many persons, whom jealousy and despair hath made to commit the like. “It might be, said Constance, that Mundisic would only affright Balamir, but however, it was not easie to run that hazard, to tempt a man so passionately amorous; and as in that incertitude, he had scarce a moment to lose, in the decision of the life or death of Hunnimondz. I confesse as well as the King, I should not have delayed to act as he did. “You may assure Balamir, said Pharamond to Telanor that among his enemies he may find friends to serve him against Mundisic if they had yet any occasion, and that our interests cannot hinder us from respecting virtue, and it is that which makes me always put a difference between him and our other Rivals; but we shall have sufficient opportunities to know our selves better than now we do. To these words he added yet others intermingled with sweetness and frendship, and after Supper, Telanor took leave of him, and had the liberty to return to his Master at his pleasure, having received all sort of civility and good usage.

The End of the Third Book of the Fourth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

THis illustrious Company were about the end of their Supper, when Valerius, whom Constance had sent to the Enemies Camp, enter'd the Chamber, with two men which accompanied him. All that regarded the Queen of the Cimbrians, so sensibly touching the King of the Franks, he could not see a person who came from her, and who ought to tell them news of her, without being surpris'd with some alteration, which was observ'd by all those who cast their eyes on his Countenance: And Constance causing Valerius to approach, commanded him to tell what he had done with the Queen of the Cimbrians. My Lord, said he, I have done what you commanded me, and obtain'd (if the King agree to it) a little more than you have demanded. The Queen of the Cimbrians hath shewed a great esteem for your name, and as to the design you have to see her, and the King of the Sueves, though according to my opinion, their inclinations are far distant from peace, hath manifested a great value for your mediation, and desire to render you what is due to you by the Allies of the Empire: He had already understood that you were here, and told me, that any where else he had before visited you. In fine my Lord, the honour I have to be yours, hath made me receive from the Queen, from him, and the whole Camp, much greater honours than were due to my person. And concerning the Proposition made for a cessation of Arms for three dayes, the Queen fearing that in that time you would not be in a condition to mount on Horseback, hath granted it for eight, and hath sent one of her own to cause it be sign'd by the King, if he so please. “My intention, said Pharamond, shall not be only to sign it for eight days, but I would sign it with my blood for the rest of my life, and if there need no more than the giving of it, to make the Queen consent, she knows well how willingly I would surrender it.

Speaking these words, he cast his eyes on the Envoy of Rosmond, who saluted him with a profound respect, and causing him approach his Bed, he saluted him with a civility and and sweetness which left not in his Soul any enemy-like thought. He presently signed the cessation of Arms, and return'd it into his hands, praying him to tell the Queen, that if it were only against his life that she made war, he entreated, that he might bring at once more to her feet, and that she would content her self with the death of the Criminal, without engaging in his miseries so many thousand innocents. The Cimbrian was as much touch'd at the discourse of the King, as charmed by his Majestick Aspect, and that admirable Grace he had, both in his speech, and in all his action, and receiving with a becoming respect the agreement he tendred him; Would to the Gods, my Lord, said he, that the Seal you do me the honour to give me, were for an eternal peace, and not only for a truce of few days; and I assure myself, that only for some particular persons interess'd, there are few in our party would disown in me this wish. I would, said Constance, that you had yet pursued it farther. And I will possibly, my Lord, replied the Cimbrian, pursue it, if it be perouit'd me.

